The following year a very different view of our activity was published in a paper called Week End. This weekly review was issued from the office of the ill-fated "Evening Times." Edgar Wallace was connected with this venture and very full accounts of its promise and failure can be found in the records of Fleet Street. Sensationalism was its line and it might have survived but for its unfortunate publication of Crippen's alleged confession, which was invented by Arthur Newton, the then famous London solicitor, who came to grief in consequence, finally landing in penal servitude and destitution. Arthur Newton was the first solicitor with whom we made contact. He was a very able lawyer and one of the ablest legal defenders to practise in the London Courts. Since this time we have become acquainted with a few other solicitors, mostly in Scotland. Strangely enough, in nearly every case they have been struck off the rolls and landed in jail. None of them went to jail for principle, but rather for principal, their clients' principal. They were all able men, what one would term "characters." They were successful in their profession and never ought to have ended their days in humiliation and poverty, even under capitalism. But that is another story.

The "Week End," in its issue for January 5, 1911, published a long article, headed:

THE NEW LITERARY CULT.
AN UNPLEASANT PHASE IN MODERN LIFE.
"G.B.S." Dissected.

The article opend by attacking the "undeserved and prosperous notoriety" of "a certain school of writers and so-called thinkers." It attacked George Bernard Shaw as being "the head of this group" and described him as "chief exponent of the art of saying nothing as if it were something." It indicted him for confounding "obscurity with profundity" and added that he was "the chief apostle of the epigram."

All this was so much skirmishing. For the purpose of the article was not to attack Shaw but to denounce us. The article concluded:—

Mr. Shaw is the most successful of his class, but he is not the only one. The least successful are the men who take up "isms" which are not yet popular, and take them up far more seriously than Mr. Shaw has taken socialism. A fair example is Mr. Guy Aldred, a correspondent of the Paris "Liberator."

Mr. Aldred is a young man very like Mr. Shaw in his ways and his writings, only he is serious, and, therefore, the funnier writer of the two. He has been a journalist, so he has, therefore, a certain command of glib phrases. Now, he is the apostle of a new anarchism who—he may be six-and-twenty years old—occupies himself in setting right all the other religions of the world. He uses the involved sentence, in which he securely hides his thoughts.

Between himself and Mr. Shaw a great gulf is fixed. Mr. Shaw is accepted and prosperous; Mr. Aldred is not. The latter likes to rush in and take the side of other nations against his own. Sometimes he is successful in obtaining thereby a little publicity (he served twelve months for publishing that seditious rag, the "Indian Sociologist," from Krishnavarna, and advertises the fact in his subsequent writings), but, generally speaking, he is not. He would call himself an idealist; most people would term him simply ridiculous.

There is still a great gulf fixed between G.B.S. and ourself. We continue to be unaccepted and unacceptable. But the world which has not accepted our "ism" does not seem to have made a great success of its servile complacency.

A WISH

I never walk through Glasgow town
When summer decks the land,
But what I wish I had the power
Of some almighty hand,
I'd lift it clean, each stick and stone,
And cast it in the sea,
And drown the folly, sin, and shame,
And filth and misery.

I'd let the fresh winds kiss the earth,
I'd bring green grass and trees,
I'd cleanse the Clyde, and bless its banks
For birds, and flowers, and bees,
Then I would say to Glasgow folk,
"There! build again, but keep
Your pride, your joy, your body's health,
And peace o' nights to sleep."

A NEW CHANCELLOR BUT THE OLD POLICY

By The Rt. Hon. F. W. JOWETT
(First Commissioner of Works, 1924 Labour Government).

[The following essay from the pen of our comrade, F. W. Jowett, is reproduced from the "Bradford I.L.P. News" for October 1, 1943.—Ed.]

The key post of Chancellor of the Exchequer has passed with the death of Sir Kingsley Wood to another safe custodian of pre-war finance capitalism.

Sir John Anderson the newly appointed Chancellor is an altogether different type of man to Sir Kingsley Wood, but the principles for which both these types stand concerning the rights of man in relation to the rights of property are exactly the same.

Sir Kingsley Wood like his predecessor in office, Sir John Simon, fought his essentially Tory battle for class-conscious vested interest partisans under a thin disguise of reformist pretension.

Sir John Anderson's record is more openly reactionary but the principles for which he stands in politics are the same. His "wet blanket" speech in the Beveridge debate last February expressed his outlook with regard to the after-war world he expects the British people to live in, quite bluntly. Similar achievements for preservation of finance capitalism after the war to those of his more artful predecessor may not be obtained by the blunt candour of Sir John Anderson without giving him a rough passage for his proposals. Full ministerial responsibility, however, may teach him more of the way the party game is played there than he knew last February when he got himself in trouble by his speech on the Beveridge report.

Sir Kingsley Wood's greatest achievement was the swinging over of by far the greatest load of taxation onto people of the working class. In his Budget speech last April, he boasted of the fact that seven millions of wage-earners—at least one in every family in the land — were then paying some two hundred millions pounds of their earnings in income tax, this in addition to the far larger amount they are paying in indirect taxation, which he did not even mention.

The three hundred million pounds post-war credits (mainly abstracted from the wage packets of people of the working class) he said would be a strong stabilising force after the war. What he really meant when he said the three hundred millions compulsorily abstracted from earnings would be a "stabilising force" after the war, was that the millions of separate individual owners of these Post-War Credits could be expected to serve as shock absorbers for protection of the big financiers who through the banks have been circulating what is in substance counterfeit money, that is to say, bankers' credit money and "chalking it up" against the nation as debt.

Prime Minister Churchill himself (who like Sir John is apt to speak more bluntly than was the artful habit of the late Sir Kingsley Wood) has plainly indicated that the three hundred millions of compulsorily abstracted earnings will be made the subject of scare promoting propaganda if necessary when the war ends just as poor peoples Post Office Savings were after the last war.

Not only does indirect taxation lay the heaviest load on wage workers and people with small incomes owing to the bare necessities of life carrying by far the heaviest load of it; but the basic income tax rates are so arranged in the matter of assessment, for example, that escape clauses for heavy reliefs are readily available for big-business concerns. My collection of daily and weekly press reports of big profit returns grew so tremendously large and my opportunities for making use of it were so few that I gave up the task of collecting them some time ago. But I do happen to have before me a cutting of a letter which Sir Kingsley Wood's Budget speech last April moved a "War Worker" to write to the "Yorkshire Observer" (April 26th).

"As was expected," says the writer of the letter, "the chief target of the Chancellor in his Budget was the working man's little pleasure—tobacco and beer. Reading your paper this morning I notice on page 4 a bold headline "Mallinsons Again Pay 28¾ per cent." Further dividends were as follows: British Tyre & Rubber Co., 11 per cent., British Lead Mills, 10 per cent., W. Canning & Co., 22½ per cent. "I am a daily reader of your paper," the writer states, "and have taken particular interest in the various dividends declared during the past year and have noticed how regularly the following percentages have appeared—10, 15, 20, 30 per cent."

How is it possible to pay these large—and some even much larger—profits, and in many cases heavily increased profits in war time? Isn't there an Excess Profits Tax? Of course there is. But the kind providence of astute Chancellors of the Exchequer has so arranged that excess profits can be calculated as compared with one or more of three selected years, all of which were years when re-armament expenditure was rising in preparation for war.

Therefore, the 80 per cent. Excess Profits Tax may only be reckoned on the best selected years, giving the least possible margin for taxation, and this is only one of many escape holes in the war taxation system available for big business and financial interests.

How many people know that in the Income Tax Act of 1918 a clause was slipped through to give exclusive power to the Bank of England to assess its own profits for taxation? When quoted the clause reads more brazenly and defiantly impudent than could be dreamed of in an Act of Parliament. I take this account of the clause from the small weekly Social Credit Journal "Reality" of September 10th:—

"Section 68 of the Income Tax Act of 1918 (says Reality) Provides that the Governor of the Bank of England shall have all the powers of a Tax Commissioner to make his own assessment in repect of interest, annuities, dividends, AND THE PROFITS ATTACHED TO THE SAME PAYABLE EITHER TO THE BANK OUT OF PUBLIC REVENUE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, as well as profits chargeable under Schedule D . . . and all other profits chargeable with tax arising within any office or department under the management or control of either Bank."

In other words the journal referred to comments, "by Act of Parliament this institution's own officials have the power to assess what the country owes them and what they owe the country."

According to the "Sunday Express" (September 26) the reach-down into the working class for charging income tax on lower earnings is intended by the Government to go deeper after the war. Although the seven millions of wage earners Sir Kingsley Wood boasted in his Budget speech in April were then paying two hundred millions in income tax, since Sir Kingsley Wood's April Budget the number of wage-earning income-tax payers has grown so rapidly that the "Sunday Express" can proudly claim that

MORE THAN 10,000,000 WEEKLY WAGE EARNING MEN AND WOMEN NOW PAY THEIR BIT.

A great achievement for the late Sir Kingsley Wood, and a priceless blessing to the astute financiers who, through the banks, have been coining what is in substance counterfeit money —for it represents neither goods nor services, although it is chalked up to the nation as debt. Ten million shock-absorbers to protect the big money-bugs! A great achievement! A priceless blessing!

WAR TIME REFLECTIONS

By The Rev. J. F. GERRARD, B.A.
(Vicar, St. Thomas's Church, Wigan)

[The two short articles that follow are extracted from the "St. Thomas's Parish Magazine," Wigan, for October, 1943. They speak for themselves and reveal the writer's courage and commonsense.—Ed.]

SPECIAL SERVICES

The spate of Special Services continue in full flood and soon we shall have to alter the Prayer Book Kalendar, and instead of Saints Days insert such festivals as Farm Sunday, Salvage Sunday, National Loaf Day, and so on. The bright idea is to use the Church as a medium to bolster up the war effort. After four years of war people are getting tired; strikes and absenteeism tell their own story. So the parsons are set on praying for victory; eight thousand, say, in this country praying against twelve thousand in Germany. It would be all right if the God whom we worship was Mars or Baal who delighted in the blood of gallant men, but Christ said He was a God of Love, the Father of all mankind. In the last war such days had a certain measure of success; in this they have fallen flat; the man in the street may not know much theology, but he has sufficient to tell him that Christ's teachings and a war like this are utterly incompatible.

TIME BRINGS MANY CHANGES

To the veteran of the last war who has a retentive memory, nothing is more remarkable than the astonishing change in the ideas and utterances of the notabilities who guide our destinies in this war. Mr. Herbert Morrison, the Home Secretary, who can order one's internment without trial for expressing independent views (so called defeatism), was a conscientious objector in 1914/1918. Mr. Bevin, who is now conscripting women up to 50 years of age, was at one time strongly opposed both to conscription and war. Mr. Tom Johnston, Secretary of State for Scotland, who recently did homage to the King on his appointment, was a fierce republican a few years back. He wrote in 1920:—

The King business is an anachronism: a survival from more superstitious times; a chip from the medieval raree show with gilt coaches and outriders keepers-of-the-green-wax-in-expectation, and a whole army of political spongers and mouchards looking for a share of the half-million sterling that an educated British people pays for the upkeep of the Royal Family.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, provides outstanding examples of change of view. At one time he was extremely hostile to Soviet Russia: the Russians were "baboons," their system of government one that "rots the soul of a nation." Now he is ready to fraternise with Stalin, one of the worst tyrants since Nero.

He has, of late, fallen out with Mussolini, whom he describes as a "jackal." But he thought differently a few years ago. After a visit to Rome he said:

I could not help being charmed like so many other people by Signor Mussolini's gentle and simple bearing, and by his calm, detached poise, in spite of many burdens and dangers. If I had been an Italian I am sure I should have been wholeheartedly with him from start to finish in his triumphant struggle against the bestial appetites and passions of Leninism.

What is the ordinary man to think of such examples (and they can be multiplied) of volte-face? Is it too much to hope that he uses his common sense and refuses to be duped by politicians and warmongers? He would then realise that this war is completely evil and futile, and will lead to the same barren results as in 1914/1918:—

The Grand Old Duke of York,
He had ten thousand men
He marched them up the hill
And he marched them down again.

The tragedy is, however, that many brave and innocent men are lost going up and down the hill.

SOUTH PLACE

A STORY OF HERESY, PROGRESS AND CULTURE.

In September, 1808, the Monthly Repository, conducted by Aspland and Vidler, contained a remarkably liberal reference to Thomas Paine:

"The death of Mrs. Paine has given occasion for much abuse of her husband. This was needless, ungenerous and we believe in a great measure unjustifiable."

On November 24, 1816, the congregation of Parliament Court resolved:

"That this congregation, entertaining a high sense of the character and talents of the Rev. W. J. Fox, and conceiving him to be eminently qualified to succeed our late revered minister, the Rev. W. Vidler, and to promote the great cause of truth and righteousness in this chapel, respectfully invite him to accept the pastorship of this congregation."

On December 16, Mr. Fox accepted, adding: "May the Author of all good enable me to discharge the duties as to serve the cause of genuine Christianity."

Fox was born on a farm near Wrentham, Suffolk, March 1, 1786. His father, Paul Fox, moved to Norwich when his son was three years old, and there the child had four years in a school connected with St. George's Independent Chapel. At Norwich his father had been a weaver, and at twelve his son worked at the loom; hence his signature in the Anti-Corn Law League, "The Norwich Weaver Boy."

The first minister of South Place was the son of a mechanic; the second was a stonemason; and the third was a weaver; they all acquired classical education, but always loved the tradition of the Carpenter's Son. Paul Fox was a radical politically, but rigidly religious. In 1834 his eminent son, in an article denouncing the hissing of an Atheist, Julian Hibbert, in court, and refusal of his testimony, said in kindly appeal to Atheists:

"I myself remember passing through similar sensations in my boyhood, being dragged to churches and chapels innumerable, sometimes thrice in the day, to hear dull and measured routine services, and still duller sermons wherein dogmas were made to supply the place of logic, till the very name of religion became loathsome to me as something invariably connected with privation and suffering, and Christianity became synonymous with jesuitry and bigotry. Hatred of the tyranny practised in his name made me blind to the beautiful spirit of Christ, blind to the fact that he was a beneficent RADICAL reformer to the numerous evils to which the human mind is subjected."

On a later occasion Fox said:

"I was brought up on the sour milk of Calvanism, and sorely it disagreed with me."

How much does liberalism owe to John Calvin! He burnt one heretic, but has made millions. The "sour milk of Calvinism," in Fox's case, was not mother's milk. There being no children's books in the house, few books save the Bible, his mother got access to some library, and used to sit beside her son at the loom reading novels to him. So his imagination became cultivated. He became messenger in a bank at 13, which brought him money enough to buy books. He had a fondness for mathematics, and went through a thorough course.

Calvinism does not lose its grip on youth because of its repulsiveness; it held young Fox with its glittering eye, and offered him the only door to a career, and one helpful to mankind. So in September, 1806, he entered the Protestant Dissenting College at Homerton to study for the ministry under the popular John Pye Smith, D.D., whose "evidences" for orthodoxy were answered by Robert Taylor in his famous Syntagma. Fox left college early in 1810, with highest testimonials and settled with the Independent Chapel at Fareham.

No sooner had he left college than he was beset by doubts. Probably he had, like most divinity students, indulged in heretical speculations without taking them very seriously, and believed them securely buried under graduation and ordination. But he had hardly begun preaching before he found his doubts embarrassing. This is shown by a letter which he wrote to a friend on March 12, 1810. In this letter, reproduced in full by Conway in 1893, Fox praises the heretics, especially the Universalists, speaks of their attachment to himself, and denounces the orthodox as fools.

At the close of 1810, his twenty-fourth year, his mental struggles became painful; not one point only, but the whole confession by which he had entered college and obtained a congregation, began to float. Amid these doubts he was borne as by a torrent, his heart still moored to the old associations. The dogmas of the Trinity and Original Sin were given up in 1810; the pre-existence of Christ and Atonement were abandoned a year later; and the eternity of hell yielded in 1812.

A minority of the church at Fareham followed him, and a separate society was formed, but apparently could not support him. In 1812 the Southern Unitarian Association met at Portsmouth, and there Fox made his first speech in any assembly of that denomination. Soon afterwards he settled with the Presbyterian (really Unitarian) Church at Chester, where he passed five peaceful years. There is one sentence in Fox's notes of his experience which now has a pregnant significance. He says that when his orthodoxy was leaving him, at Fareham, his first aim was to "form a congregation on a comprehensive principle, with virtue and not faith for the bond of union." The Ethical Culture leaders may thus learn that their movement was anticipated by the first minister of South Place near the beginning of the nineteenth century. On that principle his chapel was founded, by it grew, and to it has remained faithful. Beside old Chichester Cathedral Fox found a congenial circle, and leisure for reading. He there met the lady he afterwards married.

Fox now preached in various cities and lectured at Norwich. Towards the end of 1814 he desired a wider sphere of activity. Within three years he was invited to the pulpit of Parliament Court Chapel. The Committee proposed that he be introduced by eminent preachers, and Fox replied:

"I can have not the least objection, provided it be kept perfectly clear from anything which may look like ordination, to which ceremony under every form I have a strong dislike, from its tendency to transform a preaching brother into a priest, and to invest a minister with dignities and privileges to which, according to my notions, they have no Christian right. I do not know but that ordination may be so conducted as to be perfectly innocent and useful, but I am convinced that the practice has a tendency to abuse, which would never long remain dormant. There are certain evils felt now amongst the Independents, such as exactions of a creed, the peculiar authority of ministers to invest with the ministerial office, erroneous notions of that office, etc., which spring immediately out of memory, and will follow its adoption, in no long period, by any sect, however unexceptionable may be their first mode of adopting it. The best way, therefore, in my opinion, is to avoid it altogether."

In accordance with Fox's wishes, he was introduced to the Parliament Court pulpit on Wednesday, April 2, 1817. Robert Aspland delivered an address against priesthood and priestcraft from the text, Matt. xviii, 15-20. Dr. Lindsey discoursed on the origin and constitution of Christian assemblies. Madge of Norwich, Gilchrist, and Dr. Rees welcomed the young minister cordially. Mr. Anderton, for the Committee, mentioned the steps taken to secure Fox's services. A contemporary report says:

..."Mr. Fox, in a short but animated address, signified his acceptance of the invitation, declining to make any confession of faith, except that he was a Christian and desired to be extensively useful as a Christian minister, which desire was the great motive to his removal from his late situation to so public and important a station in the metropolis. Unfettered and unlimited freedom he claimed for himself, and would cheerfully concede to all his brethren!"

That April 2, 1817, was a very bright day in South Place Society's calendar. The chapel was crowded at noon. At 4 p.m., nearly one hundred male guests sat at dinner at King's Arms, Poultry, with Fox at the head of the table. Great enthusiasm prevailed when the toast was given: "The cause of civil and religious liberty all over the world." The toast has been the motto—in modern phrasing, the slogan—of South Place (or Parliament Court, as it was then) ever since.

On July 15, 1817, Parliament Court was registered legally as an Unitarian Chapel. Fox became a recognised leader of Unitarianism in London. On June 13, 1819, the Society formally united itself with the Unitarian Association.

Fox, with his taste for music and the drama, his scholarship, his love of the world various, addressed himself to the task of emancipating Unitarians from moral superstitions. He supported the new Lancastrian system of education. The Duke of Sussex and Lord and Lady Darnley lionised him for his educational work. Recognising his opportunity, he opened Parliament Court for evening lectures, dealing with all phases of the great social problem, Church and State, War, Philanthrophy, Population. He became the great human revivalist.

The French Revolution had passed into a French Reaction. Radicals mourned the degeneration and renegadism of Coleridge and Wordsworth. Faith in man was declining. Fox revived the vision and raised again the song of the morning stars. He brought the Society into relation with the general cause of humanity, drew its members away from their lingering Puritanism, liquidated the Unitarian controversy in the broad issue of human welfare, and so transformed their textual dissent from orthodoxy into a bold heresy of human right. He was entirely fearless and knew no sectarian limitations.

Richard Carlile's 1819 prosecution gave Fox a splendid opportunity of supporting that brave Deist (later Atheist) and bringing a judgment day among Unitarians. No Unitarian before or since has written or spoken with the splendid courage displayed by Fox at this time of crisis.

There is no need to retell the story of Carlile's prosecutions to the readers of these columns. Our Carlile studies are well known, and his immortal trials have been canvassed well.

Fox denounced the 1819 prosecutor for being a Unitarian.

On the Sunday preceding the trial Fox boldly arraigned the whole principle of such prosecutions. On Sunday, October 24, 1819, after the verdict against, but before the sentence on Carlile, Fox delivered a discourse which shines as the one religious candle in that dark time of theological and political persecution, and social ignorance and depression. At this time Fox was very orthodox in his theology. He believed firmly in the Bible and in Christianity, as many Unitarians do not believe to-day. But he spoke bravely and fearlessly in defence of Richard Carlile, Thomas Paine, and the Age of Reason. He respected the honesty of the attack on Christianity and the sincerity of motive that inspired Paine in writing the work, and Carlile in insisting on its publicaton. Fox uttered no mean or evasive word and made no fling at Carlile. He upheld the equal right to Free Speech of Deists and Atheists, and maintained that unless the rights of Atheists were upheld, religious freedom was denied. Fox's discourse made London shudder. He was as truly a pioneer as Richard Carlile.

On Monday, October 25, 1819, the congregation met and resolved unanimously:

"That this congregation do hereby express to the Rev. W. J. Fox the high degree of satisfaction with which they heard the manly, energetic, and argumentative discourse delivered by him last evening on the duties of Christians towards Deists, and earnestly request him to publish the same."

There were sharp replies from the narrow wing of Unitarianism when the sermon was published, but its best men rallied to the standard.

On August 19, 1821, he preached a discourse, now of historical interest, on the mournful death of Queen Caroline. It was a powerful and pathetic arraignment of those who embittered the life of the unhappy Queen. Fox now became a London institution. He was the darling of the "Non-Con Club" (Nonconformist), was made a Trustee of Dr. William's Library and Charities, and became a favourite orator on public occasions. On April 20, 1820, he was married to Miss Eliza Florance, of Chichester. He was just then urging a Dissenters' Marriage Bill on Parliament, the need of which had a notable illustration in the fact that he, a Unitarian, had to be married in a church—St. George's-in-the East.

In February, 1822, Fox's health broke down. He was absent from his pulpit until March 17, 1823.

On May 22 of that year he laid the first stone of South Place Chapel. He delivered an address in which he recalled the memory of Winchester and Vidler. South Place was opened on the 1st day of February, 1824, with a discourse entitled: "The Spirit of Christianity, the same as the Spirit of Unitarianism"; the text being Romans viii. 9; his subject in the evening being St. Paul's discourse at Athens.

Fox consecrated the chapel to the cause of virtue and freedom above any doctrines he then held, some of which he gradually abandoned. He summoned as witnesses those "who have raised the standard of religious freedom, and fought its battles, and suffered in its cause, and prompted its manly and generous assertions, not only for those who were like-minded with themselves, but on behalf of all"; and exclaimed: "Here be the tree planted that bears such fruit, and long may it flourish, for it is the tree of life, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations!"

And so was transplanted to South Place the tree long fruitful, and now rooted in Conway Hall. The South Place trust-deed (enrolled March 2, 1825) provided for the growth and expansion of the tree. It established the chapel

"as a place for the public religious worship of One God, even the Father, and for instruction in the Christian religion as professed by the said Society, at such times, according to such forms, and under such regulations as are now adopted, or shall from time to time be adopted by the said Society."

This trust, made not only to the then existing Society, but expressly to its "future members," subjected both worship of the Father and instruction in the Christian religion to those subsequent modifications which have transformed South Place into Conway Hall, the centre of Humanism and true Ethical thought. At the date of the Trust there was no such statute of limitations as that which later protected trusts, and the careful provision of the founders of South Place Chapel for future changes of belief proves how deliberately, at a time when Deists were in prison and Unitarians in peril, they planted the taproot of their tree in liberty.

All of this is the more remarkable and the more notable because at that time, and for some years later, Fox himself did not question the authority of the Bible. That he was still regarded as a firm believer, even by his most intimate friends, appears by a letter to him written by Sarah Flower, know to the world as Sarah Flower Adams, author of the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee."

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD

Tributes were paid to the sincerity and political fearlessness of Lord Wedgwood in the House of Lords on Tuesday, July 27, by Viscount Cranborne (Lord Cecil), Lord Addison, the Marquess of Crewe, Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, The Earl of Onslow, and Lord Strabolgi.

Viscount Cranborne stated that Wedgwood would have liked to have been regarded as a typical Englishman, although he did not conform to a common pattern. He was sui generis. There was nobody completely like him. He was absolutely fearless, both personally and politically. The heavier the odds were against him, the better he was pleased. He was never so happy as when he was standing absolutely alone in defence of a cause in which he believed. He had, to a notable degree, a deep and sincere sympathy with the under-dog. He would fight always to the very last breath of his being for those whom he considered to be the suffering and the oppressed. He was utterly without any personal ambition or any of those lower motives which taint the lives of so many politicians. He was in political life not for what he could get from it but for what he could give to it. He was courageous, single-minded, and a lover of England. Above all, he was a lover of individual liberty, which was the guiding passion of his life.

Lord Addison referred to Wedgwood as "Josh," and declared that he was ever the champion of those whom he thought needed an advocate. He was fearless and uncompromising always. He never feared to stand alone.

Lord Addison recalled a scene which occurred in the House of Commons thirty years ago. Josiah Wedgwood took it upon himself, alone, to oppose a Bill promoted by the Home Office. He cvered the Paper with Amendments, and he, alone, kept the House of Commons up till about six in the morning, singlehanded, fighting by himself, because he believed intensely in his cause and feared not at all to be alone—in fact, he rather enjoyed it.

Wedgwood was an intense individualist and possessed a love of individual liberty. He loved the land and was impatient with any restraint being placed upon its use. With all his impatience of wrong, he was a patient and lovable friend, and possessed an indomitable and unselfish spirit.

The Marquess of Crewe spoke of Wedgwood as a country neighbour, and dwelt on his close study of old histories and old families. Lord Wedgwood was something of a paradox, because, although he described himself as a Socialist, there was never another such individualist in the world as he was.

Viscount Cecil of Chelwood stated that Wedgwood was a relative and a very old friend. His disinterestedness exceeded that of anyone Viscount Cecil knew. Wedgwood's honesty, straightforwardness and courage might be regarded as a beacon and a guide to all those who are engaged in public life.

Lord Onslow spoke of the part Wedgwood took in taking the initiative in the great work of the History of Parliament Joint Committee. This work will cover the whole history of parliament from the very beginning onwards.

Lord Strabolgi spoke of his intimate friendship with Lord Wedgwood for 27 years, and their close association in the House of Commons. Wedgwood possessed fearless determination to expose abuses and to uphold, at any cost, the cause of liberty and justice.

MISSION TO MOSCOW

The domestication of high politics includes Stalinist Russia. Litvinov also travels with his wife and daughter. The families of the Russian and American diplomats are joined by ties of the strongest mutual affection. Mrs. Molotov appears as the manager of the cosmetic trust of the Soviet Union and we learn that in Russia as in the United States and Britain women wish to be beautiful. Both in America and Soviet Russia the wives of diplomats are business women. When Davies calls upon Churchill in 1939, the English politician, not yet in the government, is laying a brick wall in his garden, like any English or American or Soviet workman, while the two wives exchange amenities.

Democracy must not be too human. The divine mystery of Government must be upheld. Consequently, President Roosevelt never appears in the film, except as the back of his head and shoulders; a voice; or a mysterious hand. Stalin is represented as the mysterious presence until the end, when Davies is about to leave the Soviet Union and is saying good-bye to the Czar's successor in the little father role, President Kalinin, Stalin comes in unexpectedly, and displays a most affectionate bonhomie that shows how right it is for him to be the dictator of the Russian sixth of the globe.

Outside these two poles of the human and the superhuman in the United Nations lie all those treacherous, mediocre,ignorant and foolish elements who dare to question the wisdom of the great leaders: in Russia, the traitors who wreck factories and conspire with Hitler and the Mikado; in America, a swiftly filmed amalgam of pacifists, Bundists, isolationists and hysterical liberals, who are obstructing the efforts of the President on the eve of Pearl Harbour. The symmetry of Russian and American affairs is established with the same combination of newsreels and fabricated reality.

Davies is shown arriving at the frontiers of the U.S.S.R. hungry, as if American ambassadors were half-starved in pre-war Germany and Poland. He finds everything in the Soviet garden lovely.

He makes a grand tour of inspection of the territories of Soviet Russia and wanders through the land to the accompaniment of much old Czarist Russian music, but does not hear "The Internationale." A Russian woman coal miner, impersonated by a Hollywood film star, assures him what fun it is working in the Russian coal mines! All would be well but for sabotage, and so we are led up to the travesty, already recorded, of the Moscow Trials where Radek, Bukharin, and others confess that they are all in the plot to destroy Socialism. At the instigation of Trotsky, who in the pay of Hitler, they aim to hand over the U.S.S.R. to the Nazis and Japan.

Ignoring the fact that Ribbentrop, as German Foreign Minister, actually signed a Pact of friendship with Russia, in Moscow, on August 23, 1939, and was photographed with Stalin and Molotov (the official photograph was reproduced in The Word for October, 1942), the first still published in advance of the film was of Trotsky negotiating with Ribbentrop, an incident that is not even mentioned in the testimony of the Moscow trials. In selecting this shot, the producers gave away a central aim of the film, to fix in the mind of the English-speaking citizens of America and Britain the belief that opponents of the government are a fifth column of the enemy, and that the strength of the Soviet Union comes precisely from the extermination of plotters against the state. But this phony incident was deleted from the film, with all other shots of Trotsky. Jewish groups were disturbed by the anti-Semitic conclusions that would be drawn from such a scene. Subsequently, the advertising avoided all mention of the purges and the fifth column, and tried instead to establish the exactness of another order of correspondence. Day after day, there appeared in the press paired photographs of the actors and the people they impersonated, Huston and Davies, Whipper and Haile Selassie, Malone and Churchill, as if to convince intending film audiences that the film was true because of the resemblance of the faces of the actors to the historic personalities portrayed.

The climax of this displacement of the test of truth was reached on the day before the first public showing of the film. The most marvellous and suggestive correspondence of all was boosted! Joe Stalin and Joe Davies resembled each other in their lives. The two Joes come up from the ranks the hard way; the mother of the American Joe was an ordained minister of the gospel, and the Russian Joe studied in a theological seminary. The meeting of the two Joes in Moscow brought about the unity of their two nations in the struggle against fascism. What a story!

This story reminds us of the theologians and their defence of Church invented miracles, the aim of which was not to promote the Glory of God but merely the power of the Church. The truth of the utterly impossible miracle was established by a most pedantic and scrupulous or unscrupulous dwelling on the correctness of the account of the setting. All the statements about the people, the buildings, the roads and the instruments involved in the miracle were verified. So the directors of the film who wish to establish a correspondence with reality, where none exists, are forced to multiply examples of correspondences irrelevant to the main question.

Warner Brothers held, during the first week in March, 1943, a five-day conference on this picture. The conference decided to allocate towards advertising the film the greatest sum of money ever spent by the company on advertising a single motion picture, over a million dollars. The Hollywood columnist, Jimmie Fidoler, mentioned the sequence concerning Leon Trotsky that had been inserted in the film, and could be cut out under pressure.

It must be admitted that the United States Government disclaimed all official responsibility for the film, which was wise as well as correct. But if we are to accept the unofficial statement of the American columnist, Drew Pearson, for May 12, 1943, the U.S.A. Government bestowed an unofficial blessing on the film.

Drew Pearson wrote:—

Ambassador Joseph Davies' film "Mission To Moscow" has been welcomed by the State Department as one of the most important movies which could have been made at this time to help the American people understand Russia.

Despite Warner Brothers heavy advertising for the film, which secured some technical favourable comments from some of the movie critics, all manner of orthodox commentators found themselves unable to accept the falsehood we have instanced.

Dorothy Thompson, who has been received well in Britain, and whose capitalist journalist credentials cannot be challenged, was the first important columnist with courage to speak truthfully about this film. In the New York Post for May 5, 1943, she wrote:—

The characters are phony; the history is phony . . . The picture is full of fiction presented as fact. . . . The famous purge trials are grossly fictionalized.

In the New York Times, for May 8, Ann O'Hare McCormick describes the film as the false picture of America, the false picture of Russia and the false picture of history that are combined in the distorted composite to which the former Ambassador unluckily gives his authorization in an introductory speech.

The same day, The Nation, leading cultural organ of United States liberal thought, described the picture as "whitewash" and added:—

In the matter of the "purge" "The Nation" has always held that the evidence on which the alleged Trotskyist conspirators were convicted was unconvincing and the film version of the trials does nothing to change this opinion.

Writers in the Socialist and pro-war New Leader of the same date, described the film as "a blow to democratic unity in America" and as evidence of 'moral depravity." We endorse these descriptions.

James T. Farrell, noted American author, enjoying wide popularity for his work, Studs Lonigan, declared:—

"Mission To Moscow" follows the prescription for propaganda written by Hitler in "Mein Kampf": it tells a big lie. The purpose of big lies in totalitarian propaganda is that of falsifying history. This film is a gross and shameless falsification of history. It misrepresents the Moscow trials, the history of Russian foreign policy in recent years, and the sequence of events which happened in America prior to Pearl Harbour.

Farrell recalls the Commission of Inquiry of which John Dewey was chairman. He indicts Davies and Warner Brothers for ignoring the records of this investigation and denounces their want of fairmindedness and objectivity. Farrell adds:

Warner Brothers have spent well over a million dollars on a film which carries the message that Leon Trotsky was an agent of Hitler.

Long before any Hollywood studio would dare to consider a picture which attacked fascism or had one favourable word to say of the Soviet Union, long before the fight against fascism became a proposition in which the film studio could spend and make huge sums of money, Trotsky was a bitter foe of fascism. He wrote urgently calling for the fight against Hitler's assumption of power. After Hitler became Reichschancellor, Trotsky wrote predicting that Hitler would be the Super-Wrangel attacking the Soviet Union: it is a known fact that Trotsky never deviated from his position advocating defence of the Soviet Union. Trotsky's political record is totally ignored. Why? . . .

Trotsky and the old Bolsheviks are dead: you cannot injure the dead; when you misrepresent the dead, you injure the living. And in this case, the living are right here in this country. Opposition to the falsifications contained in this film is an immediate and practical question. It concerns us here and now. It has happened here in a reverse way, totalitarian methods have been introduced into American culture.

In the New York Times for May 9, 1943, John Dewey, the noted American educator, and Suzanne La Follette, liberal writer, who served respectively as the chairman and secretary of the International Commission of Inquiry into the Moscow trials, declare that the film is the first instance in our country of totalitarian propaganda for mass consumption—a propaganda which falsifies history through distortion, omission or pure invention of facts.

This letter further declares:

"Mission To Moscow" deals essentially with three things: Soviet history since January, 1937; international relations since that time, and American history since 1939. It falsifies all three. . . .

In this synthetic trial (shown in the film) the accused confess that their alleged crimes were directed by Trotsky. What is omitted is the testimony in the actual trials of specific alleged meetings with Trotsky abroad—testimony immediately challenged in the world press and conclusively disproved by evidence offered in rebuttal before the international commission of inquiry of which the undersigned were respectively chairman and secretary. It is not irrelevant to mention here that the commission, after painstaking investigation, concluded that the Moscow trials were frameups—a conclusion endorsed by intelligent world opinion at the time of its announcement.

In Boston, the City Council wanted to see the film banned. Moving one of the banning resolutions, a councillor described Stalin as being the greatest murderer the world has ever seen and the greatest ambassador from the pits of hell whose name has ever been written into the dirty pages of history.

Describing the Boston voting, William Henry Chamberlain, in the pro-war Socialist New Leader, says:

The Joe Davies travesty on recent Russian and American history ran into stormy weather in Boston, where the City Council voted in favour of forbidding the showing of "Mission to Moscow." But the Mayor refused to comply with this recommendation and a spokesman for Boston's Trotskyists, while expressing abhorrence of the distortions of the film, came out against suppression. He argued, and I think with very good sense and reason, that the right method of dealing with such a film is not to invoke the double-edged weapon of suppression, but to hammer into the public consciousness the falsehoods, absurdities and inconsistencies, of which one can find such an abundance.

Another protest against the film, asserting that it falsifies history and distorts even the very book on which it is based" was signed by 52 leading writers, educators, editors, and Negro and Labour leaders. The signatories include:—George S. Counts, state chairman of the American Labour Party; Harry D. Gideonse, President of Brooklyn College; A. Philip Randolph, President, Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, AFL; Max Danish, editor of Justice, publication of ILGWU, AFL; Frank R. Crosswaith, chairman Negro Labour Committee; Joseph Schlossberg, Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union, CIO and others. Additional signatures have been received from B. F. McLaurin, National Secretary, March on Washington Movement; Arthur G. McDowell, National Representative in Missouri, Textile Workers Union, CIO; Harry Lundberg, President Seafarers International Union, and others.

Against this volume of denunciation, based on a critical factual approach, Bosley Crowther, as film critic for the New York Times, in its issue for April 30, declares that the film was "a generally faithful screen version" of current historical events therein depicted. He commends the Moscow "purge" trials as "briefly but effectively played." He adds, with sublime irresponsible impudence:

It puts into the record for millions of movie goers to grasp an admission that the many "purged" generals and other leaders were conspirators in a plot—a plot engineered by Trotsky with the Nazis and the Japs. . . .

The American Communist Party organ, the Daily Worker, seized on Crowther's comments with ill-concealed glee and reproduced them in its colums for May 2, 1943.

Similarly, in Britain, the Daily Worker applauded the film and its lies. D. N. Pritt, K.C., M.P., emphasised his own worthlessness as an apologist when he wrote in the Daily Worker for July 22, a glowing account of the film. He ignores the discrepancies between Davies' book and the film. He ignores the serious falsification of the trials as originally staged in Moscow. He establishes his disrepute as an apologist by declaring that in his book Davies "performed a tremendous public service" and the Warner Brothers have turned it now into a film which "will reach a far wider public and impress that public more vividly." In particular, and here the man establishes his fraudalent mendacity, as a stooge apologist, Pritt is as delighted with the scene of the mass trial, as he was with the mock trials, which he himself witnessed and approved. Any travesty seems to satisfy the legal sense of equity and reason of this strange legal worthy.

JEWISH METHOD OF SLAUGHTER

To the Editor.
Dear Sir,

In your issue of September there is a letter signed by Mr. John Salter in which he suggests that anti-Jewish feeling might diminish if the Jewish method of slaughter were abolished.

I am quite certain that Mr. John Salter is well-meaning, but I am afraid he is quite ignorant of the subject on which he writes.

The Jewish method of slaughter, so far from being the "most primitive, cruel and bloodthirsty" method is, in the opinion of the highest medical authorities, the most humane. I will quote from so eminent an authority as Lord Horder, who points out that "the instantaneous cutting of the blood vessels, the trachea and oesophagus produces an immediate loss of consciousness" and goes on to say, "It is difficult to conceive a more painless and more rapid mode of death." Convulsive movements which are often noticed in animals after they have been to all intents and purposes killed, are due merely to the bloodless state of the brain and no sensation exists after the cut has been administered.

Nor is Lord Horder alone in his opinion. It is supported by more than 400 of the most eminent physiologists and pathologists in the world, including such men of international fame as Virchow, Dubois Reymond and Lord Lister. Sir Leonard Hill, F.R.S., said that statements to the contrary are founded on ignorance and false sentiment.

I am, Yours faithfully,

ROBERT E. LYONS.

EHRLICH AND ALTER

[In our August issue, Comrade H. W. Henderson reviewed at length the pamphlet issued in London by Representatives of the General Jewish Workers' Union "Bund" of Poland, dealing with the case of Henry Erlich and Victor Alter. The pamphlet can be obtained from the Strickland Press, 3d. post free. We ask every worker to read, study, and circulate this indictment of the persecution and assassination of our Jewish Socialist Anti-Fascist comrades. Below we reprint, from page 40 of the Report of the National Executive Committee to the 42nd Annual Conference of the Labour Party, held in the Central Hall, Westminster, last June, the official Labour Party view of these assassinations, miscalled executions.—Ed.]

OUR POLISH COMRADES.

The National Executive Committee, in their Report of the Bournemouth Conference, 1940, expressed their deep concern for the personal security of our Polish Socialist and Trade Union comrades (including Heinrich Ehrlich and Victor Alter) who were left behind in the territory occupied by the U.S.S.R. as a result of its military operations, and described their failure to obtain any assurances with regard to their freedom and safety, or to ascertain the facts of their whereabouts and present position.

In accordance with the assurances given to the last Annual Conference, enquiries and representations continued to be made in responsible circles with regard to Heinrich Ehrlich and Victor Alter. On March 1, 1943, the following letter was addressed to His Excellency M. Ivan Maisky, Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. in Great Britain:—

Dear Ambassador,

The National Executive Committee of the Party have always been disturbed by the re-arrest in Kuibyshev early in December, 1941, of Heinrich Ehrlich and Victor Alter, leaders of the Jewish Labour Party Bund, of Poland, and as you may remember, this anxiety was expressed publicly at the last Annual Party Conference.

As you are aware, these two men are our political friends, and personal friends to many of us. They were members of the Executive Committee of the Labour and Socialist International, and Alter was also a member of the Executive Committee of the International Federation of Trade Unions.

I was instructed recently by our National Executive Committee to ask you to convey to your Government our earnest wish that they should be immediately released and even permitted to come to this country and help us in our struggle against the common enemy.

I understand that there is alarming news in the United States Press to the effect that these friends of ours are, in fact, no longer alive. I urgently beg you to give my Executive Committee the latest and most reliable information.

J. S. Middleton, Secretary.

The following reply dated March 30, 1943, was received from the Soviet Ambassador:—

Dear Mr. Middleton,

On receipt of your letter of the 1st March, I made enquiries on the matter you raised, and have recently received the following information from the Soviet authorities:—

For active subversive work against the Soviet Union and assistance to Polish Intelligence organs on the territory of the U.S.S.R., Alter and Ehrlich were sentenced to capital punishment in August, 1941. At the request of the Polish Government, Alter and Ehrlich were released in September, 1941.

However, after they were set free and at a time of the most desperate battles by Soviet troops against the advancing Hitlerite army, they resumed their hostile activities, including appeals to Soviet troops to stop the bloodshed and immediately conclude a peace with Germany. For this they were again arrested and, in December, 1942, sentenced once more to capital punishment by the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court.

The sentences were carried out in regard to both of them.

(Signed) I. MAISKY,
Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. in Great Britain

Henrich Ehrlich, born in Lublin, Poland, 1882, was Chairman of the Revolutionary Students' Organisation at the age of 20. He was arrested by the Czarist Police in 1902, 1904, 1909 (when he was exiled from Russia), and again (upon his return) in 1911, for belonging to the revolutionary and "subversive" General Jewish Workers' Union, the Bund. He was the representative of the Bund in the Czarist Duma, and, after the Revolution, was elected a member of the Central Executive Committee of the Russian Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies. He visited this country in 1917 as one of their four representatives to organise an International Socialist Congress at Stockholm, and conferred with the National Executive Committee of the Party, and, in Paris, with the Executive of the French Socialist Party.

Victor Alter, born in Mlava, Poland, 1890 like his colleague, was a gifted journalist, editor, and author, and also an economist. He joined the Bund in 1905, and soon became a member of the Central Executive Committee. Both comrades represented the Bund on the Executive Committee of the Labour and Socialist International

Their Polish Party comrades in London declare that after their release from prison in september, 1941, the Soviet authorities assured Alter and Ehrlich that the action taken against them had been a mistake and made due apologies; that they possess documentary proof. for the period after release, that Ehrlich and Alter devoted their energy and attention, in full agreement with representatives of the Soviet Government, to activities which were the very opposite of those with which they were subsequently charged; and that, in the circumstances under which they lived, Alter and Ehrlich had not even the opportunity to make any appeals to the Red Army.

The members of the Polish Socialist Party now in Britain declare that

Thanks to their work, and under their leadership, the solidarity of all working people of Poland grew and developed into a living body without distinction of origin, religion, or nationality. . . . We have known these two comrades. They have been in the same ranks with us for years; they shared with us for decades our sufferings and sorrows. . . . The mud that is being thrown at them by some people will never reach them!"

Satan on Man.

I know your race. It is made up of sheep. It is governed by minorities, seldom or never by majorities. It suppresses its feelings and its beliefs, and follows the handful that makes the noise. Sometimes the noisy handful is right, sometimes wrong, but no matter, the crowd follows it. The vast majority of the race, whether savage or civilized, are secretly kind-hearted and shrink from inflicting pain, but in the presence of the aggressive and pitiless minority they don't dare to assert themselves. Think of it! One kind-hearted creature spies upon another, and sees to it that he loyally helps in iniquities which revolt both of them. Speaking as an expert, I know that ninety-nine out of a hundred of your race were strongly against the killing of witches when that foolishness was first agitated by a handful of pious lunatics in the long ago. . . . Monarchies, aristocracies, and religions are all based upon the individual's distrust of his neighbour, and his desire, for sefety's or comfort's sake, to stand well in his neighbour's eye. These institutions will always remain and always flourish, and oppress you, and affront you, and degrade you because you will always be and remain slaves of minorities. . . .

There has never been a just war, never an honourable one—on the part of the instigator of the war. I can see a million years ahead, and this rule will never change in so many as half-a-dozen instances. The loud little handful—as usual—will shout for the war. The pulpit will—warily and cautiously—object,—at first. The great big, dull bulk of the nation will rub its sleepy eyes and try to make out why there should be a war, and will say, earnestly and indignantly, "It is unjust and there is no necessity for it." Then the handful will shout louder. A few fair men on the other side will argue against the war with speech and pen, and at first will have hearing and be applauded; but it will not last long; those others will outshout them, and presently the anti-war audiences will thin out and lose popularity. Before long you will see this curious thing; the speakers stoned from the platform, and free speech strangled by hordes of furious men who, in their secret hearts, are still at one with those stoned speakers. And now the whole nation—pulpit and all—will take up the war-cry, and shout itself hoarse, and mob any honest man who ventures to open his mouth. . . . Next the statesman will invent cheap lies, putting the blame upon the nation that is attacked, and every man will be glad of those conscience-soothing fallacies, and will diligently study them, and refuse to examine any refutation of them, and bye and bye will convince himself that the war is just. . . .

Cain did his murder with a club; the Hebrews did their murders with javelins and swords; the Greeks and Romans added protective armour, and the fine arts of generalship and military organization; the Christian has added guns and gunpowder; a few centuries from now . . . all men will confess that without Christian civilization war must have remained a trifling thing to the end of time. . . . It is a remarkable progress. In five or six thousand years, five or six high civilizations have risen, flourished, commanded the wonder of the world, then faded out and disappeared; and not one of them except the latest ever invented any sweeping and adequate way to kill people. They all did their best—to kill being the chief stern ambition of the human race, and the earliest incident in its history—but only the Christian civilization has scored a triumph to be proud of. . . . And what does it amount to? Nothing at all. You gain nothing; you always come out where you went in. . . . Who gets a profit out of it? Nobody but a parcel of usurping little monarchs and nobilities who despise, would feel defiled if you touched them, would shut the door in your face if you proposed to call; whom you slave for, fight for, and are not ashamed but proud; whose existence is a perpetual insult to you, and you are afraid to resent it; who are mendicants supported by your alms, yet assume toward you the air of benefactor toward beggar; who address you in the language of master to slave, and are answered in the language of slave to master; who are worshipped by you with your mouth, while in your heart—if you have one—you despise yourself for it.

NEWCASTLE WAR RESISTERS

Newcastle upon Tyne has the distinction of having one of the largest P.P.U. groups in the country known as the War Resisters. An average weekly attendance of about sixty is maintained throughout the year, meetings being held in the Theosophical Hall, 151 Barras Bridge, Newcastle.

This group started at the outset of the war, and was mainly inspired by John Morley and Jack Sadler, who by argument and example showed that strength and consistency lay in adopting the absolutist stand. Other stalwarts who had maintained their opposition to war since 1914 assisted, and many young people "freshers" to pacifism found their spiritual home in the War Resisters.

Their meetings are not only instructive, but enthusiastic and convivial as well. Humour plays its part. The gathering, although mainly political and humanitarian in its approach to pacifism, is more varied in the personnel of the members—business men, clerks, tradesmen, labourers, typists, housewives, and also children mixing together in one fellowship.

The prison record of its members who have been sentenced during the present war in connection with th various conscription measures is a notable one. Up to the present 28 sentences have been imposed, eight members have served or are serving two sentences, one member, John Potter, has served three sentences, whilst the total length of all sentnces amounts to 252 months.

The stand made by John Morley and his two sons, Bob and Alan (which was described in a previous issue of "The Word") and also the witness borne by two generations of the Alexander and Sadler families, have earned the designation of "The Royal families of Pacifism."

Other members who have served two sentences include Albert Oxley, Alf Sharp, Jack Walton, Douglas Gordon Maitland (christened after two generals) and Edward Archbold who joined the army during the last war under age, and whose fine statement made in court at his second conviction will appear next month. An account of Douglas Gordon Maitland's stand will appear also. Likewise an essay on real Absolutism by John Morley.

The women members of the Newcastle Group have not only stood loyally by the menfolk, but have also witnessed by going to prison. Imprisoned women comrades include Constance Bolam, the first woman C.O. to be imprisoned, Doris Philipson and Kitty Alexander, the first women to be prosecuted for refusing to attend a MOLNS interview, and for declining to register, respectively. The present roll of honour is seven; at one period it was ten, and the names of all comrades in prison are read out together with a few words to include all pacifists both in and out of prison who are doing their utmost for pacifism, at a specific time during each meeting—4.30 at Sunday afternoon meetings during the winter, and at 8 p.m. on Mondays during the Summer. This communion is shared by the members inside prison and by all absent friends at these especial moments.

Activities in addition to normal indoor meetings, consist of the current open air meetings in connection with the P.P.U. Negotiated Peace Campaign, and in the past campaigns have been held protesting against the maltreatment of the non-combatant C.O.s at Dingle Vale, Liverpool, during 1940; the defence of Stuart Morris as general secretary of the P.P.U. was warmly maintained by all members of the group; whilst an ever vigilant stand is made against war and conscription in any form.

The younger members have an additional weekly meeting during the winter, when the "Under Forty" club meet at the home of Harry and Constance Wood,

WRITTEN IN 1914

EDITOR'S ANTI-WAR DECLARATION THAT WAS APPLAUDED BY WILL LAWTHER THE NOW PRO-VANSITTART MINERS' LEADER.

In another column we reproduce Will Lawther's 1912 attack on miners' leader, in particular Mr. John Wilson, M.P., for many years the Durham leader. Lawther was then a working miner. To-day he is the Durham miners' leader and has outdistanced John Wilson. In 1914, when the first world war occurred, he was still a working miner. And he was opposed to war. The following editorial was approved by him. We reproduce that all may see what Will Lawther, the working miner, approved, as opposed to Mr. William Lawther, the miners' leader, who upholds Vansittartism and war for unconditional surrender, forgetting that the common people in all countries have a social power with which, finally, to overthrow Fascism and Nazism, and so establish a world Socialist Commonwealth.

The following editorial was written and published by us in The Spur, December 1914, Vol. I, No. 7, pp. 55-56. It defined our position in 1914. It defines our position to-day.

A CALL TO MANHOOD

Many Socialists have left these shores for America, to escape service in Kitchener's Army. It is said that some Irish Nationalists are doing the same. Such conduct must cease. Every opponent of modern murder must stand firm in face of danger. No friend of freedom must seek a refuge across the Herring Pond. It is cowardice to run away at such a time.

Let every man's conscience and information guide his destiny. The one cannot, and the other should not, lead to America. If you believe the war to be just, you will march—without conscription, unless your work at home is as serviceable to the end in view as any you could accomplish on the field of battle. To fight, in this event, is your bounden duty. If you do not believe the war to be just—you will not march, even under conscription. No man must shoulder a rifle against his conscience. No man can be forced to point one against his will. There is no call to fire a shot, if your reason bids you refrain from killing your fellow-man. It is murder of the worst description to do battle with him whom you feel to be your fellow-victim of a monstrous conspiracy of assassin interest. Knowing OR deeming killing to be unjust, you must not slay. Decide then your destiny, accordingly as you believe in the war or not. Decide as becomes a citizen NOT a slave. Stand firm in that decision, no matter how incessant the clamour of the world without. The kingdom of your allegiance is within you. Be no coward.

All who believe in brotherhood to-day, all who would dethrone the demon of sudden death, the moloch of mammon and militarism, are the salt of the earth. See to it that the salt preserves its savour. Never was such salt more in demand. Never was the supply so poor, the quality so inferior.

Display resolution. Do not quake. Fearlessly, proclaim the truth that is in you. Let the light of wisdom be seen by all men. Stand firm against the division of mankind into conflicting death-traps. Declare the world to be your country, assert the brotherhood of man, and hold that it is better to be destroyed rather than to destroy. Seek not to save your life, only to lose your soul. Preserve your soul's integrity, at the expense, if needs be, of your life. Be a man—not a subject.

Not only can you be ordered to repel invasion, you may be bullied into foreign service. Or again, you can be called upon to suppress riot and rebellion—to murder your own kith and kin. That is your duty to King and Country. Consider well the issue thus presented to your mind. Let your reason pronounce its verdict, and do not shrink from acting upon its recommendation. Reason is the mark of manhood. But the mark of Cain is that of the brute. Comrades, be men!

Some of our friends suggest maiming their limbs to evade the responsibility of pronouncing judgment. Do no such thing. Keep your limbs intact. Let the whole body, the complete man, pledge its strength not to fight. To maim the body is to corrupt the soul. If maiming come, let the Government be the assassin, because it fears integrity; let your life be the measure of its guilt, not your limb the price of your cowardice. Be of good faith.

A just war cannot be waged unjustly. If you believe the war to be just, if you back your belief with the offer of your life, then see to it that your near and dear ones are treated justly. See that justice is done to your comrade's unmarried wife. But ah!—justice under capitalism. We would not have you weep. We must not incite to revolution. Our aim is not to scatter incitement, only to plead with all men to act from principle. The woman who has lived with the soldier is prosecuted should she claim to be in law what she is in fact, a wife. She is seeking to obtain money by fraud. But the gun-trust share-holder, bank director, and politician who affirms his poverty to secure a state-pension, is honoured as a patriot. His declaration is but a matter of form. The ruling class of Europe is waging a just war, an honourable war. Its apostles are all honourable men, and we would not that the stones should rise and mutiny. We would that that good world citizen, the Socialist, should remain loyal to his internationalism, however. Freedom has a greater call upon his devotion than the desolation now being prosecuted in Europe. His outlook as a man must not be purchased by his price as a commodity. It were contemptible to be a hireling. It were an insult to accept the hire. Meanness is not manliness.

Prove no coward. Be no slacker. Our mother, Earth, would have us heal her wounds. Our sister, Liberty, would have us be her champion. Both bid us be clean in our manhood, upright in our dealings. They call us from tradition and from prophecy, from the dreamland of past and future, to stern realities that are, to the living world of to-day. Never mind the philosopher who drank hemlock, the prophet who died on the cross. Think not of the world that will be, whose beauty will have had for its manure the martyred persons of the sages and heroes that have been, and are to be. Our sires have died for truth. Our children will do as they have done. Shall we do less? Belongs cowardice to our generation alone of the generations of men. If not, then let us welcome the modern equivalent of hemlock and crosses, so long as our testimony avails the cause of Liberty and brings relief to our Mother Earth.

It is we who are the chosen sons of men, the children of our sires. We did not fight yesterday. We shall not create to-morrow. But we must discharge our filial obligations to-day. King capital rejoices to have our common mother chained. Her fetters must be removed. The tears of sorrow must give place to those of gladness. Smiles and laughter must abound where to-day weeping is made manifest. Here, in the shambles of Europe duty has appointed to each of us our tasks. They permit of no shirking.

Man was destined for a nobler end than the feeding of cannon. Yet death were chosen well, when all ways of living truthfully are closed to us. Life may offer us many pleasing fancies, to lure away from the narrow path of destiny. Their rejection, and the choosing of death, are decreed still by every canon of honour. The life we owe to nature must be sacrificed to the mistress of every freeman's idolatry.

We feel our personal impotence at this juncture. But we know something of what is needed. The fires of battle must be put out. No less is demanded by the mothers of Europe. The fire-brigade is recruited from the workers. They may spread the flames—they can extinguish them.

For our part, we pledge our refusal to participate in this blood-shed under any circumstances. May be, not always with a smile, but certainly with such minimum determination as is necessary, we shall resist any and every government assault on our neutrality. And we shall seek no refuge in flight.

Our place is at home. Our duty to the red-flag is to remain under the threatening shadow of the Union Jack, until the crisis is past. Our greetings, comrades, to liberty. Our love, comrades, to all mankind. Our duty to Mother Earth. We must stand firm for peace and sanity at all cost. It is the cause which has the first and last call on our manhood. Let us hearken to its bidding, and respond without fear to its demand. Every man of us must be as true as steel, as firm as iron. To retain our manhood, let us not fear to lose our lives.

to encourage younger members to speak and put their case.

The secretary of the War Resisters is Frank Gillender and his sister Alma is "Peace News" distributor. Two members serve on the P.P.U. National Council—John Morley and Frank Maitland, the latter as local area representative, and both are also on the P.P.U. Negotiated Peace Committee.

The motto of the group is "The highest morality is the greatest expediency," and although the absolutist attitude is stressed throughout, an open forum is maintained, to which exponents of the "alternativist" position and even the war supporter are invited to speak, where together with all visitors, they will be assured of a critical, but nevertheless a keen and kindly audience. Nobody could attend any function of the War Resisters without being impressed by their solidarity, their warm fellowship, and their burning desire to end the war and conscription.

A REFORMED MONEY SYSTEM DESIRABLE

An Answer to J. Craig, showing that Money Reform is not a "Red Herring."

By THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Mr. Craig's summary of certain of the points in my speech at Motherwell is a not unfair one, with the following reservations. Banks preserve the system which yields them such lucrative rewards—and gives them so much power—not merely by creating and destroying credit and manipulating interest rates, but by refusing to allow money to be created for any purpose save the making of loans: the buying of securities (by banks); and the buying of gold.

Slumps and booms are certainly caused by the deliberate action of the banks in conjunction with a foolish money system which makes no systematic provision for making up the shortage of consumer purchasing power indirectly due to investment; and which does not recognise the right of the average man to an adequate income not obtained by taxing other people, unless he can get a paid job.

A boom is caused by financiers creating large sums of new money by bank loans, for the sake of the interest on those loans. A time, however, comes when the boom has made many industrialists so prosperous that they show a tendency to become independent of loans and finance their businesses out of their own capital. This is a signal to the financiers that they must be brought to heel even if the process of bringing them to heel involves some temporary loss of interest-profits. Many remaining loans are called in and the money represented by the principal of the loans is destroyed. Securities are sold by the banks and the money so obtained is also destroyed. This destruction of money quickly produces its effect. Consumers have less money for buying goods and because loans are refused, would-be producers are unable to carry on. In the ensuing slump the money-creating moneylender reasserts himself when at length he again decides to bestow his favours on his subdued and disciplined clients.

Mr. Craig makes the common mistake of the orthodox economist (strange company, surely, for a Socialist reformer?) when he calls the alternation of boom and slump a "natural" feature and not the work of financiers. But what has "Nature" got to do with it?

Mr. Craig accounts for the coming of the slump by saying that, owing to the increasing use of labour-saving devices in the face of competition, the average rate of profit has a tendency to fall. But why does the average rate of profit tend to fall? Simply because our silly pre-machine age, out-of-date maxim "No work, no income," coupled with a money system which only allows money to be created for bank loans, bank purchases of securities and bank purchases of gold will not allow money to be created and issued on the Social Credit National Dividend plan to enable people put out of work by the labour-saving devices to continue as effective and adequate purchasers of goods. If they were enabled to continue as adequate and effective customers why should "the average rate of profit" tend to fall because of labour-saving devices? The fact that investment causes a shortage of consumer purchasing power has nothing whatever to do with profit. It would happen under a non-profit system if workers in an established industry chose to invest part of their wages in setting up a new industry. The reason is that investment in further production puts on the market a new lot of goods from the new industry brought into being by the invested money and you cannot sell those new goods—and all the "old" goods as well—unless you put additional money into consumers' pockets. It is precisely this creation of new non-debt money issued direct to consumers to enable them to buy new goods (the result of investment setting up new industries), that our present money system does not allow. The wage reductions Mr. Craig refers to are only a reflection of the money-starvation of consumers. The industrialist normally only reduces wages because his sales are falling off owing to the poverty of his customers though of course, in the long run the "remedy" aggravates the general disease for which, however, the financier and the politician and not the industrialist, are primarily to blame. I have never denied that in theory you could do away with money in a Socialist state peopled by socially-minded individuals. I only say that in the world of reality where so many people of all classes are anything but socially-minded, a reformed money-system is a desirable half-way house to Utopia and not a red herring!

Mr. Craig's 'coupon' plan is thoughtful and interesting, but his coupons are themselves only a form of money with certain new qualifications and even he would, I take it, insist on having enough coupons and also insist on recipients not having to borrow the coupons and pay interest on them!

I do not think that the mere fact that Mr. Craig's 'money' lost its value after a period would prevent it from possessing a certain "bribery" value while still effective. Until the forces of education and religion have redeemed humanity it will always be possible to "buy" a man, more or less, by offering him a rare and coveted article or experience which, with or without money, you have the power to bestow. Under a reformed money system combined with an enlightened social system which increased production to the maximum and distributed money claims on that production in a fair and enlightened manner, the evil of human "purchase" would, however, be reduced to a minimum.

EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK

Many readers wrote expressing their appreciation of the article, "Prisoners at the Bar," published in these columns for May last. This particular issue was circulated widely in Norfolk and Suffolk by an Anglican cleric who had been a prison chaplain, but resigned his appointment from horror at the indignities of the prison system. Many found readers in Norwich. A solicitor there sent us a list of addresses to which to send the paper at his expense. He also asked that copies be sent to Clerks to the Court in several parts of Britain, with the "Prisoners" article marked. Our solicitor friend was much impressed with the account of the stand made by Maurice Healy, not then K.C., against Mr. Justice Horridge, in defending the "Prisoner at the Bar," in February, 1922, and the discussion of the status of the accused person in Court, by Mr. Albert Lieck. Mr. Healy received the paper, with the long overdue tribute, on his deathbed.

As a commentary on the article, the following news item from the Daily Mirror, London, for Wednesday, September 15, makes interesting reading:—

NOW ALL SIT FOR JUSTICE

Instead of standing in the dock guarded by a burly policeman people charged at Norwich City Police Court will in future sit in the body of the court room in the fifteenth century Guildhall while their cases are tried.

Only in "special circumstances" will the dock be brought back. In other words if defendants behave like law-abiding citizens they will be treated as such.

The Norwich City Bench is believed to be the third oldest in the country after London and Bristol. Its complete record dates from 1280 and the Court is believed to have been sitting in 1194.

Mr. R. H. Mottram, the author, who is one of the magistrates, told the "Daily Mirror" yesterday:

"Although we are one of the most ancient in the country we are a progressive Bench.

"The days when accused persons had to be caged up and closely watched by four policemen are dead.

"A person is innocent of a charge until found guilty, so why should he suffer the embarrassment and humiliation of having to stand in a dock?"

The Chief Constable of Norwich, Mr. J. H. Dain, has expressed entire agreement with the magistrates' decision.

The Edinburgh Evening News, in its issue for September 9, had some unkind things to say about the Duke of Bedford, because of his opposition to war and conscription.

Our contemporary wrote:—

DUCAL SPEAKER

I see that at the Cosmo Cinema, Glasgow, on Sunday afternoon, the Duke of Bedford will be the principal speaker at a meeting of the No-Conscription League.

At this stage of events I must confess it "gars me grue" rather to read of the No-Conscription League's continued existence. Judging by its name, this pacifist organisation doesn't know yet there's a war on.

OUTSPOKEN

In recent years the 54-year-old Duke of Bedford has carried on an active pacifist campaign from his Scottish seat, Cairnsmore, Newton Stewart, although he rarely appears on a public platform.

His campaign was denounced in the House of Lords on one occasion by Lord Simon, the Lord Chancellor, in language more outspoken than is usually heard in that august chamber.

"I have informed myself of some of the Duke of Bedford's opinions," said Lord Simon. "I am afraid I regard these opinions as utterly irresponsible and completely pestilential."

Simon's phrase is sufficiently abusive to be quotable. The speech from which it is taken did not add to his reputation. He made the speech in the House of Lords on Tuesday, November 18, 1941. In the first place, Simon was defending Herbert Morrison's altogether irrelevant and unnecessary reference to the Duke of Bedford in the House of Commons. Simon, replying to Ponsonby, said that he did not doubt that the Duke of Bedford was "high-minded, disinterested, and sincere" but his views were "utterly irresponsible and completely pestilential." These phrases ought not to be said in the same breath. The dual utterance was scarcely worthy of the mind of a Lord Chancellor. History may agree that the Duke of Bedford's views are pestilential. On the other hand history may indict as being pestilential the views advanced by Simon. Who can say? Certainly history will not eulogise the statesmen who wanted to bring Goering to Britain for the Coronation of George VI and later denounced the same Goering in the Houses of Parliament. It was not the Duke of Bedford who visited the Nazi leaders in Germany and invited them to Britain to be his guests. He never offered to put them up during the Coronation. All this was done by men who pose to-day as great servants of the State and enemies of Nazism.

We suppose that Simon was not expressing "utterly irresponsible and pestilential" opinions in December, 1932, when he defended Japan's seizure of Manchuria. Then there is the press photograph picture of Simon, Eden, and Hitler, taken and published in March, 1935. Simon is hardly the man to pride himself on his sense of responsible utterance.

Punch ridiculed the Lord's speech in its "impressions of Parliament" in its issue for November 26, 1941. Our contemporary's parliamentary reporter declared that "Alice herself, after all her adventures in the Land-in-Rabbit-Hole might have been surprised had she strayed into either House this week."

The parliamentary impressionist added:—

There in the Lords to-day was the Liberal Lord Chancellor, wigged and silken-gowned, standing by the side of the Woolsack and giving a Conservative Noble Duke a right royal telling-off—all in the silkiest, most judicial tones. . . .

And sitting on the Independent Labour benches was a Noble Baron who had defended the Noble Duke against the words of a Labour Home Secretary in "Another Place."

Complicated enough for the Mad Hatter himself. . .

A week or two back Mr. Herbert Morrison, Home Secretary, defending his action in refusing an exit permit for an M.P. to visit Ireland, had mentioned the Duke of Bedford in none too flattering terms.

Lord Ponsonby (in spite of an expressed fear of the prison bars for himself) complained of these remarks, which he said were in bad taste and Gestapo-like in their implications.

Lord Simon, on the Woolsack, and therefore bound to be impartial, listened with courteous, mask-like face. Then he rose, and taking the two paces to the left (of course with a small "I") that turn him from the impartial Speaker of the Lords into the very effective partisan of the Government, as a Minister, he bowed to Lord Ponsonby. That seemed to be the equivalent of the boxers' handshake, for next moment Lord Ponsonby was staggering under a shower of oratorical blows.

Blandly smiling, Lord Simon said he wished to say nothing against the Duke of Bedford—whose opinions however he found "utterly irresponsible and completely pestilential." Anyway, the Home Secretary had been both right and correct in his words and actions.

We do not think that a wise columnist would recall such an incident. Clearly, the Duke of Bedford was not to blame for the discussion. Herbert Morrison and Simon were both in the wrong.

Morrison's attack in the Commons on Tuesday, October 21, made big headlines. His reference to the Duke conveyed the impression that the Duke intended to apply for a passport to go to Ireland. This was untrue.

House of Commons Reports, for November 20, 1941, contained the following question and answer:—

DUKE OF BEDFORD (TRAVEL TO IRELAND).

Sir W. Smithers asked the Home Secretary what were his reasons for forbidding the Duke of Bedford to visit Eire?

Mr. H. Morrison: The Duke of Bedford has not, in fact, applied for an exit permit for the purpose of travelling to Ireland since February 1940, but as I explained during the Debate on the 21st October last, I should not feel justified in granting an exit permit to him if he applied for one. I do not think it would be right to give any facilities for travel to Ireland to a person who propagates views described by the Lord Chancellor as "utterly irresponsible and completely pestilential."

Morrison's reference served the purpose of starting a huge press campaign. Here are some descriptions culled from the British newspapers on October 23, 1941:—

"Our No. 1 Cassandra." (meaning the Duke of Bedford).

"An unrepentant prophet of woe."

"No sunny Jimmy. The Duke cannot be called encouraging. You couldn't say he radiates sunshine."

"Much curiosity has been aroused by Mr. Herbert Morrison's somewhat cryptic allusions to the Duke of Bedford."

"The strange misguided peer."

The Glasgow Evening News, for October 24, wrote:—

Duke of Bedford who has been giving voice to very individual views of the war, is a man with a very individual philosophy of life.

West Africa, London, for October 25, published the following note from its Parliamentary Correspondent, under the caption "Freedom of M.P.s curbed"—

Lest the Coast Colonies think that all repressive legislation starts and ends in the Colonial Empire, let it be here recorded that under the Defence Regulation the Home Secretary can restrain in Britain, even Members of both Houses. This week he named two, one in each House, namely, Mr. McGovern and the Duke of Bedford.

This led some Members, anxious about freedom and rights to liken the Home Secretary and his Staff to Hitler and his gang. Nothing, of course, could be further from the truth and the Home Secretary and Prime Minister were prompt to correct that unhappy impression—which should never have been given expression.

The Star, London, same date, in its "Star Man's Diary" wrote:—

Two more peace pamphlets by the Duke of Bedford—inaddition to the one entitled "What a Game," to which I was the first to draw attention, in this column two days ago—have been brought to the notice of the Home Secretary.

As to NO-Conscription being reprehensible, part of the Anti-Socialist propaganda in which the Edinburgh Evening News used to engage in former days, consisted of horror at Socialism because it would involve State Conscription. And now, the Tory Capitalists applaud such Conscription, and their mean legal and press apologists hate the people who defend civil liberty against such bureaucratic oppression. Unless conscription is opposed, civil liberty will not survive the war, and all mankind will be enslaved from the cradle to the grave.

At the very moment when the Edinburgh Evening News was publishing this stupid attack on the Duke of Bedford, the conscription issue was blowing up. Within less than a week the Nottinghamshire Miners went on strike, to the tune of about 15,000, as a protest against the imprisonment of a young man named Page, who refused to work underground. Notts enjoys the reputation of having been always the sleepiest spot of all mining areas. Northumberland miners were threatening the same action on similar grounds. In Lanarkshire and Fifeshire the "Communist" stooges blamed the unrest on Anarchists, the I.L.P., and the Duke of Bedford.

The South Wales papers, on September 13, reported that Arthur Horner had been heckled at a Communist meeting because he had criticised the strikers at Penrhiwceibr. The men are furious that they are paying Horner for championing the Russian bureaucracy instead of the South Wales miners. This is, indeed, enlightening.

Perhaps the Duke of Bedford, like Rhys Davies, M.P., has a clearer understanding of the working class reaction to conscription, than the scribe in the Edinburgh Evening News, and the more time-serving Labour careerists in the Commons.

In reply to Mr. Rhys Davies, M.P., the following appeared in the official records of the House of Commons for the 14th October, 1943, from Mr. E. Bevin, Minister of Labour:

Up to August 31st, 1943, the total number of workers prosecuted in England and Wales for offences that were not punishable before the outbreak of War was:—

Women—3,067.

Of these, 1,255 men and 199 women were sentenced to imprisonment.

Mr. William Quin, Deputy Regional Commissioner for Scotland, in his "Scottish Notebook" in the Glasgow Sunday Mail, for September 5, makes the following reference to Mark Starr.

The Ministry of Information arranged for me to meet an American visitor last week. He turned out to be Mark Starr, one-time South Wales author and educationist.

Mr. Starr is now the Educational Director for the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, one of the most powerful Trade Unions in America. . . .

He is over here on a visit to meet representative people with the job of gathering data to educate his Union members on the need for close co-operation between U.S.A. and this country in the post-war period.

It was impossible to picture Mark Starr as a war-time traveller for capitalist imperialism, seeking to perpetuate the status quo, without recalling our 1916 anti-war activity in Wales, just prior to our arrest for resisting military service. Our addresses were reported at length in the Merthyr Pioneer and make better and more valuable reading to-day than when reported. Mark Starr fell foul of our contributions and wrote as a received authority on Marx—a man who was an authority on the workers' struggle and must not be questioned.

We reprint a letter published in The Pioneer April 16, 1916:

ALDRED AND MARX

(To the Editor of the "Pioneer")

Dear Sir,—Ioan's letter, in the "Pioneer" of the 8th inst., relates that Mr. Guy A. Aldred claims Marx as an Anarchist. A study of Marx's works refutes that claim. Quotations cannot do justice to the theories attached to his name, and where he disagreed with many of his contemporaries was the fact that he believed in a Socialism which would not be a graft upon present society, but would grow naturally out of it. In his materialist conception of history he showed the ruling class in every age producing its own gravediggers.

In your report, upon another page, Mr. Aldred bemoans that "we are more concerned with the vote catcher and Trades Unionism than with real Labour emancipation and Socialism." It is our lack of concern about our Trade Unions he should bewail, for in them lies our emancipation; they are the basis of the future society. Marx saw the failure of the Labour conditions in their guerilla warfare of "a fair day's wage for a fair day's work," but "the abolition of the wage system" is a different proposition. The Socialist should not be driven by the present conditions to wish to take a leap into the dark. The industrial union provides him with an opportunity to first learn to control his own organisation, and finally control and own the industry, thus avoiding State Socialism, which by buying out the present owners would create a large body of bond-holders, and the "servile State."—Yours, etc.,

MARK STARR.

And so to-day, Mark Starr tours for the M.O.I.! Well, Well!!

TO THE READER.

Last month, Councillor Earl appealed for support for our deficit fund. Since the cost of printing is rising, and we carry no paid advertising, continuous support from those who feel the urge of the struggle is necessary. We may have to increase the price of the paper. Many of our contemporaries have increased their price. We are reluctant to do so. A conditional offer of help came from London. We have hesitated to accept or make it known, largely because we were jealous of the space needed, and wanted to concentrate on the factual propaganda. We believe this to be the best paper in the movement and we aim to improve it. We work under the pressure of one very large debt that we wish to clear. So we ask every comrade who can to make a special effort. Address your support to: THE STRICKLAND PRESS, 104 George St., Glasgow, C.1.

FABIAN COLONIAL CONFERENCE.

The public conference organised by the Sheffield Fabian Society in conjunction with the Fabian Colonial Bureau on "The Colonies and the Future," at the Victoria Hall, Sheffield, on Saturday, October 9, was an outstanding success. It was attended by 210 people, including 87 delegates, representing 41 organisations. Reports of the excellent speeches made by J. F. Horrabin, John Carter and Rita Hinden will appear in our next issue.

CAT AND MOUSE

DUKE OF BEDFORD'S MOTION.

Since delivering his famous speech in the House of Lords on the treatment of conscientious objectors the Duke of Bedford has made a close investigation of the continued "cat and mouse" treatment of many objectors. As a result, the Duke is to call attention in the House of Lords to the continuation of cat-and-mouse treatment of conscientious objectors, with special reference to practices which deprive them of the measure of protection which, under the National Service Acts, it is intended they should receive.

EXECUTION DEFENDED.

Litvinov admitted the execution and attempted to defend it in the following letter addressed to Mr. William Green, of the A.F.L.:—

EMBASSY OF THE SOVIET UNION,
WASHINGTON, D.C.

February 23, 1943.

Dear Mr. Green,

I am informed by Mr. Molotov, People's Commisar of Foreign Affairs, of the receipt by him of a telegram signed by you concerning two Soviet citizens, Alter and Erlich.

I am instructed by Mr. Molotov to inform you of the following facts:

For active subversive work against the Soviet Union and assistance to Polish intelligence organs in armed activities, Erlich and Alter were sentenced to capital punishment in August, 1941.

At the request of the Polish Government, Elrich and Alter were released in September, 1941.

However, after they were set free, at the time of the most desperate battles of the Soviet troops against the advancing Hitler army, they resumed their hostile activities including appeals to the Soviet troops to stop bloodshed and immediately to conclude peace with Germany.

For this they were rearrested and, in December, 1942, sentenced once more to capital punishment by the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court. This sentence has been carried out in regard to both of them.

Yours sincerely,
Ambassador MAXIM LITVINOV.

THE DESCENT OF MAN

MASS ARRESTS OF POLISH SOCIALISTS.

Erlich and Alter were arrested by the Soviet authorities late September, 1939, a few days after the Red Army entered Eastern Poland —Erlich at the railway station of Brzesc (Brest Litovsk), Alter at Kowel.

Litvinov's letter was meant to create the impression that both Alter and Erlich had been arrested on a definite charge. The truth is that they were detained along with thousands of other Polish citizens, especially Socialists and trade unionists.

Close upon the heels of the U.S.S.R. army which occupied Polish territory in September, 1939, followed many detachments of the N.K.W.D., the political police of Soviet Russia (formerly the "G.U.P.") Immediately mass arrests were made among all classes of the population of Poland. Especially great numbers of arrests were made among the Polish Labour leaders, belonging to the Polish Socialist Party and to the Jewish "Bund." The arrests began on September 20th, three days after the Soviet army had entered Poland. The town councillors, members of the committees of the local Socialist parties, members of the trade union executives, organisers of working-class peasant youth were arrested.

Among these were Erlich and Alter.

The way in which the arrests were made was typical. In the houses, where the arrests took place, not only the men whom the police had come to fetch were arrested but everybody who was in the house with them. In Wilno, for instance, the police entered the house of an old active "Bund" leader, Zeleznikov, who had been exiled to Siberia in the time of the Czar, in order to arrest him. Quite accidentally they found there also a man named Rosenstein employed in the sanatorium for working-class children named Wladyslaw Medem. This man, who had fled from Warsaw and the Germans, they also arrested. He was sentenced to the labour camp where he met his death.

Also in Wilno, the Secret Soviet police came to arrest a well-known Socialist leader, a lawyer named Tajtell. But they found there a refugee from Warsaw, a well-known trade unionist and Socialist, who had spent years in Czarist prisons—H. Himelfrab. They took him along and sentenced him to eight years in the camps.

It proved quite impossible to intervene with the examining magistrate or the public prosecutor. The wife of one of the arrested men, Mrs. G., was told by the examining magistrate:—

You have funny women here. In our country, in Russia, when the husband is arrested the wife sues for divorce and looks for another one. But here you come along pleading and begging, which can, after all, only result in your being sent away also.

CONFESSIONS OF A "COMMUNIST."

(Suggested by an anonymous leaflet now circulating in London, entitled "Confessions of a British Stalinist.")

I call myself a Communist;
A skunk by any other name would smell the same,
But I know the attraction of the term,
Although its meaning puts my lies to shame.

I have renounced as crudely vain
The independence of my mind, and so opine
That black is white when tactics so demand
In loyalty to Stalin—this is the party line.

Fretting within my head are words,
A stock of undigested slogans which I shout,
Accustomed well to discipline,
My party leaders deem "the comrades" but a throng,
To give praise unceasing, without stint
To all that Moscow stands for—"right" but wrong.

My party is the Kremlin,
In that political machine I am a cog,
I do not pause to ask the pros and cons
Of twisting lies to form a blinding fog.

"Power to the Party" is my guide;
My strength lies chiefly in my tongue which with a lie
Can so urge unity for doubtful ends
That all the workers' cause in knots I tie.

I am a British Stalinist,
I have to chop and change my views from left to right,
But though the sides so very swiftly change,
For Moscow's aims, I tell you all to fight.

LET'S HONOUR THOSE WHO MAKE OUR SONGS.

Let's honour those who make our songs,
The lowly bards who know our joys,
Who know our cares, and weave a tune
To ease our hearts, and light our eyes,
A heart without a song to sing,
Oh, what a desert it would be,
And yet so many of our bards
Have wept in sorry poverty.

Shame on us that have no more soul
That starve the heart that makes our songs!
What hope for humankind to right
The many cruel, bitter wrongs
That wreck the world, if we respect
The hollow pride that Wealth can show,
Yet see not in the bard a king
Whose glory we may never know?

SIR THOMAS MOORE M.P.

"COMMUNIST" PARTY'S NAZI APOLOGIST PET

Sir Thomas Moore, M.P. for Ayr Burghs since 1925, was exposed in "The Word" for August and September, 1940. A few copies of these issues can be obtained still and ought to be read and circulated by our readers at the present. The two papers will be sent, post-free, so long as the stock lasts, to any address for sixpence.

In the August, 1940, issue we indict Lt.-Col. Moore, M.P., as one of the Tory M.P.s who must resign. He was a member of the Anglo-German Fellowship and a supporter of the notorious Nazi "Anglo-German Review." This paper defended Hitler's claims to Lithuania, Czecho-Slovakia, and Austria.

In the September, 1940, issue we quoted at length from Sir Thomas Moore's essay in the "Daily Mail" for April 25, 1934, entitled: "The Blackshirts Have What the Conservatives Need." We also reproduced from the "Sunday Dispatch" his article urging the return of the German colonies and the strengthening and developing of German power in Africa.

Secure these two issues of "The Word," if you have not seen them, or filed them for reference. Then turn to our contemporary, "The Ayrshire Post," for October 15, 1943. We reproduce from its columns essential passages of its report of an address delivered by Sir Thomas Moore to the Old Cronies Club on Tuesday, October 13, 1943:—

STALIN: REALIST AND CYNIC.
Sir T. Moore and Red Army.

Greater Anglo-Soviet unity was stressed by Lt.Col. Sir Thomas Moore, C.B.E., M.P. for Ayr Burghs, when he delivered the opening address for the winter session of the Prestwick Old Cronies Club in the clubhouse on Tuesday afternoon.

Sir Thomas revealed the interesting fact that he had, at the request of M. Maisky, Soviet Ambassador, become a vice-president of the National Association for Anglo-Soviet-Unity. Mr. J. B. Langlands, president of the club presided. . . .

Dealing with his subject, Sir Thomas said that he had been asked to speak on current topics, and he thought that because of the tremendous victories in Russia, the best and most interesting topic was "Russia and the Red Army." He had spent a considerable time in Russia, and he knew Russia and the Red Army.

Russia, Sir Thomas wanted to make quite clear, was not Communist, whatever else she was. From 1917, when the revolution broke out, until 1922, Communism, undoubtedly, in its purity was observed throughout Russia. Then Lenin, who was a very shrewd man, saw that, although equality was necessary immediately after the revolution, it could not work perpetually because of human nature. Every human individual had ambition and wanted to improve the conditions of those he loved. Lenin realised that they had to give reward according to merit, and so he introduced his New Economic Policy. That was the first break with Communism.

Sir Thomas went on to refer to Stalin's three five-year plans which raised Russia from the state of a vast backward agricultural community to an agricultural and industrial community. During his second plan Stalin saw the red light of danger coming from across the frontier from Germany, and he devoted this plan to making a great military power of Russia. He also realised that Communists would not fight their national brothers, and so he changed the whole theoretical policy of Communism, substituting Nationalism and love of country. That was the reason the Russians were fighting with such force and vigour to-day. He was convinced that the whole of the progress of civilisation depended on the good-will between Russia and ourselves.

NAILS IN NAZI COFFIN.

The mysterious force, the Red Army, where did it come from? asked Sir Thomas. Foreign agents had known nothing of its strength before the war. He had seen it born and had seen its gradual development in Moscow. At the beginning of the last war the Russians were forced to fight, poorly armed and clad, and for three years they progressed to certain destruction. After the war they gave voice to their grievances in the revolution, and the Red Army was born. In the revolution they fought, and held out until they conquered, thus laying the foundation of the all-conquering Red Army we knew to-day. The Russians had two great leaders, Stalin and Lenin. Whatever was thought of their methods they were still great men.

Stalin's third five-year plan drove the first nails into the coffin of Nazism; not quite the first, however, said Sir Thomas, for Hitler himself had driven that home when he attacked Russia on June 22, 1941, starting the most amazing military campaign history recorded. Hitler decided that the Red Army must be destroyed, but Stalin decided that it should not be destroyed. . . .

Speaking of Stalin, Sir Thomas said he was a realist, if ever there was one; a cynic too; a man of great resoluteness of purpose. He had been greatly blamed for his conduct when he took time by the forelock in Finland and Rumania to gain territory to prepare the defences he needed to bring final victory. This was a great man. . . .

Sir Thomas said that before the war he had known Germans whom he thought to be upright, honest people, but when things were going their way every German would participate, and when things went wrong they would welcome our forces as an army of liberation and tell us how much they hated the Nazi regime. (Applause.) The way to deal with the German people after the war was one of the most difficult questions, and he could only tell a story of a Russian officer who had said that we would get to Berlin before the Russians because we had certain advantages in transport, but we should leave Germany to the Russians for a fortnight, and the German problem would be solved. (Laughter and applause.)

Since he praises Stalin for having destroyed Communism and Internationalism, the "Communists" applaud this Tory Blackshirt Apologist! They do not ask what he was doing in Russia, 1918-20; or in Ireland, 1916-18 and again in 1920-23? Was he serving the cause of Socialism and Labour? Was he on the side of James Connolly and Sheehy Skeffington? And why does he wear the orders of St. Anne of Russia, 2nd class and St. Vladimir of Russia, 4th class? These are Czarist orders!

What a gang the "Communists" are!

"CONCHIE."

Refuses to fight, eh? Declares he will NOT?
The fellow's a bounder, sir—ought to be shot!
Thinks bombing is barbarous, warfare a crime,
Parades and saluting and drill, waste of time?

Thinks murder is murder in just the same way,
When it's masses, and not merely one, that we slay?
Calls a man worse than beast who, when ordered to, cuts
A fellow-man's limbs off, or bayonets his guts?

Thinks the slaughter of children is too high a price
For profitable trading in rubber and rice,
And honour and glory are not worth the tears
Of one bereaved mother, nor one sweatheart's fears?

Thinks hatred degrading, and cruelty vile,
The slaughter of men to gain ground, not worth while,
And "stern retribution" a doctrine of vice,
When all who call war's tune must pay the full price?

Thinks maltreatment of women, and torture of men,
Cannot be condoned, nor excused now and then
By phrases like "national security," or
"The steps we must take to continue the war?"

Says unthinking obedience to orders from me,
Right or wrong, without reasoning, question or plea,
Stifling all instincts to follow my plan,
Is degrading the powers that make him a man?

Thinks people like me are a lower type still,
Because we take pay to send others to kill?
I tell you, quite plainly, sir, plainly by Gad,
The fellow's a rotter, an absolute CAD!

IVAN BEUTTLER.

WILL NO ONE SING A SONG?

Will no one sing a song,
Great as the hills, or the sea,
To the men of all nations,
That will shake the dullest of heart
To its very foundations?

That will open our lust-red eyes
Now blind in ignorance,
To the grandeur and glory
Of Life, simple, wond'rous and grand
As a fairy story?

POST-WAR CONDITIONS

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Reports which have been reaching me from a number of independent sources, show a remarkable agreement on the following three points. (1) People are losing interest in the war and many who were once ardent in their pursuit of "victory" are now anxious only that the war should end quickly, provided, of course, that it does not end in our defeat. (2) There is anxiety extending even to political circles as to what the results of a Russian victory may be. (3) There is profound despondency with regard to post-war conditions.

I must confess that I might share in some measure the anxiety as to the possible results of a Russian victory, not, as my "Communist" critics have suggested, because I fear the spread of a movement bringing freedom and justice to the workers; but for the opposite reason, that the Soviet Government, by its political cruelty and tyranny, disregard of the rights of the individual, and tendency to military aggression where national interests have been thought to be at stake, has forsaken the principles of Communism and imitated the defects with which Fascism is usually associated. In saying this, I do not mean to imply that I do not desire the friendliest relations with the Russian people, nor do I even mean to suggest that I do not wish to make the best of the Russian Government and deal with it in all matters honestly and fairly. It is only by making the best of a government, whether Communist or Fascist, that one can render enlightened service to its people; while if a serious crisis does ever develop by reason of the government's misconduct, you can then alienate the sympathy of the people from their government and deprive it of the power to engage in war.

Despondency with regard to post-war conditions is extremely well-founded, assuming that our present political leaders and financial masters are retained. As I pointed out in a recent speech in Glasgow, whatever its final military result may be, the war, as far as the attainment of any of the original idealistic aims is concerned, is already well and truly lost. We have no power, as that organ for the expression of Government opinion, the "Times," has virtually admitted, to prevent Russia from keeping as much Polish territory as she desires, nor, it might be added, can we prevent her, in the event of an Allied victory, from dominating to any extent she wishes other small neighbouring States.

As for the overthrow of Fascism, the ugly features characteristic of Fascism are now firmly established in our own country, and an army of political bureaucrats and planners are making it increasingly clear that, if they have any say in the matter, State tyranny is to remain, even when the war is ended, including, of course, the worst of all forms of State tyranny, military conscription.

The position in the Far East is obscure and may be distinctly awkward in more senses than one. If it should be true that Japan (doubtless in return for important trading rights) has granted independence to Burma, the Phillipines, etc., Britain and America may find themselves fighting to re-impose upon those countries an alien rule in defiance of the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

The Morganthau Plan; the defects and omissions in the Keynes Plan and Beveridge Scheme; the policy and personnel of AMGOT; the evasive answers given by Chancellors of the Exchequer when questioned by Members of the House of Commons who favour monetary reform; the sending of gold by the American Government to China; and the conversation of prominent American financiers and business men; all point to the fact that after the war the tyranny of "sound" finance and Big Business is to be re-established, with its necessary accompaniment of poverty in the midst of potential plenty—a poverty brought about by the restriction of the money supply in the interests of money-creating money-lenders, and by interference with foreign trade in the interests of currency buyers and speculators.

The post-war economic prospects in Britain are not made too rosy by the loss of our foreign investments and most of our export trade—a loss which may make it extremely difficult to secure adequate imports for our over-populated islands. If the American Government insists on our depleting our limited supply of home products by exporting goods to pay for Lease-lend war consignments, our position may be grim indeed. Personally, if I were Prime Minister, I should not be very accommodating if such a demand were pressed after the cessation of hostilities. I am the last person to wish to defraud any ordinary American citizen or inflict hardship upon him by failure to repay a straight-forward loan; these war debts, however, are not straightforward loans and I can well remember the nonsense that was talked after the last war and the unjust resentment which financiers on the other side of the Atlantic stirred up against us in order to hide the shortcomings of their policy from their own people. Apart from the fact that the American Government was more than anxious to enter this war, and might therefore, one would have thought, very well treat as a gift all help given to a hard-pressed ally, it will be within its power, when the war has ended, to bestow upon American citizens many times the volume of goods that we could send as exports, by the simple process of re-forming its money system and developing the vast natural resources of U.S.A. to the full. When the last bill for munitions has been met a few weeks or a few months after the end of the war, there is no reason why we, or the American people either, should have to continue to pay for the war either in goods or money, and if any attempt is made to force such payment, it will be by reason of another financiers' racket. If American citizens should again be tempted to resent Britain's alleged failure to repay a "debt of honour," let them look nearer home for the true source of any economic hardships that may seem to threaten them: they need not look in vain!

Yes, there is certainly cause for anxiety about post-war conditions; indeed, if things are allowed to continue on the same old lines, there would seem no hope at all. But need they so continue? The way to a brighter future is still clear, if only men would take it. A negotiated peace in which Britain, America, Russia, Germany, Italy and Japan all recognised that they had a share of war guilt, and, frankly admitting their common failings, agreed to abandon the domination of other races and pledged themselves to treat their neighbours as they themselves would like to be treated; a peace in which the Allies, in the interests of their own peoples no less than in those of the peoples of other countries, threw off the shackles of orthodox finance and really co-operated with other countries in developing to the full the world's resources, distributing them according to human need; then out of black darkness might come a new dawn and out of despair, a hope for all mankind.

SUNDAY MEETINGS, 11 a.m.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

The following news items tell their own story.

Glasgow "Bulletin," Monday, November 1, 1943:—

DUKE'S CALL TO MINERS

Addressing a working-class audience of over 700 in the Burnbank district of Hamilton last night, the Duke of Bedford who was accompanied by Mr. Guy Aldred, Glasgow, outlined the main points in his programme for a new social order after the war.

The people ought to begin now to organise themselves, he said, with a view to bringing pressure to bear on their Parliamentary representatives and they should set about agitating immediately for a reform of our existing monetary system.

Glasgow "Evening Citizen," November 2, 1943:—

TO PLEAD FOR MINERS

The Duke of Bedford is to plead in the House of Lords for better conditions for Scottish miners. He visited the Lanarkshire coalfield and discussed with the miners questions of wages, housing and holidays and promised his support in urging reforms.

In Glasgow, the duke interviewed a large number of people, particularly on pensions questions, and promised he would do everything possible to remove anomalies.

"Daily Worker," London, November, 5. 1943:—

MINERS DENY TALKS WITH DUKE

"Daily Worker" Reporter

The Lanarkshire Miners' Union have issued a denial of the Press report that conversations take place between the union and the Duke of Bedford on miners' wages, housing and holidays. "All questions of wages and working conditions will be handled by this organisation and not by the Duke of Bedford," it says.

The statement also rejects such claim by the Duke who, together with Guy Aldred, the well-known anarchist, spoke at a meeting at Burnbank, Lanarkshire, last Sunday.

Glasgow "Evening Times," November 4, 1943:—

MINERS SAY DUKE HAS NO MANDATE

Lanarkshire Mineworkers' Union issued a statement last night denying that the Duke of Bedford had any mandate to speak on behalf of local miners.

A report appeared to the effect that the Duke of Beford is to plead in the House of Lords for better conditions for Scottish miners, said the statement.

It was stated that he visited the Lanarkshire coalfield and discussed with miners questions of wages, housing and holidays, and promised support in effecting reforms.

"We of the Lanarkshire Mineworkers' Union wish to state that at no time did any conversations take place between us and the Duke of Bedford. He has no authority from this union to make any such statement. Questions will be decided by this union and not by the Duke of Bedford."

A similar paragraph appeared in the "Daily Record," the same day. The Pearson-Moffatt clique seem worried by the Duke's activities, his mining contacts, and his visits to the proletariat of Lanarkshire.

The "Evening Times," Glasgow, November 8, 1943:—

DUKE AND MINERS

Mr. Guy A. Aldred writes:—"I was somewhat surprised to read the announcement in the "Evening Times" concerning the Mineworkers' Union alleged repudiation of the Duke of Bedford on behalf of the miners of Lanarkshire.

"The facts are simple. Last April the Duke arranged to visit some Anarchist miners in Burnbank and to stay with one. The week before last he stayed with this miner and his wife. He has arranged to go back and to meet a number of miners.

"He never pretended that he was speaking officially for the union. But he has examined and is examining miners' conditions. He has first-hand information. And he has been asked to take up the miners' case in the House of Lords. He intends to do so.

"Surely one does not need to receive a permit from the union to speak as a legislator with authority in the House of Lords."

MOTHERWELL I.L.P. OPEN FORUM,

Meeting in Lesser Town Hall, Motherwell, on Sunday, 19th December, at 6-30 p.m. Speaker, GUY A. ALDRED. Subject, "The Church, The War, and Peace." Questions and Discussion.

All Welcome.

WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX, M.P.

Dear Aldred,

In your sketch of the history of the South Place Ethical Society, you are giving a useful account of the development of an old group from supernaturalism to humanism. The first ministers were Christians of the older Biblical school; the transition period was reached under William Johnson Fox. It is by no means the least useful part of your sketch that you call attention once again to a very remarkable man whose story has been so largely forgotten.

Fox went to Parliament Court Chapel, Bishopsgate, from Chichester and the old South Place Chapel (demolished in 1927) was built for him in 1824. He had become a definite Unitarian and gradually broadened upon this basis. At first, he was a prominent figure in denominational circles and was the first secretary to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Later on, he withdrew from these positions and was in fact put out of the association by his fellow-ministers in London. This act of ostracism was avowedly due to his views on divorce and his separation from Mrs. Fox.

There are just two things to be said about the happening. Fox's views upon divorce were exactly the same as those sponsored by the poet, Milton, whose theological writings the older Unitarians held in high esteem. The conduct of the London ministers was censured by no less a person than James Martineau, then of Liverpool. It is impossible to avoid the feeling that their behaviour was dictated largely both by Fox's political radicalism and his widening theological views.

Fox had come to reject any concept of a specific supernatural revelation; his religion was a thesis which continued to reverence Jesus of Nazareth whilst rejecting the whole cycle of historic Christianity. To compare these views with those of the typical Unitarians of the day, nourished in the Biblicism of the XVIII century, is to see the vast advance which Fox had made in thought. He was an outstanding early exponent of the broadening process in theology of which Martineau and J. J. Hayler were to become distinguished exponents within a few years. Fox's real farewell to South Place was in 1848, when he gave the lectures, "The Religious Ideas." They presuppose by forty years the comparative method and the conclusions of the Hibbert Lectures. The series was an amazing achievement for a man who had not been trained as a pure scholar and who yet proved himself to be a pioneer in these studies.

The decline of parochial life at South Place led Fox to seek wider outside work. He abandoned pastoral visitation as impracticable in a scattered congregation and his growing humanistic views led him both to give up clerical dress and to abandon the title, "the Rev.," though he always retained an elaborate preaching gown in the South Place pulpit.

Moving to Bayswater, he took to journalism in which he made his mark as a radical publicist by such utterances as "The Letters of A Norwich Weaver Boy." As editor of "The Monthly Repository," he published the earliest poems of Tennyson and Browning. He continued to draw large congregations in his Sunday ministrations and South Place became known popularly as "Fox's Chapel." The audience was a distinguished one and many well-known city men made a weekly journey to town with their families in order to hear him.

Taking to politics, he was a prominent speaker for the Anti-Corn Law League and sided with the League against the Chartists. In popular esteem, he was a far better orator than either Cobden or Bright.

Entering the House of Commons when over sixty, and suffering from heart trouble, he yet did useful work as radical M.P. for Oldham, a town where his name is still remembered.

The local elections were fought with every filthy device of which Tories were (and still are) capable; the aid of the publicans was enlisted and Fox's Unitarian views were urged against him by the champions of church and state. Nevertheless, he retained the seat until 1863, the year before his death. When he then lost it, he retired from public life, declaring that he was too old to start again. Dying in 1864, Fox's life was so completely identified with the events of his time that within ten years of his death he was all but forgotten in the London where his name had once been a household word.

Fox is deserving of memory on two grounds. He was a pioneer in theology and his writings in this field are still worth turning over. By rejecting Biblicism and supernaturalism, he opened the way for Unitarianism to pass over into a humanistic culture, the full and lasting potentialities of which it has yet to discover. The road which he carved out was further paved by his famous successor at South Place, Dr. Moncure D. Conway.

Fox was also an eminent radical who really believed in civil and religious liberty as meaning more than ip-service. He championed Richard Carlile and Caroline Brunswick in the name of liberty of thought and action even though disagreeing with their actions.

During the dangerous days of George IV, Fox spoke at the popular London forum in Leicester Fields and risked arrest by so doing. His later work was one long battle for freedom for the common man.

As a warrior for liberty both in religion and in politics, William Johnson Fox should be resurrected from his grave and should be presented as relevant to a very different age. The Strickland Press, through Dr. Brook's studies and your own, has done yeoman service in resurrecting Richard Carlile from oblivion. It should do the same useful service for Fox by sketching his life and reprinting from his numerous writings and sermons.

Fox's works were republished in twelve volumes after his death and the edition was on sale at South Place for some years. The only modern reissue is of his lectures on "The Religious Ideas," which the Lindsey Press reprinted with a biographical preface by Dr. Courteney Kenny of Cambridge but it is now out of print. A valuable life, also out of print, was written of him by Richard Garnett of the British Museum and the Conway Lecture for 1924 by Professor Graham Wallas dealt with his life and work.

It is good to know that, after a lapse of eighty years, Fox's name is still fresh and green at South Place. His immediate successors in the pulpit were mostly failures and the chapel came near to closing. Its work was revived by the American, Dr. Conway, an old graduate of Harvard and friend of Emerson. Conway continued the work where Fox left off; his old forerunner lived to see him in office and the causes for which he had striven continued and strengthened at South Place Chapel. At the last, he had no need to mourn lost countries.

Fox was many things in one lifetime. Preacher and journalist, he did much to assist the passing of the Anti-Corn Law legislation. He was also a prominent popular educationist and strove for early schemes for compulsory education. But an inner consistency and unity was supplied by his strong radicalism which dictated his message in religion, politics and social service. His memory needs to be recalled if only because his message is so necessary at a time when the values for which he stood are in grave danger of defeat at the hands of political reactionaries and vested interests.

Yours sincerely,

F. H. AMPHLETT MICKLEWRIGHT.

ANTI-SEMITISM AND CIVIL LIBERTY

BY C. H. NORMAN

To the Editor of "Civil Liberty."

REGULATION 18B.

I should like to enter the strongest protest against the reactionary character of the terms of the memorandum published in the July-August (1942) issue on Regulation 18B. The whole principle of the indefinite detention of so-called "dangerous people" without trial is justified by the memorandum, which is the very principle that real believers in civil liberty deny. The laws of England (in peace-time, apart from war regulations) are wide enough to cover any real or contemplated offence committed or to be committed by anyone, as was shown noticeably in the cases of Tom Mann and George Lansbury when it was desired to prevent those gentlemen making speeches in peace-time on political subjects.

The whole purpose of Regulation 18B is to relieve the Government of the onus of proving that the persons detained have committed any offence against the law and the Regulations. Why such a power is required when anyone can be proceeded against for anything which does not smell of "patriotism" under the Defence Regulations is beyond comprehension, except on the hypothesis that the Government wish to lock up anyone who is in favour of a negotiated peace, which seems to be the only reason why Sir Oswald Mosley and his wife are being detained, unless one is to assume that anti-Semitism is a criminal offence, which is certainly news to me.

Detention without trial (which has extended over three years in some cases) is a shocking abuse of the law, because, in many cases, had these people been tried and convicted even by war panic-stricken juries and judges, their sentences would hardly have been more than eighteen months for a first offence of a purely political character, mostly only representing acts done, or words spoken, or written before the war. Anti-Semitism is an objectionable state of mind: but it is equally objectionable to uphold legally pro-Semitism as a state of mind. The Jews as a race are no better than other people; in some of their activities they are rather worse. Why people should be indefinitely detained for saying so I fail to understand as being consonant with any belief in the principles of civil liberty.

Yours faithfully,
C. H. NORMAN.

This letter, as perhaps was to be expected of an organisation which parades its faith in freedom of discussion, was not printed. It may be read with convenience in conjunction with a later letter of protest against the attempt by the Council to secure the promulgation of a Regulation designed to making the holding of anti-Semitic opinions a criminal offence, a nice project for a society concerning itself with the protection of opinion to embark upon! The second letter is as follows:—

The Secretary,
The National Council for Civil Liberties.

Dear Madam,—I enclose cheque for 15/- subscription, though I do so with some little hesitation for the following reasons. I am rather anxious at the attitude of the Council on anti-Semitism. That is an objectionable state of mind: but I do not think that pro-Semitism is any remedy for it. Why the Jews should be selected for special protection by law against criticism, I fail to understand. To introduce such a principle into legislation seems to me a retrograde step, certainly not advancing the cause of civil liberty. Anyone who has the knowledge gained in my profession of the activities of the Jews can hardly regard them as proper subjects for legal privilege, any more than Catholics or anybody else should be.

It is a pity that the Council does not consider taking steps concerning the shocking conditions in military detention prisons, civil and penal servitude prisons, internment camps and the various other places where people are detained after or without trial. On these subjects during the war the Council has been remarkably silent, quite unlike its predecessor in the last war, which was very active on these proper matters for their consideration.

Yours faithfully,
C. H. NORMAN.

This letter was sent as a protest against the agitation being promoted by the National Council of Civil Liberties to secure an amendment to the Regulations under the Defence Act for the purpose of making criticism of the Jews under the phrase "promoting racial prejudice," or one wide term of that kind, a criminal offence. This is a most reactionary proposal at bottom and entirely contrary to any principle of freedom of discussion or debate.

FREEDOM AND POST-WAR CONSCRIPTION

BY COUNCILLOR CHARLES A. EARL

YOUR FREEDOM IS IN PERIL—DEFEND IT WITH ALL YOUR MIGHT.

Early in 1942 Dr. Temple, now Archbishop of Canterbury recommended conscription for two generations after the war. This presumably is the Archbishop's interpretation of "freedom of will," with which, the Churches insist, God endowed each of his children.

The Archbishop of course, is over the age for conscription to affect him, and he claims and receives exemption for the clergy, but he evidently thinks it is exhibiting Christian brotherly love to inflict this imposition on future generations. In a few years he will be dead, but his dreadful work may live after him, as a result of which, young people, many not yet born, will spend years of suffering in prison, because they will not tolerate State slavery. This willingness to impose conscription on youth who have never had a voice in the matter, is apparent in most of our over-age parliamentarians, these opportunists and careerists, who prating of freedom and democracy, take to themselves the right to dictate to the masses what shall be their way of life, and it is the so-called Socialists who have been in the forefront to make slaves of the people in this war, e.g., the Labour Party's support of "Vansittartism." How differently they talk now, compared with a few weeks before the outbreak of war, is shown by the following:—

I am quoting from the Labour Party's official "Notes for Labour Party Speakers" for the dates mentioned:—

March 31, 1939.

"Talk of conscription need not be taken seriously. The Labour and Trade Union movements are not prepared to consider it."

April 27th, 1939.

WILLIAM GALLACHER, "COMMUNIST," IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

"No matter what happens in any country, I will stand by the workers of this country and oppose conscription and oppose the Prime Minister."

In the House of Commons on April 27, 1939, the Labour Party moved an amendment of "NO CONFIDENCE" in opposition to the Government's motion for the approval of the conscription policy."

April 28, 1939.

"TRADE UNIONS AND CONSCRIPTION, GOVERNMENT'S BROKEN PLEDGES, LABOUR'S UNCOMPRISING OPPOSITION. The National Council of Labour met on April 25th and reaffirmed its uncomprising opposition to conscription."

CONSCRIPTION.—"Decisions taken by the Special Conference of Trade Union Executives held under T.U.C. auspices last week confirm the parliamentary opposition to conscription conducted by the Labour Party in the House of Commons. The outstanding fact of the Conference was it's declaration of RESOLUTE OPPOSITION TO CONSCRIPTION."

The resolution of the T.U.C. adopted by an overwhelming majority, instructed the General Council in consultation with the Labour Party

"To maintain the utmost vigilance in regard to the administration of the Act and TO OPPOSE ANY ATTEMPT TO MAKE CONSCRIPTION PERMANENT OR TO EXTEND ITS SCOPE."

Ernest Bevin, in "The Record," for May, 1939, made a statement, describing how he had been approached to support conscription. This declaration appeared in "The Word" for July 1941, and need not be quoted again. It is an emphatic denunciation of conscription and an exposure of the flattery employed by the reactionary members of the ruling class in an attempt to persuade Labour leaders to support the industrial, social, and moral slavery that conscription implies.

We all know what great parts in the conscription of the workers Mr. Bevin and Mr. Herbert Morrison have played and how strongly they have been supported by their Tory-Labour colleagues in Parliament. The flattery was apparently effective. And now in view of the recent conscription of women the following statement by Mr. Bevin in December, 1941, is very interesting:

"Some women will be so absolute in their conscientious objection that they will not touch anything associated with war. They will be regarded as absolutionists, and they will not be directed."

Quite so, and women, such as Dr. Kathlean Lonsdale, a mother with three young children, are sent to prison for refusing to touch anything associated with war.

Enough has now been quoted to show how very real the danger of post-war conscription is. Neither the religious leaders, nor the politicians, have learned the lesson, so plain to people with intelligence, which has been borne out so unfailingly as history has been unfolded: viz.:—that standing fighting forces, and fighting equipment, political intrigue and a "what we have we hold" policy, are the sure breeding ground of future wars. On the other hand, they are desperately afraid that the common people may desire to live as brothers and may wish to abolish the competitive and profit-making system, which is largely responsible for war. So that in imposing the bitter pill of conscription for our good, they attempt to sweeten it with Beveridge palliatives. Mr. Herbert Morrison, conscientious objector in the last war, speaking to the Kennington Labour Party on September 30th, 1943, said

"It was obviously impossible and against the rational interest to turn the country into a Socialist Commonwealth all in one piece. It was a task of years, not a week-end picnic."

It is obvious, how extremely little, if any, reliance can be placed in the Labour Party and Trade Union leaders to put up an unswerving opposition to conscription. If our children and grandchildren are to be free citizeans of the world then we must be constantly on the alert and absolutely tireless in our efforts to resist any and every attempt to take our freedom from us. All No Conscription League members and other war resisters must seize every opportunity to point out the danger that overshadows us. Every sort of excuse will be used for putting this conscription law into effect:—"We must have strong fighting forces to prevent another great war." "We must take our part in policing the world." We must have a large army of occupation." "It is a Christian duty to save the world from another terrible upheaval," etc., etc.

It is the avowed intention of the present coalition Government to remain in office for some years after the war ends. Tory, Liberal and Labour all insist on the necessity for this, and presumably the political truce will be observed. This coalition Government hopes that the ordinary people will be so relieved by the ending of hostilities, they will not care what happens, nor who is in power, until awareness is forced upon them by the fact that the freedom for which they had been fighting, for which so much blood had been shed and which they at least thought they had won, had been treacherously stolen from them.

Eternal vigilance is indeed the price of freedom.

CARLILE AND HIS TIMES

"Tit-Bits," founded in 1881, is one of the most orthodox and unthinking journals of our time. Such journals a century to a century-and-a-quarter ago were busy slandering Richard Carlile when they referred to him. Yet our contemporary in its issue for March 26, 1943, published an excellent small picture of Richard Carlile and a short comprehensive article on his life under the heading: "He Fought for our Press Freedom." The essay condemned the statesmen and politicians of Carlile's time but did not mention how they were applauded in the press. We reproduce the essay:

The freedom of the Press, one of the freedoms for which the United Nations are now fighting, is not even in Britain a plant of very long growth. One of the pioneers of the fight for liberty, Richard Carlile, died only a hundred years ago, worn out by poverty and illness caused by frequent imprisonments.

He defied Lord Sidmouth's Gagging Acts, and drove the Press Censor out of Fleet Street. He paid a heavy price; for he served nearly ten years in prison, and died in 1843 at the early age of fifty-two.

In the course of his tempestuous career Carlile edited and published at least eleven newspapers and twenty-four books and pamphlets. Probably most noteworthy of his achievements was his re-publication in 1818 of "The Rights of Man," "The Age of Reason," and other works by Tom Paine, which up to that time had been proscribed.

He was heavily fined and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, but nothing could break his spirit. He continued to sell Paine's works after his release; and finally the Government gave up the struggle. It is mainly due to Carlile's unremitting efforts that "The Rights of Man" may be bought in any bookshop to-day.

A band of loyal and devoted workers helped Carlile in his struggle against oppression. His bookshop in Fleet Street was staffed by a succession of courageous volunteer shopmen. They were committed to jail one after the other; but new fighters in the cause of freedom were continually available. Carlile's wife, Jane, helped him in his work, and was herself sent to jail, although she had a young child and bore him another while in prison. His sister, Mary Anne, took Jane's place at the shop and followed her brother and sister-in-law to jail.

Carlile, who was born in Ashburton, Devon, in 1790, was a tin-plate worker who settled in London in 1813. He began to take an active interest in reform four years later, when he started to sell illegal Radical publications. He was always an ardent defender of the "under-dog"; and among the offences for which he was imprisoned were his advocacy of the cause of the agricultural labourers who rose against "intolerable oppression" in 1831, and his attack on the Government at the time of the "Peterloo Massacre," when yeomanry in Manchester rode down the unarmed demonstrators.

A convinced materialist in his early days, Carlile later became a convert to what he called "allegorical Christianity." He took out a licence to preach, and became entitled to (and used) the designation "Reverend." But even when preaching Chritianity he still maintained the right of unbelievers to the free expression of their views.

A man of unalterable fixity of purpose and a staunch individualist, whose enthusiasm could not be quelled by any measure of repression, Richard Carlile did as much as any Englishman who has ever lived to destroy Government control of the Press. His name will continue to be honoured as long as the British Press remains free.

Those who want to know more of Richard Carlile's heroic struggle should secure from The Strickland Press the following works: "Richard Carlile, Agitator" (fully illustrated) 1s. 6d., post-free 1s. 9d.; Carlile's "Jail Journal," 2s., post-free 2s. 3d.; and Dr. Brook's "Carlile and the Surgeon," illustrated, 2s., post-free, 2s. 3d. These works cover Carlile's life, struggle, thought, period and contemporaries, very well.

SOUTH PLACE

A STORY OF HERESY, PROGRESS AND CULTURE.

Sarah Flower wrote her letter from Harlow, November 23, 1827, when she was 22 years of age.

The epistle opens with a very frank confession:—

You did not ask me to write, and perhaps will be little thankful for what you are like to receive, a regular confession of faith, or rather, the want of it, from one whom you little suspect guilty of the heinous sin of unbelief. It reads like half-jest; never was I more serious. My mind has been wandering a long time ,and now it seems to have lost sight of that only invulnerable hold against the assaults of this warring world, a firm belief in the genuineness of the Scriptures.

No, not the only one. I do believe in the existence of an All-wise and Omnipotent Being—and that, involving as it does the conviction that everything is working together for good, brings with it a comfort I would not resign for worlds. Still, I would fain go to my Bible as I used to—but I cannot.

She describes how the change came over her gradually. Her mind refused to answer Robert Browning. At Norwich Musical Festival, the choruses of praise to God moved her, but the rest of the "Messiah" dwindled to mere musical enjoyment. Sitting in the room in which her mother died she realised she had lost her Christian faith. Her belief in a resurrection is doubtful. She wants to read a good ecclesiastical history but if afraid to let her father know of her infatuation for doubt. She continues:—

I would give worlds to be a sincere believer; to go to my Bible as to a friend in the hour of trouble, feeling that whatever might befall, THAT would never desert me, and defying the world to rob me of its consolations.

The letter continues, sadly and beautifully, to depict her scepticism, and is signed: "Yours affectionately, Sally."

Out of these pangs was born, thirteen years later, in November, 1840, the hymn "Nearer My God, to Thee." This hymn was sung by the South Place congregation for nearly a generation before it was taken up by the outside world. The first draft of it, a beautiful autograph, was exhibited at South Place fifty years ago. It is written for choral responses. Fox and Eliza Flower having adopted a plan, once suggested by Mrs. Bartauld, of a choral antiphone between the choir and the congregation. It is strange but the entire emotion of the Christian world has responded to this hymn born of scepticism, Theistic, but definitely Anti-Christian. This hymn is sung by Christians throughout the world in different tunes, in blissful unconsciousness of the fact that it is really a beautiful hymn of pilgrimage from the old faith to the new.

Moncure Conway considered that the history and adventures of "Nearer My God, to Thee," would make an interesting monograph. In the year of the centenary of American Independence, 1876, Conway was in the United States. He occasionally visited evangelical gatherings, and observed that their chief inspiration was this hymn. There was a great meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in Washington City, from which the Unitarian Minister, Dr. Shippen, was excluded pointedly and deliberately. Conway attended its prayer meeting and discovered that there was no fervour at all, until a blind preacher, the Rev. Thane Miller, arose and asked all to join in singing "Nearer My God, to Thee"—a hymn written by a far more unorthodox person than Dr. Shippen. Yet the mere singing of this hymn excited deep feelings.

In the New York "Truthseeker" for August 19, 1893, Ward Diehl, of Waterstown, Pennsylvania, relates an incident on a coach, in which eight men and two women accepted with awe a real revivalist story about the hymn. He declined to accept the story and was regarded with horror.

Sarah Flower's 1827 letter was in advance of Fox's opinion at that date. Her letter influenced him even as a New England young woman liberalised the Calvinism of Elhanan Winchester, the founder of the Society. And her hymn was an expression of heretical growth and unfolding.

In another aspect of religious evolution the story of South Place is strange. South Place receives no mention in the history of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Yet this Association was founded at South Place. Fox was its first foreign secretary. And it developed an understanding of Unitarianism in which, rightly, Unitarianism was held to be something more than Christianity. This idea of Unitarianism including, but extending beyond, Christianity, is a marvellous concept of spiritual harmony and progress. It is the beginning of Humanism and world religion. It is the end of theological strife and the beginning of world understanding. It represents the at-one-ment of all mankind. As such, it merits a chapter to itself.

THE SCOURGE OF WAR

Through the annals of history people are taught
That for Freedom and Justice in wars we have fought,
It's an old British custom begun long ago,
But when will it end? That's what we want to know.

When the Great World War for "Freedom" was won,
They said that our duty was nobly done,
'Twas a "war to end war" that promised to raise
"A land fit for heroes to live in" always.

But the trumpets of battle, not yet died away,
Have blazed forth once again to our sons of to-day,
And on these "playing fields" they are asked to redeem
The price paid for that "wreck creation" scheme.

Have the masses to "fight for their country" anew
To safeguard the land that belongs to a few?
Are these wars for our "freedom," as we have been told,
Or a life and death struggle for oil and for gold.

War is righteous they say when we've God on our side,
And true Christians should shoulder a rifle with pride,
But the Church that puts faith in a bullet or shell
Is more Godless than countries where Atheists dwell.

What can victory bring to the workers who toil?
Are their lives worth the nickel ,the ore, or the oil?
If those who made wars did the fighting, they say
No war would endure for a week or a day.

When the common people throughout every land,
Use the power they possess that is theirs to command,
Then war's bloody toil of the millions will cease,
And the world will enjoy everlasting PEACE.

SLOW CALVARY: THE CUP

EDITOR'S JOURNAL OF WAR RESISTANCE

[The Duke of Bedford is calling attention in the House of Lords to the Cat and Mouse treatment of conscientious objectors. This is illustrated by the fifth court martial of the Jehovah Witness, Stanley Hilton. There has been other cases to which attention has been directed in these columns. Actually, so far as military service is concerned, under the National Service Acts, 1839-41, if a man is court-martialled at all, the fault is originally his, for accepting medical examination. If he does not accept medical examination, he is not handed over to the military machine. "Cat and Mouse" operates in other cases, such as Fire Watching, Essential Works Orders, conditional exemption, and has affected women objectors. During the last war, the issue was more direct and simple. There was no question of medical examination being accepted. One was deemed a soldier without undergoing any medical examination.

In these columns we have published various articles dealing with the Wandsworth Prison Revolt of 1919, the Cat and Mouse treatment of objectors, including ourself, and the 1916 Tribunals, which were terrible mockeries. Our army discharge certificate was reproduced in "The Word" for October 1939 and in March 1940, our musings and reaction, from the time we were "handed over" by the magistrate at the West London Police Court, on May 4, 1916, to the date of our first court martial ,twelve days later.

The present journal continues the record of our war-resistance and depicts the effect of Cat and Mouse treatment. The notes, letters, essays, are reprinted from the columns of "The Spur." They were addressed to our comrade, Rose Witcop, who maintained "The Spur" as a monthly journal of Socialist Anti-Militarism throughout this period of struggle, and were published by her in its columns, between July 1916 and September 1918. It is, therefore, an actual prison and camp detention journal of resistance and not some description written from memory. It is not complete as it does not tell the full story. But it is sufficient for the moment.

Comrades should obtain our 1939 and 1940 copies mentioned in this introduction. They cover four or five issues. A few sets are obtainable and will be sent post-free for 9d.—Ed.]

FOVANT CAMP JOURNAL.

Fovant, May 28, 1916.

With Christ, I pray that the cup may pass from my lips. Like him, may I endure, meekly and firmly, the agony and bloody sweat of a slow Calvary.

Sunday, June 15, 1916.

I pass to my Court Martial, which took place at Fovant camp on Wednesday, May 17th.

I denied the jurisdiction of the Court and after much argument the Court retired, whilst my point was considered. Two noticeable things in connection with this Court Martial were the determination of the authorities here to prevent me getting in touch with anybody: and, two, the fact that, at the Court Martial, everyone was supplied with a copy of the King's Regulations except myself. Virtually, I was not allowed to prepare a defence. That fact exposes the tyranny of the whole proceedings.

The actual court trying the case consisted of three persons. The chairman was very anxious to be fair but too bluff to appreciate legal niceties. On his right, sat a judge at whom I smiled whenever I looked. I could not help myself. Instinctively, I smiled. And it was fatal. When I affirmed my evidence, he objected that an Atheist could not have a conscience!

I was recalled with escort, to find ruling against me. Evidence of my refusal to go on parade was given, it being admitted, under my cross-examination, that I refused courteously and without insolence of any kind. Many charges were dropped and only this one was proceeded with. I affirmed my opposition to war and the proceedings closed.

Two days later, I was marched out on parade and faced the regiment to have my sentence read out. I was sentenced by the Court Martial to six months' military detention, but the General Officer Commanding remitted four months of the sentence. I served twelve days, dating from date of trial, at Fovant Camp, on field punishment. On the thirteenth, I was removed to Devizes Detention Barracks to finish my sentence—and to earn another one if I wished to do so. The doctor examined me after my sentence and denounced the lightness of it, forgetting that, in thus expressing his feelings, he was guilty of a breach of discipline. He examined me again two days before I left for Devizes, and expressed the hope that they would drill me there. He said they could do what they liked with me. Thus he passed me not because of my physique, but because of his spleen.

On Friday, May 26th, I drew up a formal appeal against my sentence, which was forwarded duly to the General Officer Commanding. To show how farcical such appeals are, it should be added that no argument is permissable and that the statement of grounds of appeal must be confined to one side only of a sheet of foolscap. The Colonel said that the appeal would be turned down. And he was right. The appeal was turned down. On June 8th, I was called before the commandant at Devizes' Detention Barracks, and informed of the fact. Yet that appeal recorded my conscientious opposition to war, and on the day upon which I sent it in there was issued an Army Council Order to the following effect:

"A soldier charged with an offence against discipline who, at a Court Martial, alleges as his defence conscientious reasons, should be sentenced to imprisonment and not detention, and should be handed over to the nearest public civil prison."

Were justice intended to those conscientious objectors who were in detention already, or to one like myself who had stated a formal appeal, the sentence should have been varied to one of imprisonment. The importance of this point, at last appreciated by the government superficially at least, will appear from the following facts:

Devizes Detention Barracks seems to have been at one time an ordinary prison, but is now entirely under military control. On admission you suffer one or two indignities I need not relate. You are warned then of certain cell treatment, roughly corresponding to the lot of the hard-labour prisoner in the civil institution. You are advised also that, if refractory, you may be ironed, put on punishment diets, and, for breaches of discipline, liable to further District Court Martial. The reader will understand, readily, that, if in the ordinary camp, secrecy prevails concerning Camp Court Martial, much worse must the case prove in connection with a prison Court Martial.

I recall a time when I studied seriously the lives of the saints in order to distinguish the genuine from the counterfeit. One that amused me most was that of St. Bartholemew. It is related of this worthy that when he was roasted over a gridiron, and was well-nigh burnt to death on one side, he sweetly told his persecutors to turn the other side to the fire. I do not say that there is no moral to the story, nor that there is no truth in it. Of course, every martyr boasts the spirit that this story typifies. But the point at the moment is, that the government test for the conscientious objector whom it sends into detention is the Bartholemew test. It is not enough for the C.O. to suffer one side to rest comfortably on the gridiron. He must be willing to turn the other side as well. Indeed, he must have more sides to roast than nature gave him. And even then, the government will not credit his credentials.

Our old-time forefathers used the hot irons to test a man's honesty. But they were at least satisfied with one test. And later, when a man was made to walk the plank, it was enough that he walked the plank. But the C.O. must needs walk the plank and then dance on the side of it to an eternal strain of discord.

There are men incarcerated in our Detention Barracks to-day who have been sent there for varying terms, for disobeying orders from a conscientious objection to militarism. Some belong to the Non-Combatant Corps. Others are riflemen.

What has been their fate? They have been sent to the Detention Barracks, fully equipped, to be drilled, or again Court Martialled. And in addition to drill, they are compelled to fill in the day with arduous prison labours. If they refuse work or drill, not only are they remanded for Court Martial, but are kept during the period of the remand on a bread-and-water diet.

This has been the fate of some twenty comrades whom I have left behind at Devizes Barracks. Their leader was Emrys Hughes, of Merthyr, a well-known writer to the local "Pioneer." [Now editor, as the reader will know, of "Forward."—1943.] Four others came from the same district. The others are from Exeter, Bristol, Reading. I wish to hail publicly the dauntless courage of these comrades. Down to the time of my unexpected release on Saturday afternoon, June 17th, they had been through the mill in silence and solitary confinement, and had enjoyed only a bread-and-water diet. This punishment carries with it, inability to receive visitors, write, etc. Hughes received one visit from his sister by special permission of the Commandant. But it was allowed in the hope that his sister would move him to repentance. On Tuesday, June 13th, they were remanded for D.C.M. Meanwhile, the government had ordered imprisonment, as distinct from military detention, for conscientious objectors and these men are on bread-and-water diet, awaiting Court Martial because they are receiving an injustice of treatment which the government acknowledges to be wrong. And in the Houses of Parliament, we have been informed officially that the C.O. is treated as well by the military as by the civil authorities, that there was no reason for civil imprisonment, etc.

Returned to Fovant, I was brought before the Colonel at 12 o'clock noon on the Saturday, and told that I must decide what to do about going on parade. I refused to give any undertaking and was taken back to cells, but shortly afterwards released. I have had a Sunday afternoon free. I refuse parade and await another Court Martial.

Monday, June 16th, 1916.

At 6 a.m. this morning, I refused to go on parade. Later, after many formalities, was remanded by the Colonel for my second Court Martial. Since May 4th, last, my maximum amount of "freedom" has been 22 hours of "open arrest," and nine hours of ordinary "Military liberty" within a redius of five miles. The Colonel seemed very weary of the struggle and was very courteous.

Tuesday, June 20th, 1916.

Was taken before the Adjutant this afternoon for details of evidence to be taken. Treated very courteously indeed. My opposition to war was brought out well in the written evidence taken down in the preliminary documents.

Thursday, June 22nd, 1916.

Visited by nonconformist Chaplain. He seemed chatty, and made no attempt to alter my views. Said I was not such a terrible fellow, but too logical in my vision of things. Later examined by doctor. This person hates me! Previously, he had visited another C.O. now here awaiting his first Court Martial, Frank Prior, of Walthamstow N.C.F. Doctor told latter that I was "a bad lot," etc.

Sunday, June 25th, 1916.

Colonel visited me this morning, and handed me the minutes of evidence. This was not done last time. Am preparing my case. Heard about Sara's sentence of four months in Wormwood Scrubs. Am closely watched and unable to get letters out, in anyway. Chaps willing to do a lot for me, but afraid to help me communicate. My attitude is having a disturbing effect on the camp.

II. WINCHESTER PRISON REFLECTIONS.

Many incidents occurred at Winchester worthy of mention. I record one. The prison chaplain visited me soon after my arrival and learned that I had no religion. I told him that I viewed Christendom as a world of pagan make-believe. His cold pious hatred knew no bounds.

"You like skulking in a prison-cell," exclaimed this reverend stay-at-home escape-all-discomfort fire-eater.

"Yes," came my reply, "and some people like skulking in pulpits."

He banged the door and never visited me again.

1. Nine Months.

Winchester Prison, July 4, 1916.

Monday, July 3rd, I left Fovant for Winchester Gaol to serve a sentence—passed upon me by a secret Court Martial which ridiculed the provisions of the Military Service Act—of nine months hard labour. Of course, I have no right of public appeal. After Devizes, Winchester. After the Devil, Satan. Lucifer assumes a different suit of black and smiles with all his old cynicism at any idea of principle or justice. He hopes, by breaking my body, to destroy my will. We shall see.

I was sentenced on Friday morning, June 27th. That morning, I understand, the newspapers contained Mr. Asquith's statement concerning just treatment for objectors. And so I got nine months' hard. Good!

I hope and trust that comrades will keep the "Spur" going. I hope its size and influences may increase, and I assure comrades that my old rebel self, surviving all persecution will return from imprisonment to the platform, and the press determined and aggressive in thought and utterance, until action calls to sterner duty. For this system, with its senile gods and its degenerate monarchies, I intend to see buried in my own time and generation.

Now to my sentence. I was charged with refusing to obey a lawful command in that I did not go on parade. One offence! And the sentence is supposed to be proportionate to the said offence. At the same C.M., Frank Prior, of the Walthamstow N.C.F., and F.O.R., was charged with the same offence. He was senteneed to six months' hard labour, but this was commutted to 112 days. This was his first offence. Which means that conscience gets worse with consistency. Thus does the Military mind reveal itself.

But I am not complaining.

I know what is before me. And I have not gone to war without counting the cost. The expense will be weariness and persecution. The reward will be knowledge of a certain testimony to peace and justice, to fredom and truth. A happy pleasure in resisting cant.

What a farce it is! The men who style us traitors, who condemn the N.C.F. as a treacherous organisation, have declared, in the Commons, that the masters of the controlled industries are forming a powerful organisation to resist government taxation of their war profits! Patriotism! Sacrifice the bodies of the workers? Yes! Sacrifice the profits made from the war? No!

Thus we see the old class war again at work. Which is good. Soon the mists of the sham fight shall pass. Soon the clouds of illusion will vanish. From the battle-plains of Europe will go up a great cry of vengeance and angry indignation. Tremble then, my masters, make the most of your power to persecute. Every day brings you nearer your doom. Every night hastens the end of your dreams of ambition and conquest. Soon your sleep will be troubled; and, finally, sleep will cease to be your solace. You will cry for it in vain.

Yes, most respected superior suits of clothes, I foresee your doom. Lessons that we have learned at your Tribunals and Court Martials will stand us in good stead. You have practiced the cynicism of power. Beware, lest you be called to account before the cynicism of revolution. It will surprise you to witness then the wonderful flattery of imitation to which you will be treated. But the flattery will not please. And you will not imitate us so well. For, when down and out, you will do what despots ever do: whine and cringe. Then satisfied to have destroyed your sway over us, we will scornfully hearken to your whining, and see that no evil befalls you. May your children become co-operators in the great task that will follow—beautifying the great republic of social liberty.

2. "The Grace of Jesus."

Winchester Prison, July 9, 1916.

It has occurred to me, just now, as I sit in this cell, to consider how wise in their own day and generation are the children of this world of domination and cant; how much wiser they are than the children of light. That their wisdom is hypocrisy does not detract from its wiliness. This fact is evidenced by the way in which they turn every good thought, every gracious word, every noble sentiment to the service of evil, the advancement of degradation and the upholding of ignorance, and despotism.

My thoughts have turned to my study of Jesus Christ and his disciples. And a favourite phrase, found in the "Acts of the Apostles"—an early Christian benediction—has revealed its meaning to me for the first time, despite obvious corruption of language.

"The grace of our Lord, Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you, now, and for evermore. Amen."

Is not this benediction used continually in the Church services of Christendom? And what, pray, is it imagined to mean? Why, an actual personal blessing regularly dropped down in some mysterious way from Heaven by a person dwelling there without ageing in the least, called Jesus Christ: actual love shewn to the man below by God above: and some personal fellowship with a mysterious person called the Holy Ghost, who, somehow, is Father, and Son, and himself, and is neither Father nor Son.

This benediction is uttered by priests on fixed occasions as part of their trade. It is offered in gaol churches, where no blessing is known, where love is never suspected, and where personal fellowship is denied. Beyond hypocrisy is the further humbug, that, as employed by priest and dupe, the benedictions have no meaning. It is a solemn and outrageous farce and lie to pretend that they have.

Let us apply Atheist logic and rebel understanding. Let us see if these words have any meaning. We shall find them rich in meat, and know that it is foolish to repeat them parrot-like to-day.

The earliest Christians disliked the Pagan title, Lord, though it meant but teacher or master. Let us translate in this sense. Thus the first portion of the blessing is: "The grace of our teacher or master, Jesus Christ." This did not mean that Christ was dropping prosperity down from heaven, or that he was other than dead. It meant the grace, i.e., the power influence, the patient wisdom revealed by Jesus, or other teacher,

"The love of God." Elsewhere I have shewn how Christ thought and spoke in the terms of the God superstition, but always in the Jewish prophetic sense, meaning a covenant of righteousness. The Pagan Roman Imperial use of the term God, as applied by Constantine, for example, to himself, was but the State agreement with the Mosaic view of God as a God of war and a personal being, bestowing honours and withholding justice. That is the present Christian conception. It was not Christ's, nor that of the first Christians. "The love of God" means, then, not the love bestowed by God, but the love bestowed on God. Hence "the love of God" means the love of the convenant with righteousness, experienced by the child of light, who had learned to possess the grace that characterised Jesus and his manner of preaching the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

I have explained often before that the Holy Ghost means, but the Holy spirit of Truth. Hence the fellowship of Truth.

The early Christian benediction is seen now, not to be a blasphemous and superstitious jargon of lies such as the Church makes it out to-day, but a beautiful diction of good, a farewell of comradeship.

The phrase, "for now and for evermore," means throughout life, and has no reference or relation to heaven or some life hereafter.

To-day, I would not use this benediction. Its phrasing belongs to the past. We can reverence Truth now without personification. But I do protest that the Church which uses this benediction mocks it every time. For the Church is the Synagogue of Satan, and the blessing means alliance against this institution of Imperialism and falsehood.

As an Atheist, under my second sentence, within a very short time, for refusing to kill, I say, knowing the full meaning of the words, to all my comrades in the struggle:—"The grace of the teacher, Jesus, and the love of Righteousness, and the fellowship of Truth, be with you now and for evermore. Amen."

In penning these words, I have leaped the centuries, and am at one with the heresiarchs and early iconoclasts of the Christian era, who heard and understood the message of Jesus, the message that meant but the way and the life of individual and social health.

III. WORMWOOD SCRUBS' MUSING.

Wormwood Scrubs, December 28th, 1916.

And now for a little fancy. Some idle thoughts of an idle fellow: for whoever is debarred from following his soul's passion, whoever has a mission and not a career in life, and cannot follow it, he is idle even though every moment of his life be occupied with some care, worry, or task. I do not pretend to experience so much energetic excitement as this suggests, but only to sense an idleness which neither palls nor oppresses, but incites. My brain throbs through my being the thought: "Time flies: death urges." I feel myself responding, all my nerve concentrated to live my work, and I am compelled to patient sufferance. But I do not wish the hours to fly: that would be folly. I just want to lay up a store of quiet energy, to watch my wasted moments turn to a reserve of future power, and to muse smilingly on my past, my present, and my days that are to be. But I wish to know and to interpret life in my own being. For all knowledge must be assimilated and lived through oneself, if it is to become wisdom and understanding. Doing this I feel a rare contentment here, which I would not exchange for all the luxury of a palace.

The penitentiary, if not the abode of penitence, is at least the home of reflection. And the fact that it is Wormwood Scrubs that I write from, offers me much food to this end. How the place links you and I with the Mylius case: and then, by many links, with the late Charles Voysey, and Brixton! Ah yes! I have to pause when I think of Voysey, my visits to his Hampstead residence, our correspondence, and his visits to Brixton.

Dear conservative Theist Voysey, with but one iconoclast humour! Yet he believed in me as he watched me pass from Anglicanism, beyond his cherished hopes on to my present thought. He saw all my development and was disappointed sorely. And yet, he could put his hands on my shoulders, gaze into my eyes with that wonderful fervour, and say:

"Guy, my dear boy, I believe God means you to know the truth and to reveal it. Perhaps you will know a larger truth than I possess. Never doubt the revelation. Go on, in your sweet faith in liberty and human happiness. Have faith, whatever happens."

I remember his words now, his constant striking of the same note. And memory makes me grateful. I have seen Voysey explain away the future life, heard him point out there was no objective efficacy in prayer, but he never doubted that I believed in truth. Since then, those who used like jargon of belief or creed to my own, have sneered and questioned my efforts to make known first principles of social well-being. And if bitterness has failed to consume my zeal and to render worthless all my work, it has been because Voysey's faith has counted. One day, I will try to do justice to his memory, but more than this, I yearn, as the years go by, to give to the youth of my age, that understanding Voysey gave to me.

"DON'T BE A GULL."

The author of this pamphlet is well known. He omitted his name so that the pamphlet should be read without prejudice. He reveals himself in his style, exclaim many readers.

"Peace News," in its issue for August 27 last comments on the pamphlet as follows:—

"Don't be a Gull" is the curious title (whose appropriateness is explained in a preface) of a pamphlet which suggests "a way in which a satisfactory ending to the war might be achieved.

The plan is simple—that it is too simple is one of a score of objections to the answering of which the author devotes most of his pamphlet. It is based on the method of negotiation, but on two fundamental conditions, and with safeguards, that should make the case for a negotiated peace almost more attractive to non-pacifists than to pacifists!

Advocates of a negotiated peace would do well to keep "Don't be a Gull" handy for answering critics though they will find the "three unspoken objections," to which it refers, by no means so easily disposed of. The summary might have been better put at the end of the pamphlet, though at the beginning it serves as a rough index.

"Written for those who want lots more war and for those who don't by one of the latter," it is published by the Strickland Press, 104 George St., Glasgow, C.1, at 3d.

The pamphlet will be sent post-free for 4d.

"NOT BY NIGHT"

Mr. B. A. S. Brunskill's little booklet, "Not By Night . . ." is a very persuasively written statement of the case for Christian pacifism, which many who are pacifists on religious grounds will find a most useful addition to their equipment of helpful literature for lending to possible new converts.

Mr. Brunskill has the rather unusual "background" of twenty-two years' service in the Indian Army, before he came to the pacifist position.

DUKE OF BEDFORD

LANARKSHIRE MEETINGS' IMPRESSIONS

By J. TAYLOR CALDWELL

The Duke of Bedford spoke in Motherwell Empire Theatre on August 8 and in Burnbank at the Plaza Picture House, on Sunday, October 31. Both Meetings were held under the auspices of the Motherwell I.L.P. Socialist Open Forum. In Burnbank, local Anti-Parliamentarians and Anarchist comrades assisted in the advertising and organising. Guy Aldred also spoke at both meetings. I wrote my impression of each meeting immediately after leaving it.

The meetings, especially the first one, caused a great stir in Motherwell, Hamilton, Burnbank, and Blantyre; not only because of the rank of one speaker, and the revolutionary reputation of the other, but also because of the antagonistic activity of the Communist Party.

At Motherwell, the C.P. did what it could to have the meeting banned altogether. As the organisers of the meeting anticipated, the attack was a failure, and the hall was packed.

At Burnbank, the C.P. showed more wisdom. They repeated their leaflet attack, but made no attempt to get the meeting banned. They restricted their opposition to heckling. Had their statements shown some regard for truthfulness, no objection could have been taken to that. The struggle for truth demands vigorous statement of pros and cons, of point and counterpoint.

Here are my impressions.

I.—Motherwell Meeting

At the last moment, with a kind of electioneering strategy, the Communist Party issued a leaflet attacking the Duke, and accusing him with a wearisome lack of imagination, of being a Nazi agent and friend of Hitler. The last moment device was to obviate the possibility of an unanswerable rejoinder being issued in the same form.

The C.P. leaflet was distributed widely, and called on the people of Motherwell to "rally" to "protest meetings" against the Duke's visit. It was announced that these meetings would be held in the open-air at certain street corners near the Empire Theatre. The idea was to block the approaches to the theatre. "Don't Let Bedford Use the Hall" was the slogan, printed in large type, on the leaflet. This was the bold injunction that the people of Motherwell ignored. The I.L.P. chalked the streets: "Hear Bedford's Reply to His Accusers."

It is to the credit of the people of Motherwell that they were affected neither by the C.P. leaflets, nor by the libellous C.P. street chalking which augmented them. Instead, they responded to the I.L.P. invitation to "Hear Him."

The C.P. was able to hold only one of its protest meetings, so small is its influence in Motherwell these days. The common people are tired of its contradictory sensationalisms. Most of those who attended this meeting spent their time attacking the speaker, until the doors of the I.L.P. hall opened. Ten minutes later there were only two dozen people round the Communist Party platform. Soon they too dispersed, and the "great protest meeting" had to come to a close for want of an audience.

Two of "the Party" leaflet sellers were sent to the doors of the Empire to wave a pamphlet, ostensibly for sale, and to shout about "Hitler's Agents in Britain." But their cries became a little less insolent and an embarrassed self-conscious note crept into their voices when two I.L.P. supporters emerged from the Hall with bundles of "The Word" for October 1942, bearing an illustrated front page showing Stalin, Molotov and Ribbentrop at the signing of the Hitler-Stalin pact. The cry of "Hitler's Agents" seemed then to lose its force, and the vociferous ones became silent—then departed.

But, being unable to gather a meeting outside—despite their efforts—these intrepid advocates of the dungeon availed themselves of the democratic spirit of the socialist meeting by attending the meeting they had hoped to suppress, and at discussion time abusing the procedure by over-lengthy participation in discussion. Through the tolerance of the chair these people were able, probably for the first time in years, to address a full meeting in one of the largest halls in the district.

Comrade Aldred was the first speaker. He had intended to deal with "The War—and After," but the conduct of the Communist Party, in their efforts to stop the meeting, had to be dealt with.

Having "been introduced" by the Chairman he rose, and striding to the front of the stage, he stood, just behind the footlights, straddle-legged, leaning slightly forward, his hands clasped behind his back and, beginning quietly and gently, was soon pouring forth a storm of denunciation of pseudo-communism and political opportunism in a voice that filled the auditorium to its furthest walls, and overflowed into the vestibule beyond. The stewards on duty there left their posts and crowded round the doorway to hear. A policeman, passing the hall, stopped, as though he heard the voice and was reminded of something. He put his head in the door and whispered across the vestibule: "Your opposition has gone. They've given up. It's all clear now." Then he continued his slow walk down the street.

The Duke was the second speaker. With the aid of a microphone (which Aldred did not use) he addressed his audience in an even, clear voice; without emotion, and with great clarity, despite the difficult nature of the subject. The audience, most of whom were hearing an exposition of monetary reform for the first time, were obviously able to follow the speaker's arguments, for at no time did they lose interest or become restless. A silence of wrapt attention held them while the Duke spoke. This was probably because the Duke's grasp of his subject is so complete and his interest in it so keen that he can always speak on it without lapsing into cliches or using Exchequer phrases which would confuse the uninitiated.

An hour and a half was allowed for questions and discussion. Taking advantage of the leniency of the Chair the C.P. members tried to monopolise this time by keeping up a fire of questions. The speakers dealt very ably with these, and soon the opposition lost its vigour.

When the Chairman announced that discussion was in order and three minutes would be allowed each speaker the local C.P. organiser rose and spoke for nearly ten minutes.

It was possible to tell this speaker's political affiliations by the tone and manner of his speech. The raucous voice, the stacatto phrases, the dogmatic tone—all true to type. "The Party" seems to appeal to a mentality whose tonal expression is the same the world over. He made no attempt to substantiate the charges made on the leaflet; and seemed quite unaware of the fascist strong-arm nature of his Party's effort to prevent the meeting being held.

Fascism, he said, was tottering before the victorious march of the Red Army. When Russia, the only Socialist country in the world, had been attacked, the phony war of 1939 had become a war against Socialism. The workers of this country should rally behind the boys in the armed forces and support the Red Army in their struggle. The Communist Party had been carrying on the fighting against Fascism long before some people in this hall . . . "Five hundred British lads lay dead in Spain—"

The implication was that all of these "lads" were members of the C.P. Vigorous, full-blooded members. For the Communist Party has adopted them and enshrined them as heroes; just as it has canonised every other dead leader, or outstanding figure of the Socialist movement. The object is not to immortalise these dead fighters and agitators, but to make them posthumous members of "the Party"—or rather to identify "the Party" in the minds of the people with every dead fighter for social liberty. For they know that the people are muddy-brained and will reverence the church for its dead saints, even though it persecutes living prophets. For numbered with those who went to Spain are Robert Smillie and Daniel Mullen—both dead. One lies somewhere in Spain and the other in a London cemetery. Both were brave lads, and both had their deaths hastened by the Communist Party. And hardly had the dead fighters grown cold in their graves before "the Party" extended a hand of friendship to the alleged arch-enemy whom the "brave lads" had given their lives to destroy, and against whom another set of "brave lads" were now urged to wage war. But handshake and the bayonet thrust have but one meaning to those who seek power. Neither have any meaning in themselves; both have to submit to the test of how far they will carry "the Party" on its road to power.

Most of the other participants in discussion were in sympathy with the views expressed by the speakers.

In reply to discussions the Duke dealt very ably with the chief criticisms levelled against him.

Aldred urged his listeners to think for themselves on all questions. He reminded them of a piece of advice contained in a book, much older, and in many ways much wiser than anything yet offered by the Socialists: the words recorded by the prophet Isaiah: "Come, let us reason together."

Many of those who attended the meeting had to walk back to Glasgow, to Paisley, and even to Kirkintilloch. It was a wild, stormy night. A wild night and a long journey such as they might remember for a long time.

But after the memory of the journey has faded they will recall and relive the thoughts and feelings that accompanied them home on the night they heard the Duke and the Anarchist united in combat against aspiring despotism and desolation.

Welsh Anti-War Literature

In spite of the censorship and shortage of paper several small volumes have been published in the Welsh language against the War since 1939, and some journals printed in Welsh have been equally outspoken. Indeed, it is gathered that one such weekly has increased its circulation considerably merely because of its stand against the ghastly slaughter that is now proceeding all over the world.

The biggest attempt yet made, however, in that direction is the forthcoming publication of a substantial Welsh volume entitled "Gair y Cymod" (Word of Reconciliation); published by Lewis, Gwasg Gomer, Llandyssul, Carmarthenshire; 5/- per copy post free.

It will contain twenty articles by a similar number of the leading literary men of the Principality and twenty poems composed by another twenty of the most famous Welsh poets.

It is hoped to review the book in "The Word" in due course. It is understood that orders are well in hand already to secure the success of the venture; it will be on sale just before Christmas.

SUGGESTED ENGLISH MEETINGS

It has been suggested that the Duke of Bedford and the editor should speak, under Socialist auspices, in Lancashire. It will be some time before arrangements can be made as the idea is to speak in more than one town.

The editor has been asked to speak in London at various meetings. Before agreeing he would like to hear from all London comrades so that really worthwhile meetings might be arranged and also private contacts made. He is not anxious to leave Glasgow which he regards as his field of activity. But if he is to visit the metropolis he wants the visit to be useful and he desires to meet all his various Socialist, Humanist, Ethicist and Freethought friends and comrades. One meeting is to be under Unitarian Pacifist auspices.

The visit cannot take place until after the New Year. This will give all comrades an opportunity of planning meetings and private discussions. One Labour Group has asked that he speak in company with the Duke of Bedford.

THE DEATH STRUGGLE OF MODERN CAPITALISM

By FREDERICK LOHR

On the morning of Sunday the third of September, 1939, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, then Prime Minister of Great Britain, broadcast to the world that a state of war existed between Britain and Germany. His announcement came as no surprise to people who had been for years living under the threat of war, and who were daily conditioned to its expectation. There was no shock, no outburst of incredulity, no manifestation of horror, such as we are told greeted the outbreak of war in 1914. In Parliament, all save a few pacifists registered their approval of the war decision. No prominent voice was raised against a repetition of the barbarism of the last War. Perhaps among a few people who during that fateful period between Munich and the Russo-German Pact, believed that a major conflict could be avoided, the feeling existed that still in spite of the declaration of war, the nations might yet be persuaded by sane counsels, and the reality of open warfare be avoided. But by the great majority the Prime Minister's solemn declaration was accepted with resignation, and even with relief. For it brought to an end those long years of exhausting suspense which had permeated every phase of social life with uncertainty and questioning. Those dragging months of waiting upon Hitler's speeches, those years of watching in impotent fury the aggressive policies of the European Dictators unfolding before their eyes. Those years of heavy anxiety had come to an end, the storm clouds hanging oppressively over torn and troubled Europe had broken, the veneer of a false peace had cracked, and the festering sore of political hostility once more erupted in bloody struggle.

To most people the war was unavoidable. Better, they felt, that it should come now than be protracted into the future when Germany and her Axis partners might be stronger still. To most people it was a necessary war. For long they had recognised that European affairs could not just drift along in such an unsatisfactory manner. The bluff of Hitler and Mussolini had to be called, and the position of Russia clarified. Almost one might say that in those early days of September 1939 there was an atmosphere of relief. Mr. Chamberlain had finally brought matters to a head; the tension was broken. Long years of dilatory diplomacy and vacillating policies were at an end. The country was finally done with that concealed enmity, that brooding fear beneath the outward semblance of an uneasy peace. England was at War!

September 1939. There was no ranting enthusiasm. No beating of drums: no military parades. No hysterical cheering and no patriotic demonstration. After the feeling of relief came a mood of anxious anticipation. War, in 1939—what did it imply? For twenty years since Versailles platform and press had described the terrible advances in the methods of scientific warfare. China, Abyssinia and Spain had evidenced the death-dealing potentialities of the modern warplane. So that when the first practice wailings of air-raid sirens were heard over England on that Sunday morning in September 1939, there could be sensed the fearful recognition that this would be no war on foreign battlefields only, no war merely of newspaper reports of continental campaigns. A new weapon had been forged from the crucible of the Great War, and perfected in the peaceless years between wars. The bombing plane! The dread of this paralysed enthusiasm for War in September 1939. Like a dark cloud of foreboding Storm hung the prophecy of death from the skies. War for both combatant and non-combatant; death for both soldier and civilian; terror and destruction for both guilty and innocent—TOTAL WAR! People looked up into the skies and were afraid.

From the beginning, and for months prior to the declaration, the war had been publicised as a just war. A moral crusade. It was to be a war against aggression, against bad faith, against tyranny and persecution. Above all else it was a war for freedom, a war to make it possible for the plain and common man to live in peace and security, free from secret police, racial persecution and the domination of military conquest. Mr. Chamberlain's voice had broken when he had described the war's purposes, and generally speaking the population of the country were in agreement with his sentiments. They had not wanted war. They had tried strenuously to avoid war. Hitler would not be appeased. There was no other way.

Still, there was no enthusiasm. No determined bearing. No rush to volunteer. No eagerness to open hostilities. In spite of all propaganda from platform, press and radio, in spite of general sympathy with allied hopes and general hatred of Hitler and Nazism, the fear of War itself—Total War—the unknown potential of modern scientific war, stifled popular enthusiasm and made ludicrous the martial fervour of politicians and journalists. Nazi war-guilt, Hitler's wickedness, the wickedness of the German people in general, all were agreed and denounced, but all were secondary to the issue of WAR itself. The people were for the war, thought it necessary; had even at times demanded war against aggression. Now that it had come, they were not surprised; they would not have had it otherwise. And yet they could not fight it. Could not summon up the energy to proclaim it and to prosecute it. For they were very, very afraid. The dominant, overriding characteristic of England during the early winter of 1939 was fear. Fear, not of Hitler, not of Germany, but of WAR. For the first time in the history of the British people, War as a thing in itself focussed itself prominently in the public mind. All efforts to concentrate attention upon the issues, moral, economic or strategic, failed to achieve their purpose. Daily from the outbreak of war was to be observed a steady decline in the attention devoted to the attributes of this particular war, and an increase in the preoccupation with the question of War itself. War as a human experience. War and its modern implications. Now whether this attitude sprang from a cowardly fear of bombing planes, in a country which had felt but little of the terrible devastation of previous wars, or whether it originated from a sense of war futility, or from an instinctive consciousness of the inadequacy of Great Britain to fight a modern Total War, with this I am not concerned. Whatever was the reason, the feeling existed in September 1939, and exists to-day in a much more tangible shape. It presages some hope for the future, for it means that England is approaching a consciousness that modern Total War represents a greater threat to worthwhile values than do the theatrical ambitions of the European Dictators. It represents a growing awareness that the democratic way of life, the belief in the free expression of human personality, cannot be defended by Total War, but on the contrary a prerequisite of efficient war prosecution to-day, is the abandonment of such a way of life and an acceptance of totalitarianism in social organisation. It means above all that the War is being regarded not as an episode in the history of this particular age, but as an evolutionary resultant of past conditions. And the recognition of this fact is a necessary introduction to the examination of this war as the expression of a social antagonism which is inherent in modern capitalist society.

This is the second world war within the lifetime of one generation, and there are many signs that the lessons of history are slowly being learned by that vast section of the general public which is not usually given to speculation regarding world affairs, outside the limits of their daily newspapers and the nightly radio. Each year dealing expertly and scientifically with all shades there are published many hundreds of volumes of opinion concerning War in general and this war in particular, but these studies reach only a minute proportion of the population, and knowledge which is commonplace to this minority is unknown and unsuspected by the general reading public. Nevertheless, through the mediums of press and cinema, popular periodicals and political organisations, certain tendencies in war are being noticed and questioned by people who a few years ago would not have troubled to examine them. It is being noticed that each succeeding year has a tendency quickly to outstrip the local animosities that occasioned it. That there is soon revealed a connection between the wars of small nations and the interests of large Powers. The politics of the Gran-Chaco, the Spanish Civil War, etc., are observed to link up with the ambitions of great Empires. Most people have already noticed that whilst each great conflict appears to settle issues between Governments, yet nevertheless the same issues recur again and again in ever larger perspective, and from each war a whole series of new issues are raised for succeeding generations.

Thus behind all the patriotic support for the present war policy, there can be described a growing realisation that war is not an episodic eruption due to individual or national wickedness, but an international phenomenon of social significance. Once it is perceived that a particular war originates in causes which are out of sight of the local manifestation of the outbreak, the way is prepared for the realisation that each war has a common social root. Thus to-day, more and more people are taking up a realistic attitude to the war. The propaganda devoted to the idea that wars are caused by the power hunger of megalomaniacs is losing ground. So also is the idea that any state-structure is built up solely for war purposes, unrelated to its position within a world in arms. Once it is admitted that war is not a biological phenomenon, and so cannot be regarded as a manifestation of any natural hostility between racial or national groupings, the causes of war must be sought within the internal structure of society. In other words, it is recognised that war is not a human characteristic but a social problem.

Now a modern industrial society is an exceedingly complex organisation and the human relationships within such a society tend to become increasingly complicated. So it is with war. The issues involved in a war between highly organised and technically equipped States are extremely difficult to unravel. Simplification is impossible except on broad and general lines. The scale upon which mechanised war now operates introduces with every campaign new factors and fresh issues which were outside the range of the original war purposes. The world is to-day so closely linked together, the interests of the great Powers so delicately interwoven, that it is impossible, so swiftly do the objectives broaden and conditions change, to discern clearly the ultimate policies of any warring State. As more and more of the surface of the world is brought within the sphere of military operations and nations divide themselves into hostile camps, each possessing incalculable potential for destruction, it is difficult to perceive how any end to this conflict can possibly serve the interests of any State or people. War to-day has reached such dimensions, and involves such awful implications that it is fast becoming a raison d'etre in itself. Whatever aims or purposes it had when it started, they are fast becoming secondary to the necessities of war itself. Once the conception of Total War becomes an active reality, then the very logic of its movement takes control and creates its own purpose and destiny. Original war aims and promised peace policies become meaningless. Victory and Defeat take on the same significance. Both mean a cessation of War and both must contemplate a return to the problems of Peace. Now this War is itself, in a way, an expression of the failure to face up to these problems. War is a method of shelving social problems, but when war develops into Total War, not only is the direction of industrial production changed, but the very basis of society is shifted. No great industrial country once organised for Total War can revert back to the loose and undisciplined social organisations of capitalist democracy. To attempt such a return would immediately produce a condition of economic and political chaos. Neither can the war provide a solution to any of the problems of Peace that contributed in large measure to its outbreak; in every case it can but exacerbate and develop them. But war can temporarily obscure these problems, and total war can provide a measure of escape from peacetime embarrassments so long as it continues, and so long as Victory or Defeat can be averted. Thus we find ourselves to-day in the tragic circumstance that war is preferable to peace; war is becoming the normal activity of our lives, and peace the abnormal eventuality to be feared.

It is an ironic comment upon our civilisation. Circumstances have plunged us into a conflict in which fear of the weapons of destruction, the possibilities of starvation, the potentialities of pestilence and disease, all conduce to a sane and reasonable rejection of war, yet on the other hand fear of the uncertainties and insecurities of peace fill us with forebodings of the cessation of war. Our world contains all that is necessary in materials, inventiveness and labour power, to provide a full and free life for all, and to satisfy all the wholesome desires of mankind, yet within this sphere of plenty and this prospect of happiness, only war can to-day provide mankind with a modicum of security and a meagre supply of material comfort. Only in Total War have we discovered an outlet for the tremendous productivity of human energy and modern technical equipment. Only in war can man find release from the drabness and frustration of his social environment. If ever there was a dilemma of absurdity, this war is one. It goes forward to ruin and despair, because it dare not return to poverty and disillusionment.

Many clever politicians and others are to-day lifting up their voices in extravagant promises of a rosy future to come after the war. One and all endeavour to maintain the childish illusion that a military victory over Germany is all that is needed to bring about the millenium. Few now pay attention to such charlatans, for most sensible people recognise that the war is supported more out of fear than hope, and that whilst the war continues, gathering each day ever increasing momentum, engulfing each week more and more of the total energies of humanity to the purposes of futility, it is idle to pretend to plans of a better world, or to promises of a more just and equitable society after the war. The war itself is in command of these pretentious ambitions. Our new society arising from the aftermath of cruel and bloody war will bear indelibly the marks of such a conflict. This war will be its foundation stone and the lives flung so uselessly into such a foundation, will prove to be a solvent that will mock its edifice. A service would be done to society if someone with a more able pen than mine, would convince these political hucksters and economic shamans that the society of to-morrow is being built to-day. There is never a clean break with history, never a new start. As we sow to-day, to-morrow we shall reap, and to pretend that a war of such magnitude as this one, with consequences so immeasurably heavy to bear, can be lightheartedly regarded as a prelude to better times, is to spit in the face of truth and reason. Such men are criminals.

So that, before all questions of social importance is this question of War, for now War assumes such proportions that it represents the total product of our civilisation. We have reached a historical phase which has no meaning outside of war. The very nature of our age is mirrored in mechanised warfare. It is the culmination of capitalist endeavours, the final expression of a system which is soulless, whose philosophy is accumulation, whose logic is frustration and whose ultimate reality is futility.

How has this system brought society to such a pass? Why has the promise of the nineteenth century failed to mature? What is there in capitalist civilisation which is so destructive of human values and Christian culture? How is it that the great advances of industrial technique and scientific invention have worked to such ignoble purposes, when so much altruistic endeavour has gone to build up our present society?

It is necessary to consider these questions, and to form some general political and economic understanding of the situation in which we find ourselves. This war, and the historical epoch which has produced it, cannot be wholly explained in either political or economic terms. Realisation of this simple truth stresses the need for personal responsibility and personal thought, for Anarchism as well as for Socialism. If mankind is to be served, the death struggle of modern capitalism must give us, not a Communist Dictatorship for a Fascist Dictatorship—in essence they are the same combination of irresponsible despotism and bureaucracy—but a living democracy, a Free Society, a world of Anarchism and common fellowship of living.

PAUL D. ABBOTT

For the third time, Paul Douglas Abbott, chartered accountant student, Defoe Avenue, Kew, was sent to prison on Thursday, October 14, 1943, by the Mayor (Councillor J. L. Hawkins), Councillor C. E. Mills and Mrs. Reid, in Richmond police court.

Abbott has been convicted twice at Kingston for failing to attend for medical inspection and now for failing to comply with a direction of the Ministry of Labour to go to employment as an agricultural worker in Buckinghamshire at Friarage Camp, Aylesbury.

Abbott pleaded guilty.

Mr. C. E. Shelly, wso prosecuted, said Abbott was registered in 1940 and he applied to be regarded as a conscientious objector. His case was considered by the local tribunal in May, 1940, and his application was rejected. He appealed, and in November the Appeal Tribunal upheld the decision. Various attempts were made to get him to attend for medical examination prior to service with the armed forces. In May, 1942, he appeared at Kingston and was fined £5, or a month's imprisonment, for non-attendance. The fine was not paid and he was detained for medical examination. In June, 1942, he again appeared at Kingston for failing to attend and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Abbott again appeared before the tribunal and his plea was rejected. He could have been conscripted into the armed forces but the Ministry of Labour thought better to employ his services in another capacity.

On August 21st Abbott was directed to report to Buckingham War Agricultural Committee. He failed to comply, and on August 25th wrote and clearly invited prosecution.

On September 4th he was interviewed by a representative of the Ministry, and he repeated that he objected to being conscripted into any service for the war effort; he would be satisfied with nothing else than unconditional exemption.

"This young man," added Mr. Shelley, "is actively associated with the Richmond Conscientious Objectors' Advisory Bureau."

Abbott's Statement.

Abbott told the court that he thought the best contribution an individual could make towards the attainment of a peaceful society was to refuse utterly to submit to any conscription for war. He still had 65 days to serve under his supplemented articles, and when he had completed them he would see if there was any work more constructive and useful than accountancy he could take up. There might not be. He did not object to hard work, manual or otherwise, but the Ministry of Labour policy of trying to force him to do land work made it appear to him very doubtful whether he could honestly take that up, even voluntarily.

Abbott concluded:—

"The Ministry appears to me to have more interest in enforcing universal conscription than a genuine concern to effect food production. As a logical outcome of my rejection of conscription I shall refuse to work in goal and also as a protest against the demoralising prison system."

The Mayor, after the Bench had consulted in private, said the justices sentenced Abbott to prison for three months with hard labour.

Paul D. Abbott was born on June 7, 1914, at Sydney, New South Wales. He came to England in 1915. His father was, at one time, Inspector-General for the Far East of L'Union Assurance Company of Paris. He is the grandson of the late Henry Abbott, J.P., of Detentham, Suffolk. Also nephew of the late Frank Morley Youngman, J.P., of Ashfield, Suffolk. Paul Abbott was largely brought up by Frank Youngman, who was a well-known pacifist.

Mr. Youngman was chairman of the Framlingham Farmers' Co-operative Society; President of the Eye and Woodbridge Division Liberal Association; a member of the Lord Chancellor's Committee for the selection of magistrates; and a pacifist member of the conscientious objector Tribunals during the first great war.

Paul Abbott was educated at Felsted Junior School and at Framlingham College. He is a linguist and keen internationalist. He has cycled all over France, Holland, Belguim, Germany and Denmark. He left the Boy Scout movement, in which he was scoutmaster, when the Chief Scout declared that all scouts must do organised national service in war emergency.

"COMMUNISTS" AND THE WAR

In March, 1943, the Labour Party issued an unanswerable factual indictment of the Communist Party's record of hypocrisy and treachery to the workers of Europe, in relation to the war. Prior to the signing of the Soviet-German Pact at Moscow, on August 21, 1939, the Communist Party denounced appeasement and demanded a War Government, with Churchill and Eden in leading positions. Two days later, the Daily Worker declared that the "Axis" papers attached too much importance to the negotiations and recalled Stalin's lengthy statement to the Eighteenth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in March, 1939, pledging support to nations which had fallen prey to aggression and were fighting for their independence.

The Communist Party continued in this frame of mind down to September 20, 1939, even though Russian troops had entered Poland three days earlier. During this period, Willie Gallacher, in the House of Commons, Harry Pollitt in his pamphlets, and the Central Executive Committee of the Party had declared their strong opposition to Fascism.

The Daily Worker for September 2, 1939, published a statement by the Central Committee of the Party, declaring :—

The Communist Party has never hidden and never will hide its opinions regarding the fundamental cause of the war, namely, the capitalist system.

It has never hidden and never will hide its detestation of Fascism and its readiness to take part in any struggle, political or military, to secure the defeat of Fascism.

On the same day, Willie Gallacher declared in the House of Commons: "I will stick at no sacrifice to ensure the defeat of Nazi Aggression."

On September 14, 1939, the Communist Party issued a pamphlet, entitled "How to Win the War" by Harry Pollitt, then Secretary of the Party. This pamphlet, full of stern war commands to the British Government, was withdrawn later. Pollitt wrote :—

The Communist Party supports the War, believing it to be a just War which should be supported by the whole working class and all friends of democracy in Britain.

On September 28, 1939, the occupation and partition of Poland on a dual basis was formally agreed upon in a German-Soviet Treaty of Friendship fixing "the frontier of their interests in the former territory of Poland." Article I of the Treaty).

Two days later, the Editorial Board of the Daily Worker published a statement in the paper beginning :

Arising from the decision taken in Moscow and the peace declaration which has followed, an entirely new situation confronts the people of this country and of Europe.

This statement was a lie, as later events proved. The "Communists," whether for War or Peace, were merely Moscow hirelings. They were never genuine. Merely cynics, opportunists, and sycophants.

On October 7, 1939, the Communist Party published a Manifesto in the Daily Worker in which it declared :—

This war is not a war for democracy against Fascism . . .

The responsibility for the present Imperialist war lies equally on all the warring powers.

This war is a fight between the Imperialist powers over profits, colonies, and world domination.

The Soviet Union is leading the world fight for peace.

This Manifesto demanded an immediate Peace Conference.

On October 12 the Communist Party announced through the Daily Worker, that its Manifesto of October 7, denouncing the war as an Imperialist war, corrected its declaration of September 2, declaring its intention of fighting Fascism. It should be noted that, whether for the war or against it, the Communist Party denounced in terms of violence and contempt those who anticipated its future attitude or stood by its previous attitude.

On October 11, 1939, Harry Pollitt was dismissed from the Secretaryship of the Communist Party. On November 23 both he and J. R. Campbell published in the Daily Worker abject recantations of their support of the war. Pollitt described his war attitude as "an impermissible infraction of our Party's discipline." Campbell described his pre-war attitude as "resisting what has been proved to be the correct line."

What hypocrisy!

From now on, until June 22, 1941, when Hitler launched his sudden attack upon the U.S.S.R., the Communist Party was not satisfied to conduct an ordinary peace or anti-war agitation, such as Socialists and men of principle have conducted in times of war, to the peril of their own lives and liberties. The Communist Party conducted a campaign of slander, bogus grievances, mean opportunism, and sabotage.

On November 1, 1939, it issued a pamphlet, Why This War? in which it lumped together Chamberlain, Churchill, Greenwood, Dalton, Bevin, Citrine, and declared that "without the support of organised labour" no "war government could continue in office a day."

In January, 1940, the London District Conference of the Communist Party resolved to contest every By-election on a programme of resolute opposition to the war and defence of the Soviet Union.

On February 22, 1940, Harry Pollit contested the Silvertown By-election in opposition to the Labour Party Candidate, who upheld the war. Pollitt's slogan was: "The Communist Party fights to end this war."

The Communist Party now circulated widely, shamelessly in view of their previous pamphlets —a pamphlet by G. Dimitroff, Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Communist International, published on November 18, 1939, entitled "Communism and the War." Dimitroff accused the leaders of the Social Democratic and radical parties of "now openly supporting the imperialist war." He added :—

The Social Democratic, "democratic" and "radical" flunkeys of the bourgeoisie, are brazenly distorting the anti-Fascist slogans of the Popular Front, and are using them to deceive the masses of the people and to cover up the imperialist character of the war. Under the Flag of "national unity" they have, in fact, established a common front with the capitalists, a front stretching from the Conservatives to the Labour leaders in England, and from the Cagouloards to the Socialists in France. The foremost leaders of the Social Democratic Parties and the reformist trade unions shamelessly took up front rank posts in the camp of the imperialists, from the very first day of the war.

It clearly follows from the above that the Communists can have no united front whatsoever with those in a common front with the imperialists and who support the criminal anti-people's war. The working class and all working people can have no dealings with the Social Democratic, "democratic" and "radical" politicians who are betraying the vital interests of the popular masses. Between the masses of the people and these lackeys of imperialism lies the abyss of war.

On April 10, 1940, the "Communists" accused the British Labour and Trade Union leaders of responsibility for the Nazi invasion of Norway and Denmark and for extending the war. The statement in the Daily Worker reads :—

They (the Labour and Trade Union Leaders) demanded it. They have justified it, and now Norway and Denmark are in the inferno.

On April 27, 1940, the Daily Worker published the "Communists" May Day Call, in which it was stated :—

Once again the bankrupt rulers of capitalism can find no solution save a new human holocaust. Once again the millions of workers are dragged from production into uniforms to kill one another. Once again the false leaders of Labour hound on the slaughter and seek to deceive the people on the character of the war. . . .

In vain the old threadbare, lying slogans of the war for "freedom" and the "rights of small nations" are rattled anew to cover up the reality of the bestial conflict of the giant capitalist empires for world domination.

In vain the corrupt Labour leaders seek to furbish up anew these slogans with new deceptions about "the war against Fascism," as if Chamberlain and Churchill, the worst enemies of the working class, were the champions of democracy and the rights of the people. . . .

End the political truce—the shameful alliance of Labour leaders with the leaders of Capitalism, which is preparing the way for a Coalition War Government to hold the workers in chains.

The Communist International Manifesto, according to the Daily Worker of May 1, 1940, said :

In answer to the gross violation by England and France of the neutrality of the Scandinavian countries, Germany led its troops into Denmark and occupied strategic positions in Norway. England and France, in their turn, landed troops. The territory of Norway became a theatre of war. . . .

The strife between the imperialists in the Pacific threatens to develop into new wars. A dispute has already begun between Japan, England and the U.S.A. over the Dutch East Indies.

The bourgeoisie of the U.S.A. are, as a beginning, stretching out their hands to Iceland, Greenland, and the possessions of Britain and France in the Caribbean Sea.

The Capitalist miscreants are dragging the peoples into a new world imperialist carnage. . . .

The British and French warmongers and their social democratic lick-spittles are furious at the fact that the Soviet Union occupies a position of neutrality towards their imperialist war. . . .

The Daily Worker kept up the attack. On May 10, 1940, on the morning of the German invasion of Holland and Belgium, an editorial stated :

Even a blind man can see what is happening. The Labour Party is going to enter the Government. Let's make a bargain, they say. Throw out Chamberlain and we will save Churchill for you. Then we can go to the Bournemouth Conference, claim a great victory over Chamberlain, and thus get a vote authorising us to enter a reconstructed government.

And so, what is the net result?

A new war government emerges, inclusive of the Labour leaders. If the Carlton Club wants the use of these gentlemen they are, of course, welcome to try their hand, although they will hardly find that Morrison and Bevin are much of an improvement on Chamberlain or Hoare.

When the Churchill Government was being formed, the Communist Party in a statement published in the Daily Worker on May 11, 1940, stated :

To their eternal shame the Labour Party leaders have offered to enter a new "National Government" in combination with the most ruthless jingo representatives of capitalism. These same leaders, who had helped to maintain Chamberlain in power through all these years, now accept the leadership of Churchill and come to the rescue of the Diehard imperialists in the intensification of the war. . . .

Fight against Labour participation in Churchill's new War Government.

The class which rules, the capitalist class, determines also the aims and purpose of the war. For them the war is no anti-Fascist war, as the Labour leaders falsely proclaim, but an imperialist war, a war against the German people to inflict a new super-Versailles, for the maintenance and extension of the British Empire, for the domination of reaction in Europe, and for war on the working class in all countries and against the Socialist Soviet Union. . . .

Again, on September 14, 1940.

The ruling class, who have betrayed the people and brought this war upon them, have nothing to offer except "Blood, toil, tears and sweat." The Labour leaders have gone over body and soul to the ruling class. From them there can be no leadership for the people of Britain. . . .

Only the Communist Party fights the Labour leaders, who have been given positions in the Tory Government in order to attack the workers and to carry through the war policy of the capitalists. . . ."

Hostility to the war, denunciation of the Churchill Government and of Labour Ministers, and criticism of the Labour Party continued to be a main theme of Communist propaganda.

PUBLISHER'S FOREWORD AND APOLOGY.

This is a factual work and I wish to make my introduction as brief as possible. I have no sympathy with Fascism. I have no sympathy with the ideals, programmes, or policies of those who call themselves Fascist, or others with kindred views who call themselves by other names. That fact is well-known. It is evidenced by my record of Socialist and Freethought struggle since I joined the Freethought movement sometime in 1904 and the Socialist movement a year later. I have not recanted any of my Anarchist, Socialist or Freethought views.

Those who helped me to produce this enquiry are Anarchists and Socialists also as their consistent record of Anarchist and Anti-Fascist activity proves.

As an Anarchist I was appalled when I read of the treatment meted out to Anarchists in the United States in 1886-87; of the Anarchist persecution in Europe during the far from gay nineties; and of the treatment of Sacco and Vanzetti. I was opposed to all persecution and anti-constitutional conduct when the victims were Anarchists or life-long Socialists. I am opposed to it when the victims are avowed or alleged reactionaries. Our forefathers suffered in vain if rights of accusation and trial, of public indictment and public hearing, are to be swept aside by fear and prejudice.

The question of 18B internments is one of principle touching the fundamental rights of the citizen to liberty unless convicted after a proper trial by a lawfully constituted tribunal acting according to law. The principle is clear, notwithstanding the fact that some of the people concerned would mete out similar treatment to Socialists if they had the upper hand. This attitude of some of the victims renders the position difficult. It causes one to be watchful about any statements they may make. But this watchfulness becomes knavery and cowardice if one continues to accept the position of internment of people without charge or trial as a matter of course.

I do not know if all the statements made by the victims are true. I say that, without question, every statement ought to be investigated. Of the fundamental wrong I have no doubt. But I am prepared to raise my voice alone if necessary, as I would do were the victims Anarchists or Socialists. The Right of the Citizen is a social right that has no relation to the bias of opinion. It is inherent in human association and cannot be denied without harm to all mankind and without invasion of the sound civil principle of individual liberty.

I have illustrated this enquiry with two charts—for the illustration of the trial of the King of France is more a chart than a picture—published in London in 1797.

Study carefully the trial chart. Then study carefully the proscription chart. Note the fate of the men who condemned the King of France to death. Note in the proscription chart how, in time, the party that proscribed became the party that was proscribed. Study this development of lawlessness that had its origin in violence and crises. Then consider the historical analogy and let that analogy point the lesson of the fundamental wrong of government by proscription.

With the individuals now interned, as individuals, I have practically no political sympathies. Were they free I would be their opponent. But they are imprisoned without charge or trial. They are not tried because no charge can be brought against them. Many of them have been soldiers and suffered in the first Great War, which I opposed, as did some members of His Majesty's Government. Under these circumstances, I dare to come forward, not as an apologist of their opinions, but as the defender of their civil rights. If they are traitors, indict them. If they are not traitors, release them. If they cannot be indicted, they ought to be restored to human liberty. In the name of John Hampden, Thomas Paine, Richard Carlile, and the host of my radical forbears, I demand their freedom.

By what right are our liberties denied and government by proscription accepted as the law of Britain?

GUY A. ALDRED.

EDITOR'S FOREWORD.

I do not claim to be the author of this small literary effort and therefore should explain to the reader that it consists of a series of notes made by various persons interned (or detained) during the year 1942 which I made it my business to collect.

After cutting out extraneous matter and collating these notes I made it my personal business so far as is in my power to verify to the final detail all the points raised and cases disclosed.

Some twenty or more subscribers have helped me in this work many of whom are still interned under 18B, whilst others are free, in the army or elsewhere; but for fear of intimidation and retaliation have made me promise not to reveal their names until it is safe for it to be done.

I leave it, however, to the reader to ask himself if "the facts ring true" and if so will he allow the cry of those so unjustly treated by this regulation 18B to go unheard and unanswered.

"Vengeance or damages" is not asked for, but only "Justice" with what recompense rightly due.

As the notes were all made during the year 1942 some change in numbers and other circumstances may have taken place by the time this appears in print. Some of the Chapters also revert into the "present tense" but it seemed a pity to destroy the verbatim wording of the individual writer by transposing to the past.

THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION AND 18B.

Dionysius the Areopagite wrote that—"He has set the bounds of nations according to His Angels." It is these Angels, each one the genius of some race about to be unfolded, that are the founders of Constitutions.

Translated into terms of positive Sociology, this means that a "Constitution" is something inherent in the character of the People or Nation—something anterior to the foundation of the State itself—most emphatically not a matter of musty parchments, or of beggarly concessions wrested from reluctant tyrants and eventually codified by the theorists and politicians.

A "Constitution" therefore, is ratified or reduced to writing only when attempts have been made to subvert it; it is not created by any legal instrument; and it can be changed only when the National Character degenerates and suffers alteration. "A man's Character is his fate" thus said Heraclitus of Ephesus. And this holds good also of a nation. So long as its character is maintained inviolate, it is beyond the power of Prelate, Prince or Parliament, to destroy or to change its fundamental constitution. Of those ancient personal liberties irrevocably guaranteed by our British Constitution, which the King at his Coronation pledged himself to protect and to guard, it may therefore truly be asserted that they were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

As John Grenleaf Whittier, the American Quaker poet, has shown:

"The rights and liberties affirmed by Magna Charta were deemed of such importance, in the XIIIth Century, that the Bishops, twice a year, with tapers burning, and in their pontifical robes, pronounced in the presence of the King and the representatives of the Estates of England, the Greater Excommunication against the infringers of that instrument. The imposing ceremony took place in the Great Hall of Westminster. A copy of the curse (anathema) as pronounced in 1253, declares that:

"'By the authority of Almighty God and the Blessed Apostles and Martyrs and all the saints in Heaven, all those who violate the English liberties, and secretly or openly, by deeds, word, or counsel, do make statutes, or observe them, being made against the liberties aforesaid, are accursed and sequestered from the Company of Heaven and the Sacraments of Holy Church'."

Such is the doctrine of Constitutions traditional to this realm and people. And assuredly this is no mere matter of academic or historical interest; for it provides the basis of current Conservative and Socialist theory (alike rooted in the organic and corporate conceptions of Human Society) and it accords rigorously with the science of positive sociology. But with lettre de cachet contrivances, such as Regulation 18B, it accords not at all.

Sir Henry Summer Maine, in his classic and authoritative work on Ancient Law, has pointed out that "the unit of an ancient society was the Family, of a modern society the individual." The Revolution of 1689 radically disrupted the age-long Policy of this Realm; abolished the Royal Prerogative to issue and control the Nation's Exchequer; created the National Debt; put the people at the mercy of usurers and moneylenders; and set in motion that familiar political process which begins with Oligarchy and ends in Ochlocracy, or mob rule. Not at once, however, did the National Character manifest any profound deterioration—despite the trans-valuation of National values permanently achieved by Puritanism, finding triumphant expression in the despotic regime of Oliver Cromwell, an upstart dictator, who represented middle and trading class interests.

In the heyday of Whiggish Plutocracy, the political liberties of the people were reasserted and reinforced by Habeas Corpus and the Bill of Rights. Constant were the efforts made, under various ingenious pretexts, to circumvent and to frustrate these instruments; but such efforts were defeated—not indeed by counter-revolution, but by the rude Radicalism of artisans and labourers.

It was the elementary truths restated in the foregoing thesis that prompted much conscientious opposition to the introduction of large sections of Emergency Regulations. Some legislators found it hard to accept the belief that Parliament had authority to attack the fundamentals of the National Constitution at the supposed demand of a passing moment in the life of the Nation, and a few more were sorely distressed by the wrong that might be wrought against innocent people by trespass against ancient Rights. In the great clamour of the time the voice of conscience was stilled or stifled; panic overcame reason and the Regulations passed into Law.

Now it was that the dissentients found balm for their minds in seeking ways to mitigate the evils that had been effected. They pressed for safeguards against improper treatment of those who would be victimised by 18B. Much new support was also forthcoming for this new "conscience" move, an indication of some feeling in the House of Commons being given by Mr. D. M. Foot, when he said:

"We are imprisoning a man under this regulation, not because he has been tried and found guilty of any offence under the Law . . . . but simply because the Minister considers it desirable that he should be detained. I suppose that is what is meant by the posters which tell us so frequently that our freedom is imperilled.—Hansard, October 1st, 1939).

THE LEGAL ASPECT OF REGULATION 18B.

The foundation-stone of British liberty was laid over seven hundred years ago when the momentous clauses safeguarding the freedom and property of every freeman in the country were set forth in the Great Charter. "No freeman," says Clause 7, "shall be taken or imprisoned or dispossessed of his tenement or be outlawed or exiled or any otherwise destroyed; nor will we go upon him nor send upon him unless by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land." Equally unequivocal is the following clause 8—To none will we sell, to none will we deny or delay right or justice.

If the Home Secretary had, after careful consideration, determined to smash Clause 7 into as many fragments as possible under the sledge hammer of 18B, he could not have succeeded more completely. The detainee was in fact "taken" (frequently in handcuffs); was in fact "imprisoned" (in most cases more rigorously than the average convicted felon); was in fact "dispossessed of his tenement" (by the simple expedient of being denied earning-power wherewith to maintain it); was in fact "exiled" (in the Isle of Man, at least one case, in Canada); and was "outlawed" (insofar as from first to last no legal aid was allowed him at his appearance before the Advisory Committee); and finally his reputation, frequently his domestic happiness, his financial stability and his hope for a prosperous future was utterly "destroyed."

Equally shattering is the Home Secretary's destruction of Clause 8. In hundreds of cases men have begged to be tried by the law of the land, even in secret, before a legally constituted court, with the "right" of facing their accusers, answering a specific charge, cross-examining witnesses, and knowing the evidence they were called upon to refute. All this was "denied" them. They were imprisoned weeks and months before receiving their reasons for detention, and before appearing in front of an Advisory Committee. Then, only after further long delay, were they informed of the result of this hearing. From day to day, for months, and, in some cases, for years, men were kept in suspense to await justice.

Upon the foundation of the Great Charter, and in some respects even earlier was, throughout the years, built up the formidable edifice of English Common law, designed to safeguard the personal liberty of even the meanest of the King's subjects. In a confirmatory charter Edward I. directed that the fundamental clauses of the Great Charter be allowed as the common law and "all judgments contrary to it were declared void."

Charles I. after attempting to assert his prerogative of taxing without the consent of Parliament, and imprisoning without trial, was forced to consent to the Petition of Right, and, in the reign of his son, the Great Charter, elaborated by the Petition of Right, was perfected by the Habeas Corpus Act. At the revolution of 1688, and again in the Act of Settlement, all these rights and liberties were declared by the statute to be—"the birthright of the people of England according to the ancient doctrine of a common law."

Blackstone, our great jurist, writing 168 years ago, took particular pains to show how the fundamental articles of Magna Charta which could not be abrogated like ordinary statutes, had been perfected by the writ of Habeas Corpus, and by the Habeas Corpus Act of Charles II., the whole purpose of which, was in Blackstone's words—

". . . . to ensure that no subject of England could be detained without cause or reason."

He continues with this pregnant observation:—

"Of great importance to the public is the preservation of this personal liberty; for if once it were left in the power of any magistrate to imprison arbitrarily whomever he or his officers thought proper (as in France it is daily practised by the Crown) there would soon be an end to all other rights and immunities."

Elsewhere Blackstone exposes the fallacious argument put forward by some authorities that it is less dangerous to the commonweal to take away a man's life or property without accusation or trial than to imprison or intern him, maintaining that such gross and open acts of despotism must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the kingdom. "But", says Blackstone, in words which to-day seem strangely prophetic—

"confinement of the person by secretly hurrying him to gaol where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten, is a less public, less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government."

It must not be supposed that this formidable fortress designed to protect and safeguard the liberty of all citizens is a structure of rapid and haphazard growth. Throughout the centuries the foundation of Magna Charta has been built up brick by brick by generations of sound and conscientious lawyers. And the cement that binds together the stones of this seven hundred years old bulwark against arbitrary oppression of the subject, established out of blood, tears, toil, and sweat of men who put justice before all else, is the simple principle that "no subject shall be imprisoned who has not been proved guilty of an offence."

By one stroke of panic legislation all this has been demolished: the foundation-stone of Magna Charta has been removed and the corner stones of the Bill of Rights and Habeas Corpus have crashed with it. All that now stands between any citizen and his secret and hurried incarceration in a gaol or prison camp is the incalculable whim of whoever may chance to be in the office of Home Secretary.

THE DEFENCE REGULATION 18B IN PRINCIPLE.

THE ORIGINAL REGULATION 18B.

The original Defence Regulation 18B (Statutory Rules and Orders, 1939, No. 978) was made by Order in Council on 1st September, 1939. It provided that certain restrictive orders, including a detention order, might be made against "any particular person" by the Secretary of State, "if satisfied" (for the defence of the realm, etc.) "that it is necessary so to do."

It also provided that a detained person might make objections to an advisory committee, appointed by the Secretary of State himself, the advice of which the Secretary of State was not bound to accept, thus making him judge in his own cause.

Public apprehension having been aroused as to the arbitrary and far-reaching powers which this Regulation gave to the Secretary of State (and, in practice, to unidentifiable officials), there was, on 31st October, 1939, a motion in the House of Commons to the effect that the Order in Council be annulled. In the debate which followed, the Regulation was severely criticised from all quarters of the House. It was defended by only one Member besides Sir John Anderson, then Home Secretary.

Mr. Herbert Morrison, the present Home Secretary, in his attack upon the Regulations, said (Parl. Debates, Vol. 352, col. 1844):

"I am not going to use the argument usually put forward as a matter of courtesy that we do not believe the present Minister would be wicked but that we are afraid his successors might be. I think that any Minister is capable of being wicked when he has a body of regulations like this to administer."

Mr. Morrison ended his speech by saying that he was "exceedingly apprehensive." That was the view of the Present Home Secretary.

At the conclusion of the debate, Sir Samuel Hoare, then Lord Privy Seal, gave an assurance that amended Regulations would be introduced within two or three weeks, after general agreement had been reached with the Members who had been critical. The House accepted this assurance, and the motion for the annulment of the Order in Council was accordingly withdrawn. This appeared to be a triumph of parliamentary rule over despotism.

THE AMENDED REGULATION 18B.

The amended Regulation 18B was part of an Order made on 23rd November, 1939 (S.R. & O. 1939, No. 1681).

Paragraph (1) of this amended Regulation is now as follows:—

"If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to be of hostile origin or associations or to have been recently concerned in acts prejudicial to the public safety or the defence of the realm or in the preparation or instigation of such acts and that by reason thereof it is necessary to exercise control over him, he may make an order against that person directing that he be detained."

An additional paragraph (1A), which was added by Order in Council on 22nd May, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 770), authorises detention orders by the Secretary of State if he has reasonable cause to believe any person to be a member of, or to have furthered the objects of, any organisation "as respects which the Secretary of State is satisfied that" it comes into a category of dangerous organisations as specified in some detail in this paragraph of the Regulation.

Paragraphs (3), (4), (5) and (6) elaborate but do not materially alter the provisions for the appointment, by the Secretary of State himself, of an advisory committee, or committees, to which persons detained may make representations, also for monthly reports to Parliament as to the number of persons dealt with under the Regulation and the action taken.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE REGULATIONS.

It is noticeable that the revised Regulation 18B unlike the original Regulation, does not authorise detention orders "against any particular person" by the Secretary of State "if satisfied" that "it is necessary" for certain reasons. The revised Regulation lays down that the Secretary of State must have "reasonable cause to believe" certain specified facts concerning such person or that he has done certain specified things.

WHY DID PARLIAMENT AGREE?

It might appear to some that there is, legally, a considerable difference between being "satisfied" as to some particular thing and having "reasonable cause to believe" some particular thing. No one can argue whether another person is, or is not, "satisfied" as to certain facts or necessities. The other person can maintain that he is satisfied, and that is the end of the matter. But it may seem to some that it is possible to argue whether another person has, or has not, "reasonable cause" to believe certain allegations, even if it is quite clear that the other person honestly believes himself to be reasonable.

It is evident that Parliament took the view that the two expressions meant something different. There was no motion that the revised Regulation 18B be annulled, although, apart from the alterations in the wording referred to, there was no important difference between the old and the new Regulations.

Actually the new Regulations were accepted without question, because, in the meantime, the war had gone badly for "the democracies," and the feeling of panic in the House and in the Country had increased. The House of Commons was prepared to accept the Government's word that the alterations made in the wording were satisfactory. It was assumed that any person genuinely aggrieved by a detention order would be able to obtain ultimate redress by applying to the High Court for a writ of habeas corpus, which would lead to an investigation into the facts by an impartial and independent Court of Justice.

HABEAS CORPUS.

In August, 1940, an application was made to a Divisional Court of the King's Bench for a writ of habeas corpus in respect of a British-born subject who has been detained under Defence Regulation 18B. In his affidavit, supporting this application, the individual detained denied the allegation which had been given as the reason for his detention. The affidavit of the Home Secretary, who opposed the issue of the writ, was to the effect that he "had reasonable cause to believe" the allegations because they had been reported to him by officials whom he deemed reliable. It was also urged by Counsel for the Home Secretary that these officials must remain unidentifiable. The Court dismissed the application without hearing evidence as to the facts in dispute, although the individual detained had been released by order of the Home Secretary shortly after the appeal had been entered.

After a sharp cleavage of opinion among the Law Lords engaged in the now famous, or infamous, Liversedge case it was unequivocally established that this whim of the Home Secretary cannot be questioned by any authority, and that he is answerable to no man for the reasonableness of his cause to believe that a detainee is an object of suspicion and therefore worthy of detention. Mr. Liversedge had issued a writ against Sir John Anderson, a former Home Secretary and Mr. Herbert Morrison, present Home Secretary, claiming a declaration that his detention was unlawful and asking for damages for false imprisonment. His application for particulars of the grounds on which the Home Secretary believed him to be a person of hostile associations was refused, the court holding that "the onus does not lie on the Home Secretary to prove the facts which were considered to justify the order for detention."

It was against this refusal that Mr. Liversedge appealed to the Law Lords in September of 1941.

Lord Maugham, in conjunction with Lord MacMillan, Lord Wright and Lord Romer upheld the ruling of the Court of Appeal. In giving judgment he said:—

> "To my mind this is so clearly a matter for Executive discretion and nothing else that I cannot believe that those responsible for the Order in Council could have contemplated for a moment the possibility of the action of the Secretary of State's being subject to the discussion, criticism and control of a judge in a court of law."

The result of this dictum was that the Home Secretary was given a completely free hand to imprison whomsoever he wished "provided only" Lord Maugham adds, "that he acted in good faith."

A moment's reflection will convince anybody that since no-one, least of all the unfortunate detainee, the victim, has the power or right to question the Home Secretary's reason or grounds for arrest and detention, it is beyond anyone's power to show whether the Home Secretary is acting in good faith or not.

The vigorous dissenting judgment of Lord Atkin in this case was only the forerunner of a spate of protests from thoughtful and farseeing members of the general public. He said:—

> "I view with apprehension the attitude of judges who on the mere question of construction, when face to face with claims involving the liberty of the subject, show themselves more Executive minded than the Executive. In this country amidst the clash of arms the laws are not silent. They may be changed but they speak the same language in war as in peace. It has always been one of the pillars of freedom, one of the principles of liberty for which on recent authority we are now fighting, that the judges are no respectors of persons, and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachment on his liberty by the Executive, alert to see that any coercive action is justified in law. In this case I have listened to arguments which might have been addressed acceptably to the Court of the King's Bench in the time of Charles I. I protest, even if I do it alone, against the strained construction put upon words with the effect of giving an uncontrolled power of imprisonment to the Minister."

Later in his judgment Lord Atkin again refers to the "strained construction" put upon words, scathingly saying that he knows of only one authority which might justify the suggested method of construction. He proceeded with the following quotation from "Alice in Wonderland":

> "'When I use a word,' Humpty Dumpty said in a rather scornful tone, 'it means just what I choose it to mean, neither more nor less.'
> "'The question is,' said Alice, 'whether you can make words mean different things.'
> "'The question is,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'which is to be master . . . . that's all' . . . . "

Lord Atkin concluded his judgment with the words:—

> "I am profoundly convinced that the Home Secretary had not been given an unconditional authority to detain; and in my opinion the appeal ought to be allowed."

On the following day, and for many days afterwards, at first slowly and later in increasing numbers, confirmatory opinions from men of eminence and standing in the legal and political world began to make themselves heard. One may select at random from a great mass of writings and speeches to find typical opinions, weighty with misgivings and alarm at this generally unperceived filching away from the people of their ancient safeguards against oppression.

Mr. Gerald Gardiner, in a letter in the "Times" (6/11/41) says:—

> "The original regulation 18B conferred on the Home Secretary an absolute discretion to detain persons if he was "satisfied" of certain things. On October 31st, 1939, upon a motion in the House of Commons to assail the regulations, grave dissatisfaction was expressed in the House on the ground that the regulation left the liberty of the subject to the sole discretion of the Home Secretary. The Government thereupon withdrew the regulations and agreed to amend them to meet this and other objections, and on November 23rd, 1939, the amended regulations were made, the new Regulation 18B providing that the Home Secretary could only detain if he "has reasonable cause to believe" those things of which previously he had only to be "satisfied." What is one to think of an Executive whose law officers now argue that the amended regulations mean, and must have intended to mean, precisely the same as the regulation which was withdrawn?
> "It may be presumptious for an ordinary lawyer to express a view upon the decision of the House of Lords, but as so distinguished a lawyer as Lord Maugham has thought your columns an appropriate place in which to comment upon part of the speech of another member of the tribunal, it may be permissible for a humble member of the Bar to follow his example and to say that in places where lawyers meet, the view being yesterday expressed by lawyers of all shades of opinion was one of admiration for, and gratitude to, Lord Atkin for his dissenting speech, the contents of which appear to some ordinary lawyers to be unanswerable."

Another well-known lawyer, Mr. F. H. Hamilton, subscribed as follows:—

> "It is well to remember that we are fighting not only Hitler but the spirit of Hitlerism and that those who have noted during the last twenty years the increasing power of the Executive and its growing independence both of the Legislature and the Judicature, and the gradual deterioration of public opinion which has rendered possible these developments, may well ask themselves which in the long run is likely to prove the more pervasive enemy." ("Times," 15/11/41.)

And as a last example of the comment aroused by the Liversedge judgment here is part of a letter from Mr. P. E. Roberts, a high authority on Law and History, of Worcester College, Oxford:—

> ". . . . Parliament surely will not let the matter rest here. The Liberty of each one of us, it appears, lies at the mercy of a single minister, and his bare unsupported statement that he believes himself justified, puts an end at once to all that elaborate machinery—once our national pride—created by the wisdom of ages to protect the rights of the individual. It may perhaps at least be permissible to observe that one can hardly conceive a more amazing paradox than that this should be the law in a country that is never weary of assuring the world that she is fighting for the liberty of the private man and for freedom of opinion. Lord Maugham resents comparison with the reign of Charles I. but that monarch never claimed wider powers than those exercised by Mr. Morrison, however different may have been his motive for their use, and, at any rate, the power of arbitrary imprisonment was only claimed for the King and his Council, not for a single official." ("Times," 12/11/41.)

But Mr. Robert's hope, and that of hundreds of bewildered victims of 18B, that "Parliament will not let the matter rest," was doomed to inevitable disappointment, for the simple reason that the threat of the uncontrolled power of the Home Secretary to imprison hung over Members of Parliament equally with the rest of the public, as Mr. P. C. Loftus, Member for Lowestoft, pointed out in this letter to the "Times" on November 15, 1941. He wrote:—

> "You conclude your leading article in to-day's issue with the words—'the present Parliament has conceded powers in some respects exceeding what any Stuart claimed; but the safeguards against encroachment are secure in its own hands.'—Are they really secure under all conceivable future contingencies? Is it not a case of 'quie custodiet ipsos custodes'? The only check now left upon the power of the Executive to imprison indefinitely without trial any citizen, resides in the power of the unofficial rank and file members of all parties to criticise and control the actions of the Home Secretary. They alone are his judges, but he is now given absolute power to imprison any of these judges and critics. He may intern any Member of either House upon vague allegations without the House itself or any independent committee thereof being allowed any information whatsoever as to whether or not there may be a prima face case for such detention. . . . "

Another Member of Parliament, Mr. E. Bennet, in a letter published in the same issue of the "Times" stresses Mr. Loftus' protest as follows:—

> "Many thoughtful men and women both inside and outside the House of Commons find it difficult to share Mr. Casswell's conviction that 'no order is made under regulation 18B except after very careful consideration of the reports submitted.'" The official statistics not only prove, as Sir Irving Albery points out, that over 100 persons (the actual number was 128 up to the date of this letter) have been detained in prisons by the Minister against the decision of his own Advisory Committee, but reveal another disturbing fact. Up to July 31st, 1941, the cases of 1,566 detainees have been reviewed of whom no fewer than 811—more than 50 per cent. have been set at liberty. Apart from the legal aspect of 18B, and its working, what is the ordinary layman to think of the character and quality of the evidence on which the Home Secretary feels justified in imprisoning 811 men and women who, after varying periods of detention are declared to be innocent.

"Could not the investigation which secures the release of British Citizens, imprisoned without charge or trial, be made before they are consigned for months to the cells of Brixton Gaol?

These misgivings in the Press from numerous Members of Parliament were echoed inside the House on the several occasions when 18B came up for debate, but all Members, whatever their private opinions, gave vent to them in very guarded terms. This reluctance to present misgivings to an issue is probably due to the fact that one of the first victims to be seized and incarcerated by the Home Secretary was one of their own colleagues, Captain A. M. Ramsay, Member for Peebles.

Captain Ramsay's case is an awkward one to defend. His marked opposition to the Freethought movement, his somewhat notorious Anti-Semitism, and his belief in suppressing democratic opinions deprive him of radical sympathy. The fact remains that he has been treated disgracefully. There are offences known to Common Law as comforting or adhering to the enemy. If Captain Ramsay's views and conduct left him open to these grave charges he ought to have been indicted.

The New York Times Company went so far as to put some of this venom into print and was sued for libel. Although Captain Ramsay technically won his case the hearing was made the occasion for one of the most vicious personal attacks ever made in a Court of Law. Among other things he was described as a "traitor and an associate of felons."

The case produced a notable outburst against 18B from Mr. St. John Field who, speaking as a lawyer referred to:—

"This most immoral, unjust and detestable regulation destroying every right Englishmen have won in the course of centuries. "The right to a fair trial is one of the undeniable rights of every Englishman and I deny that war justifies injustice. This man was arrested without being told why; he was put in a common prison, and for three months subjected to the torture of solitary confinement of 20½ hours out of 24 hours a day—a punishment never inflicted on the worst criminals. It is because Captain Ramsay was in the position of being detained under 18B that he must not leave this Court without sufficient damages to clear his character from the odious charge made against him."

Despite the justice and eloquence of Mr. St. John Field's submission, and despite the fact that he technically won his case Captain Ramsay was awarded contemptuous damages of a ¼d. He thus left the court with his character still further impugned. He went back to his timeless sentence at Brixton Prison where he remains to this day.

The Ramsay case again aroused grave misgivings in the minds of the more thoughtful section of the public. Even men of violently opposite views joined in urging that if only a half of what had been imputed against him during the libel case be true then Captain Ramsay should be brought to trial. Though this demand arose as much from the desire to extract a "pound of flesh" from a guilty man, as from a desire to extend justice to an innocent, it was yet eminently reasonable. Here is a typical comment after the case, written by Stuart Campbell and published in the "Sunday Pictorial" on July 27, 1941:—

"To lock up a man for his thoughts is a gross violation of British justice. For, carried to its logical conclusion, it means that no-one who disagrees with the Government's methods is safe from the threat of prison. 'To be sure, we may accept Mr. Morrison's assurances that the Emergency Powers in the Defence Act conferred upon him are being used with the utmost discretion. But Mr. Morrison may not always hold the whip. We have had Cabinet Ministers in the past who have violently disagreed with the Prime Minister. Two years ago one of them might have made an excellent case for clapping Mr. Churchill into gaol. Simply because he clamoured for a real War Effort.' Let us watch the suspects by all means but let us give them a chance to prove later their innocence by working for the common cause. This country is not so well stocked with food that we can afford to feed it to several hundred freaks who are kept in idleness because somebody doesn't like the colour of their ties. 'It should be part of Mr. Morrison's job to stop the waste by sorting out the traitors. Then the others can be made to earn their keep like the rest of us. If a couple of them let us down we shall at least have the satisfaction of knowing that we practised freedom while we're fighting for it."

To sum up, it is no exaggeration to say that no man who differs from his fellows in his opinion of the Government's policy and dares to voice that opinion is safe from sudden and secret arrest. When that arrest comes for him he will be hurriedly consigned to a common prison where he may stay for an indefinite period. His condition may or may not be, according to the disposition of his gaolers, better or worse than those for the habitual malefactor. At his Advisory Committee, perhaps three, perhaps six months afterwards he will be in that position once described by a learned judge as that of "a blind man searching in a dark room for a black cat that isn't there." He will be condemned or released on evidence he will not be allowed to hear, given by persons he will not be allowed to see or know, concerning a charge which will not be laid against him. All he will be able to do will be go on making a guess at the point of issue between himself and his interrogators, answer the tricky and searching questions put to him by some of the finest legal brains in the country with as much adequacy as his commonsense and education may permit, and advance any reasons which may occur to him as to why he should not be kept in prison for the remainder of his life. If his answers or affirmations satisfy his inquisitors, and if the Home Secretary in his sublime omnipotence does not counter the Advisory Committee's recommendation, he may be set at liberty. After a month or more of suspense, waiting for a decision one way or the other, he is just as likely to be kept in durance as to be released, and he will thereupon continue his prison existence, probably in exile. Meanwhile his dependents outside may suffer indescribably by the loss of having a member of their family held as a potential danger to the State. In the fullness of time he may emerge, still not vindicated, ruined in reputation, possibly penniless, to sink or swim in a hostile and suspicious world torn asunder in its fight for freedom.

No wretched malefactor on ticket-of-leave with a prison record was ever in a worse case.

THE PRESENT POSITION

(1) As matters now stand there is no judicial safeguard for the liberty of the subject against arbitrary acts of the executive. This may be a matter of small concern to those who have confidence in the present executive and its unidentifiable officials. But such people should remember that we are at war and approaching an economic crisis of the first magnitude. These conditions may produce considerable changes in the executive and its unidentifiable officials and lead to a situation in which arbitrary powers may be used against persons quite different from those who have been detained hitherto.

(2) The judgment of the Court of Appeal implies that the principle of habeas corpus has been abrogated, as it was in 1914, without a specific enactment to that effect. It has been abrogated covertly, without the full knowledge and understanding of Parliament.

(3) It has now been shown that Regulation 18B extends the revolutionary change in the British Constitution attempted by the Defence Regulations in the first world war, and held valid at that time in the Court of King's Bench and the House of Lords. The Regulation has provided a more definite and more clearly recognised and avowed loophole whereby the executive can evade the principle that ordinary citizens and members of the executive are absolutely equal before the King's Courts of Justice. This equality before the law has always been regarded as a fundamental right of British subjects and a bulwark of their freedom.

IN PRACTICE

The foregoing notes should give a general idea of the seriousness of Defence Regulation 18B in its effect upon the traditional rights of British subjects. The notes below, which might be added to considerably, should indicate the degree of injustice suffered.

(1) When the Government was successfully challenged over the Defence Regulations in Parliament on 31st October, 1939, there were only thirty-five persons detained under Defence Regulation 18B. Eleven months later, on 30th September, 1940, the latest date for which figures are available, 1,628 persons had been arbitrarily detained and 247 persons as arbitrarily released. Of those who have thus been detained some are naturalised British subjects, some are aliens other than enemy aliens, but 853 are British-born subjects.

(2) It is not disputed that the period between a detention being made and the person detained being given access to the advisory committee has been generally about three months but in some cases nearly four months. During this period the person detained has not known the grounds on which the detention order has been made against him, or her.

(3) On 28th November, 1940, speaking in the House of Commons (Parl. Debates, Vol. 367, col. 324-5) Mr. Herbert Morrison, the Home Secretary, stated that a detained person is not necessarily given full information as to the reasons for his detention. He said that "the committee is perfectly free to exercise its discretion in giving full information . . ."

(4) It is admitted that detained persons have not been granted legal representation before the committee (as is always given, for example, to persons charged with murder): At the meetings of this committee the prisoner is examined, but no evidence is given, so that there is no cross-examination, and the proceedings in no way resemble a judicial trial. (Parl. Debates, Vol. 363, col. 611.)

(5) It is admitted that, in some cases, detained persons have had difficulty in communicating with and interviewing their solicitors; and it is also alleged that, by order of the Home Secretary, detained persons have not been permitted to communicate with their Members of Parliament (H.C. Paper, 164, 9th October, 1940, page 18).

(6) It is alleged that the conditions of imprisonment of detained persons are unusually severe, seeing that they are neither charged with, nor convicted of, offences against the law; and it is also alleged that they are refused access to members of the boards of prison visitors, as is authorised for remand and convict prisons (Section 2 of the Prison Act, 1898, and similar statutes).

(7) Defence Regulation 18B has been invoked for the purpose of detaining a Member of Parliament without charge or trial while Parliament is in session, thereby preventing him from discharging his duty to the electors and depriving his constituents of Parliamentary representation. The executive has sought to use the Regulation as a means of evading the principle of Parliamentary privilege. The continuance of Parliamentary government, and of our constitutional monarchy, demands a searching and impartial investigation of all the details of this particular detention order.

CONCLUSION

It may be argued in support of Defence Regulation 18B in its present form that it is, unfortunately, inevitable because we are at war. All are agreed that, in time of war, the authorities must be empowered to act promptly in apprehending suspected enemy agents, but any special powers given to the executive for this purpose make it more important than ever —not less important—that there should be adequate safeguards against injustice

Citizens who are detained must be given effective opportunity of access to impartial and independent tribunals, where justice is administered under the recognised rules. Any argument of the executive that such trials "would involve too many difficulties" must be an admission of timidity, or of insincerity or else of incompetence in the civil and military departments concerned. There is no difficulty about trying spies and persons accused of sabotage by ordinary courts in wartime.

The state of affairs brought about by Regulation 18B is totally at variance with the principles of justice which we are fighting to uphold. For the credit of our cause it must be terminated forthwith. This can be done simply and quickly by abolishing 18B.

FIFTH COLUMN FEVER

When the flames of war spread across Europe; first over Poland, then Norway, and then in May, 1940, over the Low Countries and France; fleeing civilians brought with them terrible tales of traitors and spies operating against their own countrymen and helping, in various ways, the advance of the German armies. There were stories of German inspired telephone calls, purporting to be official, giving regional commanding officers instruction, the carrying out of which led to disastrous consequences; there were stories of wilful and deliberate neglect of necessary precautions, such as destruction of bridges in the path of the enemy advance; and stories of secret messages and information to aid the German troops, written under poster advertisements. A spate of these stories found their way into the British Press and with Hitler's armies just across the channel and invasion of these Islands seemingly imminent a disturbing fear was widely manifest that these things might happen here. "Fifth Column Fever" was born.

On the morning of 9th April, 1940, when the resistance to the German invasion of Norway became futile, Major Quisling offered to form a Government. His offer was accepted by the Wilhelmstrasse. Immediately a new word was added to the English language. "Quisling" became a synonym for "Traitor."

On May 10th, 1940, came the German invasion of the Low Countries. That there were thousands of German Agents in Holland is probably true.

At 7.30 a.m. on May 28th, 1940, M. Paul Reynaud, the French Premier, delivered a broadcast speech informing the world that King Leopold III of the Belgians had surrendered to the Germans without previously informing the British and French High Commands of his intention to do so. By this action, said Reynaud, Leopold had left the Allied left flank completely exposed.

Mr. Churchill told the House of Commons that we should reserve judgment on King Leopold. Subsequently, in an action for libel against the "Daily Mirror," Admiral Sir Roger Keys, M.P., proved that Leopold had given the Allies ample warning of his intentions and that the French had duly received his message. Later still the Free Belgian Government in London completely exonerated His Majesty from all charges of traitorous activity.

For many months General Gamelin, Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Forces in France had been lauded by the press as the Twentieth Century Napoleon. After the break-through at Sedan, he was dismissed and replaced by General Weygand. Without the slightest indication of embarrassment the press performed a complete volte face and presented Gamelin to the world as a useless and incompetent soldier.

The Napoleon of April 1 became the Fifth Columnist of May.

So it was with Marshal Petain, the hero of Verdun, the Grand Old Man of France. When the Germans had taken Paris and were advancing towards the Loire, it was he who, at the age of 84, rallied a Government and sued for peace.

This was the chapter of events which led up to a fifth column panic in Great Britain. How that panic was encouraged and exploited is now common knowledge. It swept the country like a fever, assuming such proportions that the Government found themselves, by public demand, expressed in newspaper agitations, charged with the task of guarding against the particular dangers envisaged. The effect of this clamour was the rushing through Parliament of an amendment to the now notorious Regulation 18B and a general round-up under this and the previously existing Emergency Law. This new measure broadened the scope of the existing Regulations, under which relatively few detentions had been made. The precise terms of the amendment are as follows:—

"(1a) If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to have been or to be a member of, or to have been or to be active in the furtherance of the objects of, any such organisation as is hereinafter mentioned, and that it is necessary to exercise control over him, he may make an order against that person directing that he be detained.

The organisations herebefore referred to are any organisation as respects which the Secretary of State is satisfied that either—

(a) The organisation is subject to foreign influence or control—of

(b) the persons in control of the organisation have or have had associations with persons concerned in the government of, or sympathise with the system of government of, any power with which His Majesty is now at War, and in either case that there is danger of the utilisation of the organisation for purposes prejudicial to the public safety, the defence of the realm, the maintenance of public order, the efficient prosecution of any war in which His Majesty may be engaged, or the maintenance of supplies or services essential to the life of the community."

Thus it will be seen that the Home Secretary upon whom all powers under the Statute devolved, could issue orders for detention under three heads. The first class is persons

"Of hostile origin or associations."

The second class is persons acting in furtherance of the objects of an organisation which has been defined in the Regulation, and which is regarded, and was regarded, as a danger to the State. The third class is persons

"recently concerned in acts prejudicial . . . . or in the preparation or instigation of such acts."

By far the largest number of persons detained at the outset, fall into the second class.

ROUND-UP

Being an Account of the Manner of Arrest of Detainees held under Regulation 18B

Section 18B (1a) of the Defence Regulations was acted upon on May 23rd, 1940. Immediately it became law police swooped on British Union's Headquarters in Great Smith Street, S.W.1, and all persons entering the building were closely examined, even though they be only occupiers of, or callers at, other offices in the same building. All those having business with British Union, even to the lad collecting soiled towels for laundry service, were detained for questioning. Casual purchasers of books, newspapers or cigarettes at the British Union shop were treated in a like manner and herded together in a small reception room to await interrogation.

British Union supporters make much of this raiding. This has happened often to Anarchists and Socialists in the past without comment or protest from Conservatives and Fascists.

During a hectic morning, while C.I.D. officers ransacked offices and examined credentials of individuals not in their list of "wanted" men and women (a list which included persons disassociated from British Union for some years) several persons on the staff of the organisation were removed in police cars, men to Brixton Prison and women to Holloway Prison.

On the windows of the Ministry of Pensions office next door, Ministry of Information posters warned and exhorted—"Your Freedom is in Peril—Defend it with all your might." One young Fascist seems to have observed this stricture—evening newspapers pictured him resisting the attentions of the policemen.

Those same evening newspapers reported that police activity had not been confined to British Union's National Headquarters; Sir Oswald Mosley had been arrested at his house, John Beckett, Captain Ramsay, M.P., and several others had been apprehended at their homes or place of business.

The Police moved into British Union's offices for a complete investigation of all files and correspondence. On enquiry at Scotland Yard and the Home Office the answer was given that the organisation was free to continue its normal existence and that no restrictions were placed upon its newspaper "Action" and that the office would be available once more when the police had finished their "audit."

On May 27, 1940, Sir John Anderson, in a circular to the Ministry of Health, said that "no man will be penalised for the mere holding of opinions, however unpopular they may be." On that very day, Sir John Anderson ordered the round-up of several hundred British Union members for their opinions.

At this time, British Union was not proscribed and the official attitude was that its political activities were legitimate.

Then on the week-end of June 3rd, 1940, came the big police swoop. On and around that date homes were violated and ruthlessly torn apart by searchers who did not hesitate to wreak damage on private property. Letters and diaries, often of an intimate personal nature were hungrily scanned and even impounded. Books were seized as evidence, and a Member of Parliament has told the House of a case in which the works of John Stuart Mill were seized by the police (Hansard debate). It is perhaps only natural that the works of a great libertarian like Mill should be held in suspect by the Agents of Regulation 18B.

These happenings were incidentals in the round-up of hundreds of men and women.

Where the central C.I.D. were responsible for the apprehension of Detainees there are few complaints as to the manner in which they executed their task. Where local detectives and police handled affairs there is irrefutable evidence to the effect that many abuses occurred. Many cases can be proven of persons detained being treated with callous severity as harsh as could be meted out in dealing with the most depraved of criminals.

The following data are taken from signed statements of present and past detained:—

Mr. A. B., a 33-year-old bank clerk of London, was visited by detectives on July 3rd, 1940. After a questioning and a search of his property, and that of all other residents of the house in which he was living, he was escorted to Brixton Police Station. Both he and his mother were assured that he was not under arrest, but that the Divisional Superintendent of the C.I.D. wishes to interrogate him.

"At about five p.m.," writes Mr. B., "I was locked up in a police cell which was improperly ventilated because sand bags were stacked against the window. . . . There was only a dim glimmer of artificial light, the lavatory flush was unworkable, the emergency bell was out of order. I was given one blanket, a dirty one used by the police as a ground sheet during target practice. . . . I was allowed only two ten-minute exercise periods in 24 hours."

Mr. B. suffered these conditions for 14 days during which time no charge was preferred against him and no reasons for his detention supplied. On two occasions the police apparently forgot his existence and failed to supply him with food.

He was transferred from the police station to Brixton Prison, still without any reasons given for his arrest, and it was not until the 22nd of November, 1940, that a formal statement of the reasons for his detention was received by him at Ascot Camp.

Here is the statement of Mr. G. B. who, at the time of his arrest, was serving in the Royal Air Force. He had been a member of British Union in Shrewsbury, Salop.

"My wife and I were arrested on Saturday, June 22nd, 1940. I told the police that my wife was expecting her first baby. We were taken to Shrewsbury Central Police Station. My wife complained bitterly about the cold as she had only been supplied with two blankets. We were refused the right to see my sister to obtain a change of underwear. On the following Friday my wife complained that owing to a discharge she had been compelled to leave off her underwear. Her nerves were then in a very bad state. I asked to see the Chief Constable but the request was not granted. My wife was not attended by a doctor. On Saturday, June 29th, she was ringing the bell in her cell, and when I called to her she told me she had a haemorrhage. She continued ringing. I could not ring my bell as it had been disconnected when I demanded to see the Chief Constable. The Police eventually sent for an ambulance and my wife was removed to Shropshire County Council Hospital at Berrington."

"On Monday, July 1st, I was informed that I was to be taken to Liverpool Prison, and that my wife was to have an operation the next day for the removal of her baby. I requested permission to stay at Shrewsbury Prison until after the operation. This request was refused. I was allowed to see her for fifteen minutes in the presence of two detectives before I was taken to Liverpool Prison. On Tuesday, July 2nd, my wife had her operation, and, though she was still weak, she was removed by the police to Holloway Prison on Saturday, July 6th, 1940. Her health has been bad ever since.

It is impossible for persons in G.B.'s position to appreciate the fact that this is the general way in which all persons arrested in Britain are treated by the police authorities. The reason is that the poor are supposed to be dirty in their habits of life, and this belief is reflected in the condition of police cells, prisons, workhouses, and asylums.

Mr. H. S. E. of Canterbury, was arrested on June 4th, 1940. He spent one night in Canterbury Police Station and was then taken to Maidstone prison where he was given a cell in a convict wing. The Prison Governor gave him to understand that he was remanded for seven days pending enquiries. For three days he was without books or papers and spent only one hour per day outside his cell. On the sixth day he was told that he would be taken to Court the next day. The following morning a prison officer told him that the Canterbury Police "had nothing against him" and that he would be released. He was released at 8 a.m., and returned to his home at Canterbury. He called at the Police Station where property impounded at the time of his arrest was restored to him. Later a message was delivered to his home asking that he should call at the Police Station at 9 a.m. the next morning. He duly reported as requested and was thereupon re-arrested under Defence Regulation 18B.

The next is taken from a statement by Mr. D. J. I. of Bath, detained at Manchester:

"I was arrested at my place of work on Friday, June 21st, 1940, and taken to Mill Street Police Station. I was refused permission to visit my lodgings only five minutes' walk away, in order to settle accounts with my landlady, obtain toilet necessities and change from working clothes. After several hours waiting in various offices I was locked up in a small, unclean cell where I remained for three days without change of clothing, adequate bedding, exercise, newspapers or contact with the outside world. I was allowed to leave the cell only three times in those three days, once each morning for a wash. The toilet stank and was flushed only from the outside; there was no toilet paper. My cell had no natural light, as the small window near the roof was covered on the outside by sand bags and it was necessary to have artificial light all the time. I was not allowed to have meals supplied from outside or to have any exercise.

"On the first afternoon of my detention in this cell a police officer, accompanied by three constables, in their shirt sleeves and a warden took me into the corridor where they subjected me to a form of third degree. I was insulted and threatened with physical violence in addition to being told that I was to be put up against a wall and shot. The officer also threatened to kick me. As I re-entered my cell he struck me on the head and used obscene language."

The appropriate comment on this statement is that the general state of cells in police stations in England is filthy and always has been so.

The statement of Mr. C. W. W. of Slough is the more interesting in that it refers to another case. He was arrested on June 4th, 1940, and writes:

"I was taken to Aylesbury and put into a cell. A few hours later I was informed that I was to be taken to Walton Gaol, Liverpool. There were four of us to go including an elderly man of my acquaintance. This man, Mr. P.-T. was in a very low state of health. When handcuffs were produced and placed on his wrists I at once objected to this treatment of a sick man, besides objecting on my own behalf. I was told to shut my mouth. We were taken to Bletchley Station in a very small van, together with six police constables. When Mr. P.-T. complained about fumes he was told that "it could be made worse for him." While waiting for the train he asked for water which was only obtained after much argument. By this time my wrists were very swollen from the tightness of the handcuffs. When we arrived at Liverpool Mr. P.-T. was in such a weak state that he had to be assisted from the train.

"At Walton Gaol we had to wait in the Reception Office for between two and three hours, and it was not until I demanded to see someone in authority that Mr. P.-T. was taken into the Prison Hospital. This was the very last I saw of him. Three weeks later I was informed that he had died."

Such treatment is much too common, and arises from the conditions of absolutism and secrecy. Reading, Gillingham and Liverpool cases are typical experiences.

It is unlawful to handcuff persons against whom no charges have been made or are intended to be made.

Mr. R. R. of Tottenham, testifies that he was interrogated by plain clothes officers in a small room in Tottenham Police Station. He says:

"One of them, Inspector Bishop, smacked me across the face and tried to inveigle me into giving pro-German answers to his questions. Eventually they told me they had no more questions and I could go. When I was half way along the corridor they called me back and said they had decided to detain me. I was taken through a yard, where police were practicing rifle shooting, and an officer told me 'If I had my way I would let these men put you against the wall and shoot you.'"

"I was refused permission to send a telegram. I remained in the police cell nine days.

In many cases early treatment of detainees was precisely the same as that given to arrested criminals.

Mr. S. L. I., of Birmingham, writes:

"I had my finger prints and photograph taken at Birmingham Police Station. I was handcuffed and taken in a Black Maria to New Street Railway Station, where I was handcuffed to a plain clothes detective in full public view. I remained handcuffed throughout the seven hour train journey to Liverpool for delivery to Walton Gaol."

Photographs and fingerprints were also taken in the case of Mr. D. W. M., 19 year old laboratory assistant, detained at Cardiff on June 16th, 1940, and lodged for seven days at Cardiff Police Station where he was not allowed to obtain cigarettes or newspapers or to communicate with his parents.

The complaint against being handcuffed is repeated in many statements. A party of men from Sussex Towns were handcuffed in pairs at Horsham Police Station and marched through the streets of the town to the railway station for their journey to Liverpool. Parties of men transferred from Brixton Prison to Walton Prison were handcuffed to one another.

Mr. R. F. W. of Wimbledon, says:

"I was transferred from Brixton Prison to Walton Gaol handcuffed to another prisoner. When using the toilet on the train we had to do so together."

In a journey from Gloucester to Walton Gaol, Mr. R. L. G. was warned: "If you try any funny business you will be shot."

Mr. R. A. H. who was taken to Maidstone Prison was placed in Harcourt House Wing among convicted prisoners, although there was accommodation available among the remand prisoners. He says:

"I was in solitary confinement for 23 hours out of 24. This affected my nerves but the medical officer merely told me that I should have to put up with it. I was occasionally allowed out of my cell for longer periods on condition that I cleaned out closets after the convicts. After three weeks in Maidstone I was told that I was to be discharged, but outside the gates I was met by a policeman, detained under Regulation 18B and taken to Brixton Prison."

Mr. H. is one of several people against whom this mean and cruel deception of a release leading to further arrest has been practised.

Mr. A. C. G., of Wolverhampton, arrived at Walton Gaol, after a journey in handcuffs; he was put into a punishment cell with insufficient ventilation. His statement declares that he was almost suffocated during the night, and continues:

"The emergency bell in the cell was not in working order and I was unable to summon assistance. I was compelled to break some of the panes in the window to obtain air and more were broken by the warder the following morning, when the effects of the air upon me were obvious. It was admitted that I should never have been put into that cell."

Cases where both husband and wife were arrested, separated, and lodged in different prisons without any communication over a period of weeks have their own poignant anxieties and distress, all too obvious to need amplification here. Where there have been children dependent upon them their sufferings have been greatly aggravated.

Mrs. C., of Liverpool, a householder, had already seen her eldest son, William, taken to Walton Gaol before the police came to arrest her. Her youngest son, aged 10 years, was at home at the time of her arrest, and she was given no opportunity of any kind to make provision for his safe keeping. She was assured by the police that the child would be returned to her when she reached her destination. This little lad, ten years of age, was actually subjected to a police interrogation, after which, instead of being returned to Mrs. C., who was then in Holloway Prison, he was sent to an institution.

The only reason ever given for the arrest of the C's., was their sympathy with the Cause of British Union, a sympathy which they have shared at different times, and in less obtrusive fashion, with such men as the late Lord Rothermere, G. Ward Price, Wyndham Lewis, Beverly Nichols, Major General J. F. C. Fuller, Mr. Ezra Pound, Henry Williamson, Hugh Ross Williamson, and among others of the present House of Commons, Mr. Randolph Churchill, M.P.

Such callous treatment as that here recorded does, no doubt, seem incredible to all those who sincerely believe that Command Paper 6162 provided effective safeguards for the welfare of detainees. Either the police deliberately ignored this Paper, or, as appears more likely in the light of detainees' experience, they were totally unaware of its existence. Whichever explanation is correct there is shocking evidence of a culpable fault lying to someone's blame.

The opposition displayed by all liberal-minded Members of Parliament towards such repugnant emergency legislation as Regulation 18B, was to some extent dissipated by the belief that Command Paper 6162 would eliminate unnecessary harshness from its application.

If confidence in the efficacy of this safeguard is not shaken by reference to the cases already recorded, let your mind dwell on the plight of the detainees arrested at Sheffield.

The account given hereafter is from a deposition given by Mr. R. B., 25 year old married man, whose "offence" was that he had been a member of British Union and had contested a municipal election under the banner of the Mosley organisation. His statements regarding treatment are fully supported by other detainees who shared his unhappy experiences. He writes:

"Officers escorted me to the Sheffield Central Police Station where all personal property, including my spectacles, on which I have to rely, and excepting only the clothes I wore, were taken from me: I was permitted neither cigarettes nor my pipe. When I asked for these they were refused. I was put into a cell in which there were already three other British Union frinds of mine. Messrs. H. (a certificated school master who had been arrested and searched in front of his class of pupils), W. and C.

"The cell, about 13 feet by six feet, was exceptionally stuffy, and its only window was boarded up; such ventilation as existed was by a small hatch in the cell door. Along the wall of one side of the cell was a broad wooden bench about three feet wide. In one corner of the cell was a water closet.

"During the police interrogation I asked for my spectacles to be restored to me, but they were not returned until immediately prior to my leaving the Police Station.

"During the evening we applied for permission to contact a certain local Solicitor. Permission was refused by the Station Sergeant and our request to see the Superintendent on the matter met with further refusal. We were told that we could have neither access to solicitor nor to the cigarettes or other property.

"Later in the evening two more British Union acquaintances, Messrs. S. and D., were put into our Cell. We were then six human beings in the close confine of that stuffy, little cage.

"We were each given two blankets and expected to settle down for the night. Five of us managed to huddle across one another on the wooden bench, but the sixth had to sleep on the floor with his head against the water closet. Despite our request for the glaring electric light to be dimmed, it remained on all night. This, with the oppressive atmosphere and the shouting of a 'Drunk' in an adjoining cell, made sleep impossible. Early next morning we received breakfast—this being a repetition of the previous evening's meal, two slices of bread and margarine and a mug of tea.

"Shortly after eight o'clock the cell door was again opened and presently we each had an iron cuff placed round one wrist. Through this cuff was threaded a heavy steel chain and we were fastened in threes together. No reason was offered for this needless indignity and our protests were ignored. We were allowed to exercise along the corridor whilst chained in this fashion and so passed the morning.

"At about twelve o'clock our impounded personal articles were restored to us and we were taken downstairs and put into a police van with two policemen as warders. We then proceeded by road to Walton Gaol, Liverpool, where, at about two p.m., we were handed over to the Prison Authorities, and then, after nearly six hours the chains and shackles were removed."

This treatment was unlawful under Regulations.

So happened some of the arrests under Regulation 18B and though it be repeated that in many cases understanding of the Detainees' position was demonstrated in considerate conduct by arresting officers, there are yet at least a dozen cases for every one cited here that reveal inhuman treatment of a kind popularly accredited to the Nazi Gestapo.

No measure which strips a citizen of his rights, tears him from his family and casts him into timeless imprisonment can be interpreted without the imposition of gross harshness. By their very nature such measures must be punitive. But can any reason of State demand that a man charged with no offence, and at no time offering physical resistance against molestation, be paraded in manacles through the streets of his home town? Can any conscience on earth be other than revolted that pregnant women should be flung into cold damp cells and denied access to articles of personal hygiene?

You have seen photographs of chained slaves in the Southern States of America—photographs which caused world wide resentment. Have you not drawn some satisfaction from the fact that these things were remote from England? Have you not been comforted, perhaps self-righteously, because you feel that in our intelligent civilised country such things could not occur?

One of the questions often posed by the Home Office Advisory Committee before any release of detainees is recommended is: Has your detention made you feel any bitterness?

This is a most improper question and merely invites a false reply. Only the sense of power and hypocritical rejoicing in authority could prompt such a question.

WHO GOES THERE?

It is appropriate in a document of this nature that some attempt should be made to show who are the men held prisoner by Mr. Herbert Morrison.

What manner of men are they? What types do they represent? From what sphere of life do they come?

With a few notable exceptions the public does not know the victims of 18B. It is popular to think of them as toughs and hooligans, creatures without any normal traits, mercenary thugs lying in wait for the time when they may stab their country in the back. It is enough to say that they are Fascists and the average newspaper reader will visualise for himself a mob of low-browed sub-human gorillas.

The nastier, and more popular, newspapers have fostered this particular illusion. The Home Secretary, for his part, has described many of the men and women as "nit-wits." Taken all-in-all the public is given to understand that here are creatures different from the rest of their kind; therefore to be subjected to all kinds of gross indignity, degradation and misery without anyone's conscience crying out in horror.

Very few people realise that Regulation 18B has drawn into its net a representative cross-section of the British public. Very few seem to understand that detainees are much the same as other citizens motivated by the same human faiths, hopes, fears and aspirations. There would be a very different attitude to 18B if this matter was viewed in its true light—if each person considering the facts set down in this document pondered to himself: "There, but for the grace of God, go I."

When Mr. Morrison picks out a group of citizens for detention, or when he decides that a man or woman must remain in captivity, he may be behaving with perfect sincerity to his own lights in saying—"These people are a potential danger to the State." True, the wording of the Regulation requires that he must have "reasonable cause to believe" that his suspicions are well founded; but what may seem reasonable cause to Mr. Morrison may not seem so to—say—Lord Atkin. It is purely a matter of personal viewpoint in relation to certain known facts.

Mr. Morrison subscribes that he has reasonable cause to question the patriotism of people with certain ideas and political convictions. He does not publicly declare that political convictions have anything to do with the matter. Indeed, it would not look well if he did so because the bulk of the 18B detainees are people with political convictions diametrically opposed to his own. Nevertheless he does quite rightly point out that it is his duty to take that very factor into consideration.

It is quite logical that he should see such people as a menace to the State—at least, to the State as he wishes to see it constituted. It would be humanly impossible for him to free his outlook from his own deep-rooted convictions, and he must, therefore, approach the subject influenced by personal bias. A man who has spent his life in politics cannot divorce himself from them.

Now if Mr. Morrison, as a Labour Leader, regards himself as a potential saviour of the State, as his political supporters obviously suppose him to be, and if Mr. Jones, Brown or Smith obstruct Mr. Morrison's progress to power—perhaps with Fascist heckling—then Mr. Morrison is justified in looking on Mr. Jones, Brown or Smith as opponents of State interests. "Misguided" perhaps; "nit-wits" perhaps, but opponents of State interests just the same.

It is a singular comment on the aptness of this line of reasoning that there are several detainees whose political experience has largely consisted of obstructing the Party to which Mr. Morrison belongs.

Well, Mr. Morrison is Home Secretary. His "reasonable cause to believe" has been the ticket to gaol for many citizens who count themselves loyal. Moreover, the highest Court in the land has decided that Mr. Morrison is omnipotent. He is accountable for his actions and beliefs to no man.

A Home Secretary's personal opinions must inevitably bias his outlook on these and all other matters.

Suppose Mr. Willie Gallagher was Home Secretary; he might quite honestly credit himself with reasonable cause to believe that all "die-hard" Conservatives are a potential danger to the State, and accordingly he might clap them all into detention. Mr. Shinwell might put Mr. Churchill under restraint. Earl Winterton might lock up Mr. Morrison himself. Quite seriously, nobody can count themselves fully protected against the operation of such an enactment as Regulation 18B.

Turn now to an examination of Mr. Morrison's "bag."

It is already known that one member of Parliament is included; and it is also known that one Baronet and his wife are still in prison. Less known are the Admirals, Colonels, Majors and other officers and many rankers, ex-servicemen of this and the last war, who have fallen to the Regulation. These men comprise about one-third of the purely British men in detention. There is one man who was formerly a central pivot of the Naval Intelligence Service; there are some of the earliest of the original R.F.C. pilots; there are men who went through the ordeal of Dunkirk.

Two men who used a private vessel in a non-stop ferry service throughout the Dunkirk evacuation, and whose selfless, voluntary efforts restored hundreds of soldiers to our shores, only returned from their exertions to be collected under 18B and passed into Walton Gaol.

Then there are a large number of men from Company Directors and Factory Owners to technicians, skilled and unskilled, who could, if at liberty, be rendering valuable service to the nation's war effort. Capt. Marendez, the famous aeronautical expert, himself once in detention, subscribed in a newspaper interview after his release that:

> "In his camp quite forty per cent. of those detained were perfectly safe to be released, and also that he knew of a hundred capable aircraft workers detained."—"Sunday Express," 17th November, 1940.

Capt. Marendez' case is by no means the only instance of the expert with valuable, and even unique knowledge, being forced to waste his time in detention under 18B.

Doctors, solicitors, chemists, school and college tutors, manufacturers, journalists, geologists, steel workers, soldiers, pathologists, sailors, airmen, civil defence workers, laboratory technicians, farmers, labourers and pharmaceutists are all among the ingredients of the Anderson-Morrison 18B pie. These are men whom Morrison has described as "nit-wits," and the press has labelled "dupes," "scum," "rats," "corner boys" and "traitors." They represent a high average of British citizenship.

These are the men, be it well remembered, who, as is told in later pages, were hounded, chained, imprisoned in vile conditions, ill-fed, housed in the cages of beasts, held up to public opprobrium, brow-beaten, bludgeoned with questionings, denied normal recourse to justice, subjected to all manner of indignity and humiliation, insulted, impoverished, and transported. These are the victims of Regulation 18B about whom, for whom, and by whom, this document is written.

Consider the opinion of 18B given by Mr. Herbert Morrison, then just M.P., in the House of Commons on October, 1939. He said:

> "I am not going to use the argument usually put forward as a matter of courtesy that we do not believe the present Minister would be wicked but that we are afraid that his successor might be. I think that any Minister is capable of being wicked when he has a body of regulations like these to administer." (Hansard, Vol. 352. Col. 1846.)

Mr. Morrison was right. Subsequent events, including those over which he has had sole control, have amply proved his words.

The men who speak through this document are the victims of Sir John Anderson's and Mr. Morrison's administration of the regulation. Bear in mind that in slightly different circumstances, perhaps with another Home Secretary, the victim might be you.

ON EX-SERVICE DETAINEES

"A great many of the men under Reg. 18B served this country loyally and faithfully in the last war and many of them are decorated. Is anybody, any of those who, I believe, are primarily connected with this regulation, the Attorney General, the Lord President of the Council, or the Rt. Hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary justified without the most definite evidence in suspecting men who served this country in the last war and have been decorated for their valour in the field, and women too, merely because they happen to have had some association with principles which perhaps are not approved?"—Sir I. Albery (Hansard 367, No. 7, Col. 792).

In High Court decisions arising out of the application of Regulation 18B it has been clearly defined that the onus of proof, in establishing innocence of any offence or offensive intent, rests on the detainee himself. Eminent Counsel have argued that this sets an impossible task.

In point of fact the only evidence the detainee can produce is evidence of Credit. He can say, and in most cases he does say, "examine my personal record; the blamelessness of my past is my only evidence of good intent in the future."

Nobody knows better than himself that this is a very incomplete defence, but lawyers endeavouring to represent detainee's interests would like to know what other defence he can offer.

Where the inferred charge is one of disloyalty it is surely reasonable to suppose that the Ex-Serviceman, particularly he who has volunteered for service, given years of devoted campaigning to his country and manifestly demonstrated his willingness to forfeit his own life in the national interest, should be least subject to suspicion. The Ex-Serviceman, more than anybody else, is in a position to say —my record shows my complete unswerving loyalty.

Unfortunately the Home Secretary, whose own record during 1914-1918 was that of an opponent of war, fails to recognise the validity of this plea. He seems to believe that a man can abandon his loyalty with the same facility as a politician repudiates his principles. Thus we find among detainees—Admirals, Commanders, Colonels, Majors, Captains, Squadron Leaders and so many other Officers and ex-rankers that, at one time, the Ex-Service element in Ascot Camp made up more than one third of the pure British population. (They were approximately 100 in 280). Since then, after a long drawn out programme of releases, the percentage remaining in detention is not noticeably different.

It is a matter of unpleasant record that certain of the camp military guards and personnel, usually reluctant conscripts or bumptious Non Commissioned Officers, made a habitual practice of insulting Officer detainees. This behaviour was most obnoxiously evident in dealings between a Provost Sergeant and Detainee Lt.-Col. C., 63 years old Great War veteran. On one occasion this Sergeant shouted: "You can forget that Colonel business now—here you're just C. to me." Such calculated rudeness was an almost daily occurrence; and there is strong reason to believe that it was deliberately fostered by responsible Officers of the Camp Guards at Ascot, Huyton and Peel.

After leaving prisons for the relative freedom of prison camps Ex-Service Detainees met together regularly for discussion and organised themselves as a body for the purpose of making collective representations. In the course of discussion it was found that many men had been arrested while faithfully serving their units; some had been right through events culminating in the Dunkirk withdrawal. These men, arrested while in uniform, were forced to endure the added humiliation of wearing prison garb when lodged at the various gaols used for detainees. Uniforms were impounded and only restored immediately prior to transfer from prison.

In this connection there must be recorded a disgraceful incident during the removal from Walton Gaol to Ascot in July, 1940. When a party of 300 detainees were waiting at Lime Street Station, Liverpool, members of the military escort noticed that some of the men were wearing uniforms. With the approval of officers of the guard, and in full public view, these uniformed men were singled out and stripped of badges and buttons. In this shameful way were treated men who had volunteered to fight for King and Country. Remember that they had been charged with no offence, neither had they been discharged from the Services. Their treatment was quite unlawful and actionable. Yet, who would have listened to their complaints?

At the Camps it seemed that the Military Officials felt some discomfort in dealing with Service and Ex-Service men, some of whom were of senior ranks to themselves. Detainee H. was appointed a kind of liaison representative between the military and prisoners. His task was to voice the many legitimate grievances in the early days at Ascot Camp. So thoroughly did he perform this duty that he was expeditiously removed to Brixton Prison; a treatment generally accorded to those regarded as an "unruly influence in the camp." Captain G. P.-R. was similarly removed despite his strong protest. He was dragged along the ground to the gate, while the rest of the camp was kept back at the point of the bayonet.

Captain P.-R. was then a sick man. Much later he was released into hospital.

It is interesting to recall some of the observations of those very few Members of Parliament who discussed the plight of detained Ex-Servicemen, or who have mentioned individual cases.

On Tuesday, December 10th, 1940, Mr. Stokes (Ipswich) said:

"One hundred and fifty gallant Ex-Servicemen of the last war signed a petition to be tried by a proper Court as they had done nothing to be ashamed of . . . There are members of a military intelligence department, one of whom seems to be held because he knew too much about irregular dealings in oil in a particular part of Europe . . . There are instances of serving soldiers being held and kept waiting for months before knowing the reason for their detention.—Hansard, Vol. 367, No. 8, Col. 835/6.

During the debate on Emergency Powers (Defence) Act 1939 (Continuance), on July 23rd, 1941, Mr. Pickthorn (Cambridge University) referred to

". . . an Officer who held His Majesty's Commission. He was arrested; he was kept in detention a year. He got no pay for the whole of that time. He came out. He had not a registration card or a ration book. He could not seek civilian employment because he held His Majesty's Commission. He was not immediately re-employed by the War Office. Weeks passed; I believe he is still not posted. Fourteen or fifteen months must have passed since he was arrested and during the whole time it was impossible to earn a penny and it is not possible now. He is not allowed to fight for his country, nor to enter the civilian labour market. He is so to speak civilly dead."

In the same debate Mr. Stokes said:

"With regard to serving officers or men it has always been a matter of considerable surprise to me that they could be taken from their units and detained without being tried or sent before a Court Martial. I have the case of a young officer who was detained for six months, the only reason given for his detention being that he was a member of British Union. He never was a member of British Union so the Home Secretary cannot have satisfied himself that it was necessary to exercise control. He cannot have done anything of the sort for the only reason given was that this officer was a member of British Union when he was not, so presumably the Home Secretary did nothing. This man was let out after six months; he has not been re-engaged by the Army, he is left alone, what is he to do?"

At Peel Camp, Isle of Man, the Ex-Service section was at first headed by J. W. and E. C. D., both Officers and Pilots of the Great War.

Here the first task was to take the strongest possible exception to Manx papers' comments greeting the arrival of 18B detainees on the section of the document devoted to "The Island. These are dealt with separately in the Press"; they included such terms as "traitors," "rats" and "skunks."

From a representative group of 40 detainees at Peel, 18 men, between them, have given 114 years of military service; nearly seven years per head. These are the men whom the Manx press, and sections of the National press, dare to stigmatise as traitors.

Members of Parliament as a whole appear to have shown themselves singularly unsympathetic to the plight of ex-servicemen caught up in the net of the 18B regulations and probably 95 per cent. of letters to M.P.s have been completely ignored or barely acknowledged with a standard form of printed card. But just as every rule is proved by an exception a certain number of Members out of whom R. R. Stokes, Commander Bower, and Sir A. Albery appear most prominent, have realised the deplorable situation and have done their best to illustrate the position to the House.

Unfortunately many of their words of wisdom appear to have fallen on deaf ears. The percentage of ex-servicemen to the total interned has nearly always remained much the same—namely about one third of the all British section.

A primary protestation of ex-servicemen is against the fitness of Mr. Herbert Morrison as a person to judge their loyalty. When these men were fighting in bloody battles during 1914-1918, Mr. Morrison was an avowed Conscientious Objector. It is a bitter pill that he should be the man to now assess their loyalty. With all due respect to the Home Secretary these men believe, and are justified in their belief, that their loyalty has been proved in the face of more rigorous tests than are met in the House of Commons, in the Home Office, in the London County Council, or in the Labour Party Conference.

If military rewards count for anything, many of these internees earned high awards for bravery on the field of battle. Now they are caged, reviled, and spat upon by their countrymen, because their patriotism is questioned by an ex-Conscientious Objector.

"The onus of proving his innocence rests on the detainee." What greater proof could there be?

THE ANGLO-ITALIANS

Those who know Soho, in London, or have dwelt in any of the great ports, or in almost any Scottish town, will have some knowledge of the little Italian communities there. Clinging together, for religious reasons chiefly, they form a close-knit, generally unobtrusive and extremely hard-working circle, easy to get on with and troublesome to nobody. Through long residence here—often over several generations—accents have been lost entirely, or slurred over by the local accent, Cockney, Broad Lancashire, Welsh, Scotch, or what you will; and their sons and daughters, born here, show temperaments mellowed by some of our northern coldness. Good mixers (how dull our concerts in internment would have been without them!) they have assimilated better, perhaps, than any of our recent immigrants.

Many served in our forces during the last war and carry their medal ribbons with pride! And their sons followed suit in the present conflict, not reluctantly, but as naturally as does any Briton. Their outlook was perhaps best displayed when a party was sent from prison in Scotland to the York camp, and a military officer there asked for their nationality. They replied "British." He wrote down on his papers, "English," whereupon these alleged foreigners protested vigorously, claiming, as their accents proclaimed, that they were Scots!

Few of them knew anything about politics. If they followed the events of the last decade in Italy with interest, it was as, say, Mr. Smith of Ohio, whose family went over to the States a century ago, might feel his pulse stir sometimes when he heard news of the old town, somewhere in England, from which they sprang and which, in the boom years of the '20's he found time to visit. And when, in May, 1940, they heard of a round-up of British Fascists, they simply thought, along with the rest of the public, that it must be all right, that there couldn't be smoke without fire; they had come to respect British justice, to be proud of it.

Upon these people, also, the cold hand of 18B descended, around about June 10, 1940, bustling them into jails all over the country and later to internment.

The circumstances of arrest varied. Sometimes it came quietly and in a manner calculated to leave as little offence as possible; sometimes very much otherwise.

Many were taken from the Forces and, deprived of their uniforms, had to wear prison clothing. At Aberdeen the Prison Governor had no idea what they were to wear, and for 24 hours they remained naked in their cells—the experience of A. G. and others.

Mr. G. of Liverpool was visited at his home. His wife was away tending a sick relative, and his two children were expected home from school in a few hours' time. He was asked apologetically for permission to search his house, and then taken to the police station where, after much prevarication, he was informed that he must stay in custody overnight. Permission to telegraph his wife, or to arrange for anybody to look after his children was refused. Not until 10 days later was he told that he was being detained under Regulation 18B.

Two old men over 80, many years naturalised, and both with sons in the British Army, remained in detention for 8 months. Two other men, invalids, were only released in time to die out of internment.

In Edinburgh a boy of 15 was locked up in jail, eight others were only a year older; twenty in all below the age of 18. All were released a few months later when the Authorities had recovered some of their mental balance and a little of their decency. In the same city, a professor of Italian at the University was arrested; a quiet man of reserved disposition who had no fingers on either hand, and only with the utmost difficulty could handle the earthenware pot in which his prison food was served . . . it was a week before his plight was noticed, and some assistance allowed and two months before he was freed.

Yes, you may say, but there must have been some reason for arresting these people. But let us see.

A Liverpool man, whose family had been carrying on business here for 150 years and who was engaged in vital Government work which suffered badly during his internment, remained locked up for several months. His crime? He had married an Italian lady. The Tribunal which eventually examined him asked, in all seriousness, "Why did you marry an Italian woman?"

A little school in Soho was raided and the books seized, and many old pupils rounded up, presumably for having learned the Italian language. One youngster told in Brixton how, at the age of 12, his name was entered at this school, but he left it after a month's trial, and couldn't speak five words of the language, nor had he retained any contact with the Italian community.

Some had dual nationality, which means that they were born here of Italian parents and had not declared themselves at the appropriate age as having opted for full Italian nationality; they regarded themselves, as a matter of course, as British, willing to accept all the duties of a British subject. Others, through long residence here, had become naturalised, and had many relatives in the British Forces—one man for instance, had three brothers serving, and was awaiting his own calling-up papers. Yet others were Italian only by name, having long lost touch with their connections abroad.

Others were regarded more seriously, and received short shrift from the Advisory Committee when after a delay of some four-months its sittings began.

A number of these had retained cultural interests with Italy, or had visited it for short holidays. So with another Edinburgh man, an active Boy Scout Officer of many years' standing, a senior officer in St. Mary's Cathedral, and an A.R.P. Volunteer since September, 1938. His sole offence was that on one isolated occasion, he agreed, without payment, to escort a party of boys from a poor Scottish quarter to a Summer Camp in Italy. For that he is to be detained until the end of the war, a decision reached after a cursory examination lasting only 10 minutes. Five first-class testimonials were not even read. Nine other men heard on the same day were before the Tribunal for periods ranging from 3 to 5 minutes.

Other victims, whilst in this country, had belonged to "Fascio" Clubs. It must be explained that Italian clubs of a social nature have existed here for many years, and with the advent of Mussolini simply changed their name to "Fascios." Their interests are limited to sport, and social gatherings, members sometimes being given special facilities to visit Italian camps for brief holidays. The clubs enter football teams in local leagues just as any works or parish church may do, and have always been tolerated and often even assisted by the Authorities here.

These men, of so many different types, were rounded up, flung into jails and put at the mercy of hostile warders, whose attitude became human only after long contact had shown their charges to be just ordinary decent human folk, and finally lodged in internment camps; and all that time when British subjects were being allowed to walk about freely in Italy, subject only to restriction of travel.

Many remain interned. Although the Home Secretary may some day make capital out of it, it is little wonder that after 18 months of internment, a large number of them decided that the advantage of British nationality, after all, was not worth the candle, and voluntarily petitioned to be removed to an Aliens camp where, at any rate, they would be looked after by the International Red Cross.

THE ANGLO-GERMANS

Naturally there were a number of Anglo-Germans arrested at the outbreak of war, some even a day or two before, and these, along with those detained during the ensuing few weeks underwent all the hardships of early prisoners, as outlined elsewhere, at Wandsworth and other prisons; a further round-up, notably in Lancashire and London, took place following the fall of the Low Countries, later detainees going to Brixton or Walton, and women to Holloway and then to Port Erin.

It is known that nine men detained under Regulation 18B were sent overseas, seven (one of whom lost his life), being on the ill-fated Arandora Star. True some of these may have only nominally been of British nationality, but all the same there seems to be a conflict here with Mr. Morrison's remark, at the time the Isle of Man Bill was under discussion, that prior to that date no British subjects had been sent abroad—in this connection there is also one Anglo-Italian at Peel Camp, definitely of British Nationality, who was sent to an Italian Camp in the Isle of Man before the Bill referred to was submitted to Parliament.

Against these Anglo-Germans, charges mostly came under three headings: hostile origin; having lived in or been educated in Germany; or having retained connections with relatives or friends in Germany. The last charge always seems to us to be somewhat naive, since obviously anybody wishing to establish here with the object of turning traitor in war-time would make it a first task completely to dissociate himself from quarters likely to become suspect at times of crises; but it is not for us to teach Intelligence Departments their job. . . .

Altogether, a little over 100 were detained; some naturalised here, or the children of naturalised parents; others with one or both parents German, but born here and therefore having dual nationality. Mostly it might be said that at the time of arrest they had no strong political convictions one way or the other; their bread and butter was in England and that governed their sympathies. If to-day, after two years or more of internment, their opinions have crystallised into something very much against us, it is something not difficult to understand.

There were hard cases. One man who spent months in prison or camps before release, was over 70. Another in the 60's, had just had an eye operation before arrest, leaving him, for the time being, in constant pain and nearly blind, so that as soon as the light became dull he had to be led around; men felt savage when they saw him endure agonies at Walton, because ointment to relieve his pain was not made available; he too, was let free after some months of internment.

Inevitably, too, there were queer cases, or should we say, queer charges. Against one young man it is charged that his sister is also detained; his sister's indictment bore the allegation that her brother is also locked up! With such a deadlock there would seem to be no hope for either of them! Stranger still is the instance of a naturalised German being charged that he "Has always been closely associated with his Father (until death). Mother and Sisters, who are German citizens." A condition of affairs only remarkable and reprehensible, we should think, to the blimpest of blimps. His mother was arrested at the same time on the charge that her son was also under detention, but was let free after three weeks; the sisters were also released after an interval of 8 months; but the son, the only British subject amongst them remained behind barbed wire, although as recently as March 1939 the Home Office was so satisfied with him that it granted him naturalisation papers.

Another young man is detained as being of hostile origin, whilst his brother has been called up for the army and expects to be jailed for refusing service.

A few are ex-servicemen of the last war, and several were arrested out of the army.

Before the Advisory Committee, hearings have generally been short, inclined to deal with matters quite extraneous to matters of loyalty. What was the object of pressing a man for reasons why he had been living with a woman without having married her? This was a completely irrelevant question and never ought to have been put.

BRITISH UNION CASE

"Mr. Watkins (Hackney Central): 'They are all guilty in varying degrees, and it rests with the Home Secretary to decide whether they are sufficiently guilty to be detained.'

"Mr. Maxton (Glasgow, Bridgeton): 'Of what are they guilty? They are guilty, and so am I, and so is the hon. gentleman of . . . .'

"Mr. Pickthorn: . . . . 'Is it in order to say that they are guilty?'

Mr. Maxton: 'I agree that they are all guilty—but the hon. member is guilty, and I am guilty, and the Home Secretary is guilty—of having political views.'" (Hansard, 21st July, 1942: Col. 1458/9.)

Of the original 1,769 people detained under Regulation 18B, the majority were persons of hostile origin, of Italian or German antecedents; a few, including suspected I.R.A. members, were held because believed likely to commit acts prejudicial to the safety of the Realm, or for hostile associations; and the rest were members or ex-members of organisations believed to be covered by the provisions of 18B (1a). Into this latter class and forming the bulk of the pure British detainees, fell some 753 men and women held because of their connection with Sir Oswald Mosley's British Union. These persons were arrested subsequent to May 22nd, 1940, and were variously detained in Brixton, Walton, Stafford and Holloway Prisons during the following months. From time to time, men were released from this number, and the unfortunate remainder went through detention camps at Ascot, York and Huyton; with the exception of certain leading figures who have spent the whole time in Brixton Prison. At the time of writing, there are still 141 British Union cases in detention, at Brixton, Holloway, Peel and Port Erin.

As so large a proportion of 18B arrests fall into the British Union category, it is right and proper that some examination be made as to why this should be so. First then, observe the official grounds for action against this body.

Regulation 18B (1a) is worded as follows:

"(1a) If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to have been a member of, or to have been or to be active in the furtherance of, any organisation as is hereinafter mentioned and that it is necessary to exercise control over him, he make an order against that person directing that he be detained.

The organisations hereinbefore referred to are any organisations with respects which the Secretary of State is satisfied that either:—

(a) the organisation is subject to foreign influence or control;

(b) the persons in control of the organisation have or have had associations with persons concerned in the government of, or sympathies with the system of government of, any power with which His Majesty is at war and in either case there is danger of the utilisation of the organisation for purposes prejudicial to the public safety, the defence of the realm, the maintenance of public order, the efficient prosecution of any war in which His Majesty may be engaged, or the maintenance of supplies or services essential to the life of the Community"

That was the amendment to Defence Regulations which gave the Home Secretary power to act. It will be seen that in its broad essence it could have had very wide application. The Communist Party certainly could have been rounded up under these terms, and the Conservative Party has had leaders who "have had association with the government of" Germany and Italy. Even the Labour Party could be condemned for possessing, prior to the war, a disarmament policy in a world fast arming to the teeth. This argument is not advanced lightly, or because of any belief that members of the parties named should have been detained. It merely demonstrates that to be victimised under 18B (1a) an organisation had to be no more culpable than any of the generally respected parties of the State.

But it has since become quite clear, and Mr. Morrison has admitted the fact, that the new legislation was primarily designed to justify the detention of members of the British Union.

On certain of the forms issued in June and July, 1940, there is featured the following preamble:

"2. The organisation known as British Union is subject to foreign influence.

3. That Oswald Ernald Mosley as one of the persons in control of the organisation, has or has had associations with persons concerned with the Government of Germany, a power with which His Majesty is at war.

4. That the said Oswald Ernald Mosley, as one of the persons in control of British Union, and other persons in such control, have sympathies with the system of government in Germany, a power with which His Majesty is at war.

5. There is danger of the utilisation of the organisation known as British Union for purposes prejudicial to the public safety, the defence of the realm, the maintenance of public order, the efficient prosecution of the war in which His Majesty is engaged or the maintenance of supplies or services essential to the life of the community."

This was the formidable indictment against British Union. It fitted the terms of 18B (1a) like a glove, and quite rightly so since it was "made to measure." It is a measure of justification of the Home Secretary's action which should surely have been given widest publicity, if only to allay the widespread anxiety against application of the regulation. Yet not only was this extraordinary list of allegations kept in shamefaced obscurity, but it was completely dropped from later forms of reasons for detention.

Now why was this weighty evidence cast aside and neglected? Why did this preamble fall out of use?

The main count in this indictment is the charge (2d):

"There is reasonable cause to believe that between the years 1932 and 1937 the organisation has been in receipt of monies from Italy."

It is possible to answer the charge by quoting an independent source.

Mr. R. R. Stokes, speaking in the House on the 10th December, 1940, said:

". . . . In connection with British Union, I must say a word about the chief protagonist of that organisation, Sir Oswald Mosley. I think it should be said, although I am not a sympathiser in any way with their point of view or their activities, he appeared before the Advisory Committee and the Committee invited his solicitors to help them in discovering whether or not any foreign money was coming into the organisation of British Union. After a most exhaustive search, in which all the banks joined, the Committee and solicitors had to admit that no foreign money of any kind was coming into that organisation." (Hansard, Vol. 367, No. 8, Col. 534.)

Most of the other charges relate to the person or personal activities of Sir Oswald Mosley himself.

For the present it is enough to refer again to Mr. Stokes' speech of December 10th, 1940. He then told the House:

"After sixteen hours cross-examination, Mr. Norman Birkett indulged in this conversation with Sir Oswald Mosley, which I think ought to be quoted and put on record whatever one's feelings. Sir Oswald said to Mr. Norman Birkett: 'There appear to be two grounds for detaining us . . . . (1) a suggestion that we are traitors and would take up arms and fight with the Germans if they landed and (2) that our propaganda undermines civilian morale.' Mr. Norman Birkett replied: 'Speaking for myself, you can entirely dismiss the first suggestion.'"

Mr. Stokes continued with the observation:

"It ought also to be remembered that many leading politicians, and many more good members of the democratic parties, had visited Germany before the war. Some of these visitors were officially welcomed by the German Government and had spoken with Hitler . . . . a number even openly praised the German system of Government on their return to this country."

It might be pointed out that other politicians and even reputed statemen visited Italy and praised Mussolini and Fascism. This reply applies especially to Mr. Winston Churchill.

As illustrating the war patriotism and loyalty of the internees, Mr. P. C. Loftus told the House of Commons of one man who was arrested for British Union connections. His story is as follows:

"He happened to own a motor-boat and was on the Thames at the time of Dunkirk when the wireless appeal came over. He volunteered to go, and rescued about 450 men, his motor-boat being fairly well plastered with machine-gun bullets. On his return to England he was arrested." (Hansard, Vol. 373, No. 88, Col. 983.)

Men and women of this type ought not to be segregated from their fellows, thrown into gaols and prison camps and treated as worse than felons.

Although over one third of the detained fell under this B.U. category let it not be assumed for one moment that this work is written with a bias towards any political party or section of those detained. It is merely written to query the administration of English Justice to British citizens irrespective of the political or economic views, or their walk of life.

At first sight it was the wish of the Editor to answer in this chapter more fully the numerous charges bandied about concerning British Union, but it was finally decided to keep this document entirely non-political and thus purely factual.

Bearing this in mind it is hoped that the reader will regard anything herein referred to in connection with British Union as entirely sub-judice until such time as complete freedom of speech is restored.

REASONS FOR DETENTION

When the blow fell and the police appeared on hundreds of doorsteps, they were naturally asked the time-honoured question "By what authority . . .?" In answer, there was produced a paper headed "Detention Order," in most cases purporting to be signed by the Home Secretary. Detainees-to-be were usually handed a carbon copy for retention. Since the "Reasons for Detention," which form the main subject of this chapter, normally closely follow the wording of the Detention Orders, the latter may be dismissed with the following remarks.

At least one of these alleged copies contains no date beyond the year 1940, and no indication whatever of any signature—simply a blank space followed by the formula "One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State."

In granting, in May, 1941, in a King's Bench Divisional Court, a writ of habeas corpus to Captain Bentinck Budd, R.E., Mr. Justice Humphreys stated that:

"In the order under which Capt. Budd was detained there was nothing whatever about the necessity of exercising control over him. Further, when Capt. Budd was detained by the police, a document was presented to him as representing the authority for the detention. But that document was nothing like the original order. It wrongly alleged that Capt. Budd was said to be a person of hostile association, which never was alleged. . . . It appears that Capt. Budd has been detained for eleven months on a document purporting to emanate from the Home Secretary which never emanated from him at all . . . . and was a worthless piece of paper."

Mr. Justice Singleton, in concurring, said that that was not the first case that had come before the Court of late where there had been mistakes by the Home Office:

"When I see the complete mistake that has occurred here, and there is no explanation, I am lost in amazement." ("Manchester Guardian," 28/5/41.)

It is bad enough for an Englishman's fortune and good name to fall victims to political chicanery; what shall be said then at their being placed at the callous mercies of careless officialdom?

Then, in the House of Commons, on the 10th June, 1941, in reply to Miss Ward (Wallsend, U.), the Home Secretary (Mr. Herbert Morrison) said:

". . . . in the case of Capt. C. H. Bentick Budd and certain others who were interned at the same time, there was an accidental irregularity in the documents served upon them at the time of their arrest. This irregularity occurred after the decision had been taken by my predecessor that the internment of these persons was necessary. . . . A bad clerical mistake was made in that the document served upon the individuals whom the Home Secretary had decided to intern did not correspond with the order made by him. . . . In view of the High Court decision, he ordered the immediate release of twelve other persons whose position was the same as that of Capt. Budd." (Hansard, 10/6/41.)

Nevertheless, as will be discussed below, both Captain Budd and eleven of the twelve other men were shortly afterwards detained again. ("Times," 11/6/41).

One of the several forms of Detention Order customarily used opens with the words:

"WHEREAS I have reasonable cause to believe . . . . (full name) . . . . to have been recently concerned in acts prejudicial to the public safety or the defence of the Realm."

Imagine the feelings of a maybe talkative but quite patriotic citizen when greeted by the police with the words "We must ask you to come along with us," and confronted with a document of this kind.

"Recently engaged in acts" . . . the words conjure up suggestions of the blowing up of bridges or signalling to the enemy; they inspire thoughts of the gallows or the firing squad.

A different form of order expresses reasonable cause to believe the suspect "to have been recently concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts prejudicial," etc.

if anything, an even more terrifying formula; for it opens the way to the most unscrupulous and sinister distortion of the most innocent expressions; and words are plainly harder to disprove than deeds. In one case, the Regional Commissioner's Detention Order (dated 20th September, 1940) was couched in the form:

". . . . to have been recently concerned in the preparation of acts. . . ."

while that signed by the Home Secretary on the 24th October, 1940, adds the words "and instigation."

A Detention Order, dated 22nd May, 1940, which must be one of the earliest of the 1940 batch, is worded as follows:

"Regulation 18B of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, having been amended by the insertion after paragraph (1) of the following paragraph:

(1A) If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to have been or to be a member of, or to have been or to be active in the furtherance of, any organisation as is hereinafter mentioned and that it is necessary to exercise control over him, he may make an order against that person directing that he be detained.

The organisations hereinbefore referred to are any organisation as respects which the Secretary of State is satisfied that either:

(a) the organisation is subject to foreign influence or control; .

(b) the persons in control of the organisation have or have had associations with persons concerned in the government of, or sympathies with the system of government of, any power with which His Majesty is at war, and in either case that there is danger of the utilisation of the organisation for purposes prejudicial to the public safety, the defence of the Realm, the maintenance of public order, the efficient prosecution of any war in which His Majesty may be engaged, or the maintenance of supplies or services essential to the life of the community:

The Secretary of State in pursuance of the powers conferred on him by the above-mentioned Regulation has made an order directing that YOU . . . . of . . . . . be detained.

You will have an opportunity of making any representations you wish to the Secretary of State; and you have a right, whether or not you make such representations, to make your objections to an Advisory Committee appointed by the Secretary of State.

Under Secretary of State of the Home Dept., Home Office, Whitehall. 22nd May, 1940."

Two Bristol men received Detention Orders signed by the Regional Commissioner (No. 7 District, S.W.). The first of these men received the Home Secretary's Order about sixty days later—in November, 1940—on his transfer to Ascot Camp; and the second about twenty-four days later, in May, 1941.

In prison or in concentration camp, many weeks passed before most detainees were granted what were described as "Reasons for Detention." Out of fifteen cases among others examined the average time lag between arrest and delivery of "reasons" was nineteen weeks; the shortest of these was twelve weeks; twenty weeks was common, and the longest was twenty-eight weeks. These all fall in the autumn of 1940 or the first two months of 1941. Between May and July, 1940, we find one case with seven weeks; in September and October, 1939, four weeks; and in 1941 eight weeks, six weeks and nineteen days. In view of these intervals of time, it is interesting to recall what the then Home Secretary, Sir John Anderson, stated in the House of Commons in a written answer on the 26th October, 1939. Sir John Anderson said:

"Now that the first batch of cases has been dealt with, it is anticipated that any persons who may in future be detained under this Regulation and may make objections will have their cases examined by the Advisory Committee within a few days from the receipt of the objections." (Hansard, Vol. 352, No. 188, 26th October, 1939.)

The "Reasons for Detention" normally includes and recapitulates in the third person the allegations of the Detention Order and then goes on to add more specific allegations, though in some of these "more specific" is a good deal less than "specific"! With occasional slight variations, the documents fall into five main types as follows:

(1) That the detainee "is or has been a member of the organisation known as British Union or active in the furtherance of its objects."

(2) That the detainee is suspected of "having been recently engaged in the preparation or instigation of acts prejudicial to the public safety," etc.

(3) That the detainee is of hostile origin:

(4) hostile association; or

(5) That the detainee had both hostile origin and associations.

Here are specimens of each type of "Reasons for Detention" forms:

Reasons for the Order made under Defence Regulation 18B was made against you . . . . . for the following reasons:

1. The Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe that you have been a member of the organisation now known as British Union or have been active in the furtherance of its objects; and that it is necessary to exercise control over you.

Particulars.

You . . . . . were at the time of your detention a member of British Union and active in the furtherance of the objects of the said organisation in your capacity as District Treasurer; by supporting public meetings and by distributing propaganda.

2. At the time of your detention, the Secretary of State had reasonable cause to believe that you had been or were a member of the British Union, which was an organisation of the kind referred to in Regulation 18B (1A); and by order dated 10th July, 1940, the Secretary of State directed that Regulation 18AA should apply to the organisation known as British Union and declared himself satisfied that the persons in control of the organisation have had sympathies with the system of government of a power with which His Majesty is at war, and that there is a danger of the utilisation of the organisation for purposes prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of the war.

Type No. 2.—ACTS PREJUDICIAL.

Reasons for the Order made under Defence Regulation 18B in the case of . . . . . .

The Order was made against . . . . . because the Secretary of State had reasonable cause to believe that the said . . . . . had been concerned in acts prejudicial to the public safety or the defence of the Realm, and that it was necessary to exercise control over him.

(NOTE.—Some of these "Reasons for Detention" documents have the form "reasonable cause to believe . . . . . to have been recently concerned." Some include the words ". . . . concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts." Some are couched in the second person and some fall within two or all three of these categories.)

Particulars.

1. The said . . . . . on or about the 20th June, 1940, while employed by Messrs. . . . . & . . . . . , expressed doubts to a fellow workman on the justice of the British cause and the certainty of our ultimate victory.

2. On or about October 10th, 1940, stated to another workman that, in his opinion, the British Empire was in as great danger from the United States of America as from Germany.

3. Has persistently engaged in the preparation and dissemination of false and misleading rumours.

Type No. 5—HOSTILE ORIGIN AND ASSOCIATION.

One "Reasons for Detention" form combines Types 1 and 2 and was issued in August, 1941; and another issued in June of the same year shows the Advisory Committee enclosing the "Reasons" with a civilly-worded covering letter wherein occur the words:

". . . . furnishes you with such particulars as are, in the opinion of the Chairman, sufficient to enable you to present your case to the Committee."

In June and July, 1940, there were attached to all or most Type 1 "Reasons for Detention" the preamble and particulars relating to Sir Oswald Mosley and the British Union. This preamble has been given in full.

In fairness to all detainees, and especially to those who belong to British Union, the reader should be referred to Hansard, Vol. 367, No. 8, 10th December, 1940, Col. 834, where he will see that a searching examination of the books of British Union failed to reveal the least sign of any receipt of foreign monies from abroad. He will also see that Sir Norman Birkett repudiated a suggestion that members of the British Union were traitors who would take up arms and fight with the Germans if they invaded.

After receiving his "Reasons for Detention," the detained man goes, sooner or later, before an Advisory Committee. "Later" may be eight or nine weeks: sooner, two days (January, 1941) or even (October, 1939) only one day. In general, there has been an interval of several days in which to think over one's "Reasons for Detention." What light does the interview with the Committee throw upon the "Reasons for Detention"?

Take the case of G. E. T. This man was first detained on September 1st, 1939, two days before the outbreak of war and flung into Wandsworth Prison, on a "hostile association" order. The Advisory Committee, however, before whom he appeared at the beginning of October, showed as much interest in his British Union activities of which there had been no word on his Detention Order or on his "Reasons for Detention," as in the subject that did appear on these forms. In November, 1939, T. was released; but in May, 1940, as soon as sub-section 18B (1A) had been inserted in the Defence Regulation he was detained again, this time on a purely British Union Order.

When, in the following December, T. appeared a second time before the Committee, they seemed—he says—to do little more than bring up again all the material of his former interview including his alleged hostile associations.

It becomes plain to most detainees when they meet the Committee that what these gentlemen on the other side of the table have before them is a great deal more, and very often different material from that which appeared on "Reasons for Detention" forms. To borrow a phrase from philosophy, one might say that the "Reasons for Detention" represent merely the exoteric doctrine, while what the Committee have before them is an often vast body of esoteric lore, but little of which is revealed to the one man or woman whom it mostly affects.

SUMMARY

Objections to the forms of "Reason for Detention" may be classified under four heads: false statement or implication, malice, stupidity and carelessness. To take the latter first, a striking example of clerical errors has already been given in the case of Captain Bentinck Budd and twelve other men, and another is referred to hereafter. Meanwhile, there are plenty more. When a lady is charged with "pro-British and anti-German sympathies" or a man with having been "born in 1904" and having "married a German woman in 1906," or when a man aged 56 is stated to have been a member of the Ballila, the Italian Youth Movement founded at some time after 1922, then there can be no confidence in the care bestowed on work that may mean all the difference between internment and freedom. Of stupidity—or shall it be said, of that morbid, suspicious, perverted ingenuity that seems to be characteristic of M.I.5 and Scotland Yard and perhaps all sniffers out?—the story of Mr. Shelmerdine's Italian queen is a fine example. (It will be remembered that in the case referred to, sinister meaning was imputed to a note in which occurred the following passage: "... destroy British queen, replace with Italian ..." The simple explanation being that Mr. Shelmerdine had been making notes on his hobby of bee-keeping). Further example being found in charging naturalised subjects with "hostile associations" because they associated with their own parents.

From all this it may be seen how little value these "Reasons for Detention" possess. Any stick will do to beat a dog; and, whatever may appear on "Reasons for Detention," if the Home Secretary wishes to keep men in prison or behind barbed wire, as is shown by the experience of G. E. Thomas and Capt Bentinck Budd and his twelve companions, if he cannot do it in one way, then he may do it in another—without any consideration for essential rights and justice.

THE RIGHT TO PETITION

Denied access to all normal channels for seeking Justice, it was the natural impulse among detainees, suddenly imprisoned without any reasonable explanation, to desire at once to write or petition the Home Secretary or Members of Parliament to bring about their release.

With very few exceptions each person on entering prison, was informed that he had the right, and would be given ample opportunity, to make objections to his detention and to apply in writing to appear before a Home Office Advisory Committee. This committee, he was told, would investigate his case and make necessary recommendations to the Home Secretary. When arresting people known to them, Police intimated that, in their opinion, release would follow in a matter of a few days.

What happened in point of fact was as follows:

1. A time limit of ten days after arrest was set in which such application must be made.
2. On entering prison all writing materials, pens, pencils, and paper of any sort, were removed from prisoners and only limited writing facilities were made available.
3. No clear reason for detention was given and no specific charges were laid against them to which objection could be made.
4. No legal assistance or advice was usually procurable within the ten days. (In many cases applications to communicate with solicitors were flatly refused). There was no guidance as to what form "Objections" should take.

In practice it was about the eighth day after arrest, and usually only after repeated applications, that the detainee was handed a single sheet of foolscap paper and, as a special concession, was lent a decrepit pen intended to serve an entire prison Wing of some two hundred cells, and a bottle containing more sediment than ink.

No paper was provided for making a rough draft or for keeping a copy of the application, a document of great importance to the detainee. Such copies as were retained had to be kept on a few sheets of tissue toilet paper.

Members of Parliament frequently found cause, in the individual cases brought to their notice to complain about the extraordinary time-lag between arrest of a person and the appearance before a Committee. Three months was a moderate time of waiting; six months a commoner period. Thus detainees served a severe prison sentence before being given any real opportunity for personal expression.

In this period of waiting, when it seemed likely that requests to go before the Advisory Committee were only a waste of time, there was a natural inclination to petition other quarters for attention. Prison regulations entitle detainees to petition the Home Secretary on any subject, but with the proviso that a second petition could not be submitted while the first was awaiting answer. As it was frequently found that as long as six months elapsed before a reply was forthcoming, the right to petition the Home Secretary was thus restricted to twice in a year. Moreover in very many cases petitions received no reply at all and it is doubtful whether they ever reached the Home Office. A petition was submitted by a detainee E. W. at Ascot in August, 1940, which his solicitor later ascertained had never reached the Home Secretary.

As private writing materials gradually became available more and more detainees sought permission to petition their elected Parliamentary Representatives. It should be stressed that pens and ink were only permitted after much prevarication and unnecessary delay. It was then found that letters to Members of Parliament were not allowed.

As the result of agitation in the House of Commons this ban on letters to M.P.s was removed, but until December, 1940, the Home Secretary would not admit that the ban had existed. Answers to questions on the matter had produced shamefully evasive replies, the Government's attitude being typified by that of Mr. Peake (Under-Secretary to the Home Office), on December 10th, when he said:

"there has never been a rule prohibiting persons detained in prisons from writing to Members of Parliament . . . . the rules relating to correspondence have recently been relaxed . . . . and it is now open to all persons detained in prisons by Administrative order to communicate with Members of Parliament." (Hansard Vol. 367, No. 8, Col. 786.)

Reading this statement literally and with knowledge of what had occurred it can only mean that the detainee was permitted to write to M.P.s from the time of his arrest. At the same time he was not permitted writing materials, nor was he permitted to dispatch any letters he succeeded in writing. That this is playing carelessly with essential privileges of already-wronged men and women is surely fully obvious.

When petitions to M.P.s became possible a new obstacle arose. The letters, issued as "special" letters and extra to the regulation two per week, were subjected to appalling postal delays, and were often so much mutilated by censors that their meaning and effectiveness were totally destroyed.

It was as if a deliberate conspiracy existed to prevent truth of the circumstances and conditions of 18B detention from reaching the outside world.

Mr. R. R. Stokes said in the House on December 10th, 1940:

"I understand that until recently these people were prevented or certainly are not aware that they were permitted to do so—from writing to Members of Parliament. Whatever the Rt. Hon. Gentleman may say, I feel that must be so, for otherwise why should there suddenly have been this appalling spate of letters from internment camps, which I am sure most Hon. Members are receiving? Certainly the letters were stopped from various camps, the names of which I shall give the Rt. Hon. Gentleman."

This comment followed the handing in at Ascot of a letter addressed to Mr. Stokes by detainee J. Wynn. The letter, handed in on September 28th, had not arrived on October 11th. In a letter of that date Mr. Stokes intimated to Mr. Wynn that he was taking the matter up with the Home Secretary. He asked for a copy of the original letter. The copy was duly handed to Major Veitch, Camp Commandant, on October 14, when Mr. Stokes' letter was produced, but in spite of this the copy letter did not reach Mr. Stokes until October 29th .

It was anticipated that after Mr. Peake's statement of December 10th, 1940, letters of appeal from detainees to M.P.s would be safe from interference. This was not so, the military authorities still refused to accept letters if they contained information which they regarded as unpalatable.

1. A letter dated June 7th, 1941, addressed to Mr. Stokes, was stopped at M Camp, Isle of Man, because it contained the following sentence:

   "It is unsatisfactory that a proper accounts statement is never circulated posted, or issued relative to the Camp benefit funds. It is disappointing that Canteen profits or a fixed proportion of same are not given to a Camp welfare fund, instead of irregular donations which may be only an extremely small percentage of the profits."

   Capt. Green of Military Intelligence initialled and red-pencilled this paragraph as containing "unsatisfactory insinuations." Yet the Canteen Sergeant was the subject of a Military Inquiry only a week or so later because of irregularities during his administration.
2. Letter dated January 1st, 1941, from detainee A. E. Ilett to Mr. Stokes, was stopped at York Camp by Capt. Craster, Military Intelligence, because it contained views non-scurrilous but critical of the Government
3. Letter dated December 29th, 1940, from detainee E. Keller to Capt. S. S. Hammersley, was stopped at Ascot Camp by Capt. Collins, Military Intelligence, because it contained the following sentence:

   "... with what is known as an indictment as though it were an advertising leaflet."

The original letters, with the initials and markings of respective officers, are still retained.

Many more letters were refused on similarly trivial grounds and the great number of letters left unanswered produced an impression that there were a convenient amount of "loss" in transit.

After the disturbance at Peel Camp in September, 1941, it was desired that Mr. Stokes should be put in possession of the full facts, but owing to the probability that the letter would be stopped by Military Intelligence authorities at the Camp, the details were compressed into an ordinary regulation 24 line letter that would not normally be examined in the Camp but passed direct to the Censors at Liverpool. Even then the Censor deleted the words:

"The immediate cause being the refusal of officers in charge to allow food to be taken to re-captured escapees after stating that they had been starved for two days."

In answer to a further question in the House of Commons on October 23rd, 1941, Mr. Morrison said:

"Letters addressed by persons detained under Defence Regulation 18B to Members of Parliament are not subject to deletion by the Censor."

That, it might be imagined, settled the matter and gave the detainees complete freedom in their approaches to Members of the House. Yet it is found that on December 16th, 1941, Mr. Peake wrote to Mr. Stokes:

"... the question whether additional letters to M.P.s may be allowed is one within the discretion of the prison Governor."

So that letters can still be banned at the discretion of the authorities, unless the detainee is willing to use one of his bi-weekly letters at the expense of business or domestic correspondence.

So much for the facilities for petitioning

Members of Parliament, a facility once deemed highly valuable in the absence of any alternative medium for representation of detainee interests Now it must be shown in the words of a Member of the House that even this privilege is ineffective.

Flt. Lieut. Boothby, speaking in the House on November 26th, 1941, is reported as saying:

"The Prime Minister said the other day that this House had some rights in the matter, and that Members could raise particular cases. Hon. Members know well that there is one particular case which I tried to raise, not only as a private Member but as a Minister and I say it is a complete fallacy to suggest that any real power is exercised by Members of this House over the Executive. I was not informed as a Minister, I was not informed as a Member of the reasons for the detention of the person in whom I was interested and no Hon. Member is informed by the Secretary of State, as is well known, of the reasons for detention. How, therefore, can they reach a decision? They hear the case of the man who is interned, but they do not hear the other side from the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, and so they cannot come to an unbiassed conclusion. They have therefore no real power in the matter at all. One can talk about particular cases for 20 minutes at the end of a Sitting and as one Hon. Member says, it is probably not reported in the Press. And that is the end of the matter." (Hansard Vol. 376, No. 7, Cols. 837/8.)

In the Commons on July 21st, 1942, Mr. Morrison gave, perhaps, his final word on the subject:

"This House is not a specific court of appeal . . . What the House must do is to keep a watch on the Home Secretary, to have a debate, to look out for cases where in their judgment he has gone wrong, if they can get evidence that he has. I know the limitations of this House. I agree it is not altogether cricket, but I cannot help it. . . ."

Not cricket! No, cricket is too English a game to be compared with cynical side-stepping like that.

THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

Most people detained under Regulation 18B or any of its sub-sections have appeared, in the normal course of events, before an Advisory Committee avowedly so that they may have an opportunity of answering the charges laid against them, officially termed the "reason for detention," and that the Committee may recommend to the Home Secretary either release or further detention.

It is stressed that the Committee only recommends, and it has therefore, power to counsel but not to influence the Home Secretary.

The person appearing before the Committee is given, some days previously, a statement setting out the "reasons for detention." Representation by a solicitor or legal adviser is refused, even when the detainee is willing to pay the cost. The proceedings are in camera.

Apart from this there are no apparent regulations as to the procedure of the Committee, which appears to be a matter for the direction of the Chairman alone. In practice it generally occurs that the detainee makes a declaration in answer to the statement of reasons for detention and is then questioned by the members of the committee; or in some cases the questioning takes place first and the detainee is then asked if he wishes to make a statement. No witnesses are produced in support of the evidence on which the "reasons for detention" are based, nor is the source of such evidence disclosed. In many cases it has been received anonymously by the Home Office or the Police, or is the product of investigators whose reward is possibly according to the quantity rather than the quality of their information. THE EVIDENCE IS NOT GIVEN ON OATH. In every case the onus is on the detainee to disprove, and not on his interrogators to prove, the allegations of possibly nefarious intent.

The composition of the Committee (this does not refer to those Committees operating for consideration of "Alien Origin," etc.) is, with few exceptions, made up of legal and political personalities. The Chairman of the main Committee is Sir Norman Birkett, recently promoted to Judgeship, Messrs. Morris, Mallon, Cockburn, K.C., Stuart-Bunning; Mrs. Low and others act, or have acted, either upon the main or the subsidiary Committees. Appointment to an Advisory Committee is by the Home Secretary, who has, presumably, also the power to terminate the appointment.

Mr. Morrison himself has some interesting things to say on the choice of personnel for the Committee. In the House of Commons on the 26th November, 1941, he quoted Lord Finlay as saying:

"It seems obvious that no tribunal for investigating the questions whether circumstances of suspicion exist warranting some restraint can be imagined which would be less appropriate than a court of Law."

Mr. Pethick-Lawrence went further:

"I do not believe that a Court of Law, well constituted as it is to discuss questions of fact, is in the very least a suitable one to discuss questions of suspicion. When I was in India some ten years ago there were detainees who had been put in prison on suspicion by the Government and the Government wished members of the legal profession to go through the evidence and say whether it was evidence that entitled them to keep them in detention. The legal profession definitely refused to do so. They said that it was not part of their business, that it was entirely away from their proper duty and that they would not be parties to any procedure of that kind."

Both the Home Secretary and the Member for Edinburgh East were trying to explain why there should be no recourse to normal Courts of Justice for 18B detainees. The point made is that persons arrested on suspicion only cannot be tried by a Court controlled by rules of evidence as the Court always would have to order release. This would defeat the purpose of internment. Morally, the point is bad and must lead to official lawlessness. It is no use to misunderstand the argument, as some of the Home Secretary's critics have done. Government by expediency decree, and suspicion is an end of civil rights.

That Advisory Committees are composed of legal minded persons, who by habit of thought and speech, face the detainee with a language he does not understand, is in itself a condemnation of them.

Imagine the position of a man of no more than average general education, with no legal training, before the Advisory Committee. He has certainly spent several weeks in a prison cell under conditions which make the retention of decent personal appearance and self confidence a question of the utmost difficulty. He may have been several months under such conditions. He is then taken into the immaculate and formidable presence of some of the leading lawyers of the country, in a setting of awe-inspiring, self-righteous and accusing authority. In such surroundings he is immediately and supremely ill at ease. He has come, no doubt, charged with a powerful case against his accusers, but to argue before such wits as have debated for hours the hair-line differences and subtleties of words, is a task demanding unusual confidence. The average man must feel and speak, like an ignoramus before an encyclopaedist. It often happened that one of the first things said to the appellant was: "Do you want this country to win the war?" Can any more stupid question be imagined? Would anybody, having gone to the trouble of asking for a hearing before the Committee answer in the negative?

The Home Secretary justifies his refusal to allow legal representation on the ground that some of the evidence cannot be made public for reasons of national security. Yet we have his assurance that it is placed before the Advisory Committee, which is composed of members of the legal profession? If it can be entrusted to some, why not to others? Trials in camera are not infrequent occurrences in war time, and legal representation is allowed at these. To suggest that solicitors could not be trusted to keep secret the business of the Advisory Committee is an insult to the profession as well as an absurdity.

Until and unless legal representatives are allowed to argue a detainee's case for him, he is under a disadvantage which amounts to an injustice and makes his appearance before the Committee a matter of luck and a farce. Succinctly, the position is this: detained persons appear before a court composed of legal experts —those courts have none of the customary regulations concerning witnesses, admissibility of evidence and proceedings, which the experiences of centuries has shown to be necessary to provision of true justice; there is no appeal to a higher court; there is no legal representation of the person appearing; and even if the detainee satisfies the court that he should be at liberty he has not necessarily secured his freedom.

It was stressed in the first place that the Committee could advise but not influence. Some interesting figures have been published recently in illustration of this point. In the House of Commons on the 26th November, 1941, Mr. Morrison admitted that in 89 cases he had gone against the recommendations of the Advisory Committee. On this subject Mr. Ernest Evans (Member for the University of Wales) said:

"It was the Home Secretary himself who appointed this Committee. It would be insulting to him to suggest that he appointed a Committee in which he did not have confidence; he must have had confidence in the Committee that he appointed. It is very important that he should have confidence in that Committee; and, if I may say so, with respect, it is equally important that the Committee should have confidence in him. In view of what is happening I don't think that the second of those things applies. The second fault is that many members of the Committee—I think most of them, certainly the chairman—have had more experience of judging the value of evidence than the Home Secretary can claim. The third fact is that the Advisory Committee devote a great deal of time to the examination of every case coming before it. Sometimes they devote days to the consideration of a particular case. I believe that to every case they devote hours. They certainly devote to every case much more time than the Home Secretary, with all his other preoccupations, can hope to give."

Mr. Ernest Evans does not think that the Committee can have confidence in the Home Secretary. Perhaps if he were not bound by Parliamentary chivalry he would have drawn the more obvious conclusion that it is the Home Secretary who has no confidence in the Committee.

There are in fact only two possible explanations of the Home Secretary's disagreements with the Committee. It is conceivable that he sincerely holds the view that the few minutes of personal attention he is able to give each individual case is more likely to be productive of the correct decision than the hours of consideration given by the Committee in a spirit of judicial prodigality. But it is more likely that he is advised, or compelled, by some other body which possesses evidence or suspicion of which the Advisory Committee is kept in ignorance. This belief is supported by the experience of detainees that the decision that one would expect from the nature of the proceedings at the Committee has been opposite to that made by the Home Secretary. Mr. Ernest Evans says:

"I can think of only two possible explanations. One is that the Home Secretary considers himself to be of such high mental calibre that he can turn down recommendations by people with much more experience than he has in dealing with this sort of thing. I do not think for a moment that that is the compelling thought in he mind of the Home Secretary. The second possible explanation is that he is being guided by somebody, a person or organisation, or some department, whose views are not those of the Advisory Committee."

Certainly no one will accuse Mr. Morrison of such presumptuous insolence as to consider himself infallible where the highest legal brains can unite in being wrong. We can only believe what commonsense makes obvious, that the opinions of such bodies as the War Office, Department M.I.15, Scotland Yard, local police chiefs and such furtive and sinister bodies as the Swinton Committee ply the Home Secretary with advice and insistence, without reference to the Advisory Committee.

Many detainees who have cause to feel that they have satisfied the Advisory Committee that they are fit and proper persons to be at liberty—are quite certain that not all the supposed evidence affecting their detention has been produced to them. This circumstance has led Members of Parliament to seek and obtain assurance on the point.

In the course of the debate on Emergency Powers (Defence) Act 1939 (Continuance) in the House of Commons on 23rd July, 1941, the following questions and answers were exchanged:

Mr. Stokes: "Will the Hon. Gentleman assure the House that the persons detained are themselves given full reasons for their detention?"

Mr. Peake: "That assurance, of course, has been given from this Box by my Rt. Hon. Friend and myself on many occasions, and it is invariably the practice of the Advisory Committee to put before these persons as explicitly as they can, all the facts which are known against them."

Earl Winterton: "Is the reason why they are being arrested made clear to them, or do they have to wait until they go before an Advisory Committee,"

Mr. Peake: "When he gets to the Advisory Committee every fact which can possibly be put to him is put to him by the chairman of the Committee at the hearing." (Hansard Vol. 373, Cols. 947/8.)

The Under-Secretary of State there gives categorical assurances which at least fifty per cent. of the persons who have been before the Committees would strenuously deny. Members of Parliament were wilfully misled and a belated confession to this effect is supplied by Mr. Morrison himself. Speaking on a proposed amendment to the Address on 26th November, 1941, he said:

"Of course, there is this to be said, that, although the Advisory Committee have the facts before them—it is not true, as he has been assured, that the Committee is without the facts that I have before me—it is also true that I have the wider knowledge acquired at the Home Office. I see the police reports and a good many of the security reports and I sit at the War Cabinet frequently and I see the Foreign Office telegrams."

If this statement means anything it surely means that the Advisory Committee do not see police and security reports. On his own admission these reports influence the Home Secretary in setting aside recommendations for release of detainees; they are therefore vital evidence. This is an admission that Mr. Peake was quite positively misleading the House with his previous assurances. Both he and Mr. Morrison deceived Members of Parliament by adroit use of the word "facts" instead of "evidence." There may be very sound reasons for making distinction between police reports and fact, but the truth emerges that certain vital evidence is withheld from Advisory Committees and consequently withheld from detainees themselves. Thus they have no opportunity at all for making explanations on most important features of their cases.

Some detainees, convinced that they have not been accorded justice by the Advisory Committee system, and having the necessary wealth to engage in litigation, have challenged the legality of their detention in other Courts. Captain Bentinck-Budd secured a writ of Habeas Corpus against the Governor of Brixton Prison by proving to the Court that the allegations against him were patently absurd. In his case the Detention Order, signed by the Home Secretary, alleged that he was detained for "Hostile Origin or Associations." At the Committee hearing he was accused only of being a member of British Union and, as such, could only be held under Section 1a of Defence Regulation 18B. Shortly after his release he was detained on a new order.

By a Lords' majority ruling in the case of "Liversedge v. Home Secretary & Another," it has been decided that there is no appeal beyond the Committee and the Home Secretary. Either, or both of them, can come to a decision which a High Court might think contrary to justice, but, by its own admission, the High Court cannot intervene. One is left wondering at the lack of elementary vigilance of the House of Commons in passing an enactment which is now being applied by the Executive in the opposite manner to that intended, and at the supineness of the House in its inability to rectify a mistake. The significance of the wording of the Regulation was, at the time, taken for granted, without confirmation from the Government, by such members as were interested at all in the matter: and the Government appears to be open to an accusation of bad faith in having circumvented the will of the House by using words which were misleading.

And so, rebuffed by the law of the land, the detainee must turn back once again to face the Advisory Committee. A general rule appears now to be developing that individual cases shall be reviewed something like a year or eighteen months after the first hearing. In most cases the review includes a re-appearance before the Advisory Committee, although sometimes the Home Secretary sees fit to dispense with their recommendation, either releasing or further detaining without reference to them.

The first notification to the detainee that his case is to be re-considered is in the form of a letter, either from the Advisory Committee or from the Home Secretary. He is invited to make a statement in writing, giving not only any new facts which he thinks may have a bearing on his case, but also any new views of old facts which the passage of time may have brought about.

The wording of the letter suggests, immediately, either supreme foolishness or deeply hidden subtlety. Anyone can pretend to a change of opinion, in order to appear to the Committee as a person it would be safe to release. There is absolutely no way of deciding whether the professed change is genuine or not. It is doubtful whether the most indirect questioning by the Committee is of any use in such a situation. Moreover, if a person's opinion has changed once, then it may very well do so a second time, perhaps after his release.

It is clear that the Committee must have something else to work on besides the views expressed in the detainee's statement, unless those views are of themselves enough to cause further detention. In every place where detainees are kept information is collected, from any who are willing to give it, concerning others. These informers known among detainees as "snoops" or "narks," provide a large part of the evidence which is brought against those whose cases are being re-viewed. It appears that anyone who is sufficiently debased to concoct or collect "hear-say" either first, second, or third hand, can exchange such worthless information for an equally worthless promise of release from the Military Intelligence Officer or his equivalent. Thus are the characters of detainees sold in a sort of black market in falsehood, either for spite or for the selfish ends of the vendor. The number of detainees who are willing to sell their comrades is, fortunately, small, but nevertheless large enough to have caused momentous injustices. That the Advisory Committee listens to such "evidence" and throws it in the face of the subject is a monstrous happening—yet there are few cases reviewed in which use is not made of information collected in this way. Accuracy and motives of such informers must come under the gravest suspicion.

Information is also supplied to the Committee by the censors of letters. It is a common practice for sentences or phrases, taken out of their original context in such a way as to suggest a meaning the writer did not intend, to be produced during a case review with a request for explanation. This, sometimes months after the letters were written and forgotten.

The inaccuracy of the information in the hands of the Committee cannot be overstressed. As in the case of the first hearing, no witnesses are produced and the source of evidence is not disclosed; no one is prepared to give it on oath. The detainee has no opportunity of calling witnesses to disprove anything alleged against him. He can protest at the falsehoods in the evidence, but they may still influence the decision of the Committee or the Home Secretary.

The evidence in the possession of the Committee which first considers a case is collected largely from malicious rumour-mongers and anonymous informers. The evidence before Committees reviewing cases is often of a no more reputable nature and from no more trustworthy sources. It is not contended that such material is all that the authorities have to go on. No doubt in some cases much more substantial reasons exist for deciding whether or not a man should be released from detention. Nevertheless, the fact that such information is used at all, that it is accepted in the first place and purveyed by goodness knows how many hands to the Advisory Committee, is enough to cast doubts upon the whole system. If Mr. Morrison has recourse to these tactics, it is no wonder that he refuses to allow the evidence to be heard in a Court of Law, or to disclose it to Members of Parliament. The only surprising thing is that members of the legal profession can be found who are willing to prostitute themselves to such purposes.

There seems only one possible explanation. It is that, in many cases, the decision whether or not a person is to be released is made by the Home Secretary independently, without reference to the Committee, and therefore without reference to the detainee. In this decision the Home Secretary is possibly influenced by other factors, such as the demands of the diverse departments and organisations concerned in the safety of the country and of themselves. In any case the conclusion can hardly be avoided that the activities of the Advisory Committee provide, in the final analysis, only a front or screen for the Home Secretary's decision.

The existence of the Committee gives the general public a comfortable sense of assurance that some effort is being made to comply with a high standard of justice in administering this emergency legislation. The effectiveness of the Committee makes it a sorry bluff. There were several detainees who have refused from the outset to recognise the legality of their detention and to appear before a Committee. There are many more who have declined to go through the pantomime a second time, when their cases were due for revision.

Perhaps the clearest light was thrown on the whole of the Advisory Committee system by the detainee who wrote to the Home Secretary that he did not wish to play the role of dormouse at another Mad-Hatters Tea Party.

JUSTICE—NEW STYLE

"The Advisory Committee is in no sense a court of appeal or a judicial tribunal. It is the creature of the Home Secretary." (Commander Bower, M.P., 21/7/42.)

What happened to a man called to meet an Advisory Committee? Originally, it meant a car journey from his prison in London to Burlington House, a mile or two away. After removal to internment, a 20 mile car ride to Burlington House, or, after the premises were damaged in an air raid, a short run to an Ascot Hotel, to which the Hearings were transferred. Later on, men would go from Huyton by rail, in batches, to Brixton Prison, and thence once more, to Burlington House, whilst to-day, detainees going for their second or later hearings must travel from Peel to London, a boat and train journey of over 300 miles. Justice is getting further away than ever.

Finally he gets before the Committee, finding before him, seated behind a large table (reminding one, inexplicably, of the Aunt Sallies at a fairground), two or three persons, sometimes including a woman; they are the Committee, the arbiters of his fate. Also present are a woman secretary, and a shorthand writer.

So comes the questioning. Let us take, first of all, the original Hearings and, as the cases are simpler, consider first the cases of Anglo-Germans (Anglo-Italians had separate Committees as a general rule).

The life history is run through, to check details and explain possible blanks, and also to check relationships with foreign firms or persons, in Britain or abroad. All foreign visits must be accounted for and their purpose explained.

It need not be emphasised that persons of dual nationality, or with one foreign parent, are in an invidious position. Instinctively, being born and brought up here, they look upon Britain as their homeland; and yet at the back of their minds is a regard for that other country which bore one or both of their parents, which they have perhaps visited and come also to love, whose language they speak as fluently as they do English. It must be with repugnance that they would look upon the idea of taking up arms against that other country, in a quarrel not personal to themselves. We know that there are many now in Britain who, having fled here for one reason or another, now show themselves willing and anxious to wage war on their land of birth; but we cannot understand them, any more than we feel inclined to insult and call "Quisling" men abroad who hold back when called upon by a foreign Power to fight against their own fellow-countrymen.

It is not impossible that the Advisory Committee, too, has felt the weight of this argument, for it is not often that they have seen fit to ask such men point blank: "Will you join the army if you are released?" (Many let out have been asked to join the Pioneers, but that is a non-combatant service). Generally the question has been: "What will you do if you are released?" The reply did not seem to matter much. One man who said he would probably give private music lessons, was told that the Police probably wouldn't like that at all; but no explanation was given.

It might be asked: "How do you regard the German atrocities in Poland?" What answer was wanted was never fathomed. An attempt to please the Committee by saying how awful they were might be looked upon as bluff. If a man stood up for himself and said he wasn't at all convinced about the stories, and wanted more proof, it was a black mark against him. If he lost his temper that told still more to his disadvantage.

As recorded elsewhere, an internee was asked: "Why did you marry a German woman?" We can cap that, however, with another case where one of these "Anglos" was asked: "Why did you marry an English woman?" There may be some deep laid scheme behind such questions, but we cannot guess what it is. In his place, we would have been tempted to ask the Chairman: "Why did you marry your wife?"

This delving into quite irrelevant domestic matters was carried further than that, however, to an extent which can only be termed as offensive. What was the purport of cross-examining a man at length upon his having lived with a woman to whom he was not married; or pressing another for reasons why he should be "carrying on" with two women at the same time? If the purpose of the Committees was to examine public morality, that should have been made clear when they were appointed. If on the other hand it is believed by the Home Secretary that deviations from the moral code go hand in hand with spying and treachery, then he can never have realised that the ideal spy or "agent" is the man who keeps clear of all entanglements, rather than the one depicted, say, in the pages of Mr. Bruce-Lockhart.

So much for the Anglo-Germans. Now let us turn to the British political detainees.

Here, as regards political views, there was a clearer case. The detainee at some time, or still, subscribed to some particular political beliefs, and something was probably known of his political activities.

Many stuck to their guns, stating their views, and asking where they had offended; a few of these were accepted as genuine, at once, and released if they had held no particular position in their movement. The rest were detained. Some others now denied, honestly or otherwise, that they retained the beliefs and said they were now willing to fall in line with the existing regime. It was then up to the Committee to form their conclusions as to the genuineness of the retraction.

The line generally followed was to depict imaginary circumstances in which the country might find itself, and ask how the individual would face them. So came the question: "What would you do if . . . ?" and so on.

Again, the atrocity stories would be trotted out: "Do you believe . . . ?" "What do you think about . . . ?" Sometimes the most far-fetched propaganda story just to test whether the man would, unconsciously or frankly, express the doubts which all reasonable men have about such stuff.

Letters would be quoted or bits of conversation, dating back months or even years before, which a man had forgotten completely. What did he mean by this statement or that remark? Sometimes, with an effort, he could recall and explain them, name the informant and the circumstances under which they were uttered, throwing an entirely different light on the matter. But it was his word against that of a witness he could not call to face him, and he could not tell if his account would be believed. The feeling of detainees was such that when, at Peel, they were able to play bowls, they preferred to speak of a ball having not "bias" but "Advisory Committee."

Photographs would be produced, seized perhaps at the man's house. One man indignantly remembers these questions:

Chairman: "Whose picture is this?"

Detainee: "Well, if you examine it, you will see a likeness to myself; it is my sister."

Chairman: "Oh yes, I see now. And does she share your political views?"

It is apparently not only abroad that one is expected to betray one's nearest relatives.

Notes, carefully compiled by police enquirers and others, were often so stupid that after one or two half-hearted enquiries the Chairman would strike his pencil through the rest of the matter. It was more difficult, however, to deal with anonymous letters which were often the primary cause of the detention and which the detainee was not able to see.

Letters from foreign friends were, of course, a special prize. Though the Government had been preaching ever since 1918 on the need for foreign understanding, that one should have dared to have acquaintances abroad seemed the final sin.

One man had had correspondence with a German girl whom he knew when she was in service in London; she belonged to the Nazi Party.

Chairman: "Did you not think it dangerous to be on friendly terms with a member of the Nazi Party."

Chairman: "Yes, even in 1938."

Detainee: "Well, sir, there are many in this country even in high places, Lord Stamp for instance, who have been friendly with very important members of the Nazi Party, and they are not interned!"

The subject dropped suddenly, but it is certain that this simple friendship told against him.

There came second Committees, to those who would accept them (many have refused), usually twelve or eighteen months after the first. Here the attitude has somewhat changed, inasmuch as a man may declare he has still not changed his views and be set free. The chief questions now being: "What prospects have you of getting employment?" "Have you any private means?" (the most intimate details have been asked in some cases about holdings in private family concerns). "Do you intend carrying on further political activities?"

Such are the Committees and their Hearings. A bold few have refused from the outset, to have anything to do with them and remain, forgotten almost, in internment. Yet perhaps they are right, for the whole thing seems like a mockery. We know of none who would not willingly face an open court, where he could face his accusers, question their evidence and examine their motives. That the limelight of such publicity is avoided, that every legal device has been adopted to block all court proceedings in any of these cases is the best indication of the innocence of these victims of 18B who have been forced to waste months and years of their lives in internment, in a country ever crying of its Fight for Freedom.

TREATMENT OF THOSE DETAINED

As the Defence Regulations called upon the Home Secretary to lay down the treatment and detention conditions for those detained and it should be noted that such persons were absolutely uncharged and likewise unconvicted of any offence; we see that about January 1940 Command Paper 6162 is issued.

Many authorities now admit that Walton Gaol was hardly a suitable place to confine such persons in and also that it was impossible to comply with the regulations therein.

On countless occasions it was brought to the notice of the Home Secretary that his regulations were not being carried out.

We leave it to the reader to judge

(a) whether any prison is a fit place to house uncharged and untried men for lengthy periods—some have now been in prison for over 3 years.

(b) to what extent the instructions given in Command Paper 6162 were complied with or even attempted to be complied with.

It is not so much the regulations as to treatment that count but the spirit in which they are administered that makes all the difference between their being bearable or otherwise.

We suggest that however difficult the circumstances were, humane treatment could have been meted out; and anyhow it was on the assumption that these conditions of treatment were in point of fact being administered that Parliament consented to the addition of Regulation 18B (1a) that so vastly increased the scope of the Act.

At last the Government moved to quieten criticism by issuing, in January, 1940, some four months after the first arrests, a Command Paper setting out certain instruction with regard to the treatment of 18B prisoners. This paper, known and hereinafter referred to as Command Paper 6162, is here set out in full:

DEFENCE REGULATIONS 18B.

Instructions issued by the Secretary of State with regard to the detention in prison of persons detained in pursuance of Regulation 18B, January, 1940.

EMERGENCY POWERS (DEFENCE) ACT, 1939. Cond.6162.

(1) As persons detained in pursuance of Regulation 18B are so detained for custodial purposes only and not with any punitive purpose, the conditions of their confinement will be as little as possible oppressive, due regard being had to the necessity of ensuring safe custody and maintaining good order and good behaviour.

(2) So far as possible persons detained in prison establishments will be accommodated in a part of Liverpool Prison which has been set apart for men so detained or in a part of Holloway Prison which has been set apart for women so detained. When such persons are detained in any other establishment, they will be kept apart from convicted prisoners.

(3) Food.—A detained person who wishes to vary or supplement the meals provided may do so at his own expense or the expense of his friends, subject, however, to

(a) any directions given on medical grounds by the medical officer;

(b) the same limitations upon the supply of alcoholic liquor as apply in the case of persons awaiting trial, viz.: one pint of ale, stout, or cider, or one half bottle of wine in each 24 hours;

(c) such other limitations as may be necessary to prevent luxury or waste;

(d) inspection of all parcels sent into the prison.

(4) Clothing.—A detained person will be permitted to wear his own clothing and may arrange through his friends for necessary replacement of articles of attire.

(5) Visits.—

(1) Subject to any instructions to the contrary given by the Secretary of State, at least one visit a week from a friend or relative will be permitted, and the Governor may allow additional visits or visitors at his discretion.

(2) Visits by Counsel or solicitors in connection with a detained person's affairs will be allowed at all reasonable times.

(3) Visits will be supervised in such a manner as the Prison Commissioners may determine, either generally, or in a particular case.

(6) Communications.

(1) A detained person will be allowed to write or receive letters subject to censorship.

(2) A detained person will be given full opportunities to make representations in writing to the Secretary of State regarding his case or treatment.

(7) Association.—Detained persons will be allowed to associate with one another at labour, meals and recreation.

(8) Exercise, Recreation, Smoking.

(1) Provision will be made for regular outdoor exercise and for games and for recreation.

(2) Smoking will be allowed at exercise and recreation and in rooms except during the hours of associated labour.

(9) Labour.

(1) A detained person may be employed with his own consent on such useful and suitable work as can be provided. In that event he may receive payment in accordance with the scales to be fixed by the Prison Commissioners.

(10) Medical.—Medical attention will be provided but a detained person will be allowed, if he so desires, to be visited and treated at his own or his friend's expense, by a registered practitioner or dentist of his own selection.

(11) Visiting Committee.—Detained persons may make complaints to and be seen by members of the Prison Visiting Committee and the Visiting Committee will take cognisance of matters affecting the welfare and proper treatment of detained persons in the same way as they take cognisance of matters affecting prisoners.

(12) General.

(1) Subject to the foregoing paragraphs of these conditions of detention, the Prison Rules of 1933 will apply to detained persons as if they were prisoners awaiting trial.

(2) The privileges allowed by paragraphs 3, 5 (1), 6 (1), 7, 8, and 9 of the conditions of detention will be regarded as privileges which are liable to forfeiture under Rules 57 and 58 of the aforesaid rules.

(3) (Applies to Scotland only.)

HOME OFFICE, January, 1940.

With the publication of this flimsy document the protagonists of liberal thought heaved a great sigh of relief. Injustice, they told themselves, was sugar coated. Conscience went back to sleep.

PRISON CONDITIONS

Earlier Detainees at Wandsworth and Walton Gaols

Criticisms of conditions at Brixton, Stafford and Walton in mid 1940, might, by some, be explained away by the claim that a state of great emergency existed when, in a short period, some entirely British, some only nominally so, and others of recent or distant alien origin, had to be rounded up and sorted out; it is not disputed that, especially at Brixton and Walton, the staffs were quite inadequate to handle the large influx during the period May-July 1940; that these staffs should have been augmented is a matter of elementary reasoning. But even this excuse has no validity at all in regard to the comparatively few persons involved before the mass arrests, beginning with the arrests made two days before the declaration of war.

Arrests commenced under the original 18B regulations, and continued under the supposedly modified form later brought into effect as a result of widespread Parliamentary disquiet. Those mainly concerned were persons charged with being of hostile origin or having had hostile associations.

As White Paper No. 6162 was not issued until early 1940, Prison Governors were left in complete ignorance as to how those detained men were to be dealt with. This brought results which anybody with the slightest knowledge of our prison system can imagine.

Until 28th February 1940, detainees were kept at Wandsworth Prison, a local prison in which many of the inmates were "old lags" and where even Remand prisoners were unknown. The treatment was more severe than in a remand or "unconvicted prisoners" establishment like Brixton.

During September and October 1939, detainees were housed in basement cells, which were damp and riddled with vermin. Cell windows were totally blocked with sandbags, from which a damp smell permeated everywhere. The cells never saw daylight, the sole lighting coming from a 15-watt electric bulb set high in the ceiling and covered with a black-out hood. Reading, except at the risk of damage to the eyesight (which definitely occurred in several cases) was therefore impossible. Smoking was not permitted, and only the ordinary prison diet was obtainable, permission to have the meals sent in from outside being refused. Under no circumstances was conversation allowed, nor could newspapers be obtained. Detainees were only allowed out of their cells for the purpose of emptying slops at 6.30 a.m. and again in the evening and for half-an-hour during the early winter mornings for exercise, when they walked round a paved yard one behind the other in silence. They were locked up for the rest of the day. No communication of any kind with the outside world was permitted, nor could detainees receive visits or consult their solicitors.

Possibly as a result of pressure from certain quarters, these harsh conditions were somewhat ameliorated in November, 1939, although not in all cases. For instance:

(a) A detainee brought into Wandsworth Prison early in December, 1939, was completely isolated from his fellow detainees: was subjected to continuous third-degree questioning: was refused permission to acquaint his parents of his whereabouts, was not allowed to see his solicitors, and was told the most damnable untruths concerning his parents' attitude towards him: all in an attempt to persuade him to lay false evidence against an organisation to which he belonged.

(b) Seven detainees at Walton Prison, during the three months from December, 1939, to February, 1940, were allowed only 20 minutes' exercise daily, and were otherwise confined continually to their cells.

In Wandsworth, however, detainees were now moved to better cells, similar to those used by ordinary convicts, and could now buy newspapers and, if they had funds, have meals sent in. They were now allowed four hours daily association, when smoking was permitted. Whilst actually not mixing with convicted prisoners, they met numbers of them, in the prison or prison grounds, and on some occasions the most filthy abuse was shouted at them, it being the general impression that they were German spies. This view even seems to have been shared by the warders at first, but the consequent hostile attitude later changed. The warders at Wandsworth did act as if they were in charge of human beings.

In November, 1939, a number of detainees were transferred by motor coach to Walton. This journey merits description. Early in the morning the prisoners were handcuffed in twos and were not released for any purpose whatsoever until arrival at the intermediate stopping place, Stafford Prison. "Lavatory Accommodation" consisted of an open prison pot, which spilt its contents on the floor from time to time; anybody wishing to relieve himself had to do so where he sat, still handcuffed, it being forbidden to leave one's seat in the coach.

At Stafford, the prison authorities said they had no warning of the coming of the new "guests," and that the prison had been out of regular use for many years. The cells provided were unheated and the only light came through a small window in the outer passage; they had not been occupied for years and were indescribably filthy.

The journey was resumed next day, Liverpool being finally reached at 11.30 a.m. when the prisoners were shut up for seven interminable hours in the notorious reception cells described elsewhere.

But the chief memory of Wandsworth concerns—bugs. On one occasion the Governor was shown by a detainee, a haul of over twenty caught in his bed that morning; and the reply was "I know, but we have tried everything and cannot get rid of them." Yet in the House of Commons, in reply to a question, the Home Secretary angrily denied the existence of bugs in this prison; the comments of the warders in this connection were amusing and memorable, but not printable.

Later transfers to Walton were made by train, and here again the prisoners were handcuffed in twos throughout the long journey, being led thus through Euston Station, surrounded by uniformed police and followed by curious crowds.

Finally came general removal to Walton. Now, it was thought, would come some improvement, and the Government Regulations will be carried out, but in fact conditions proved to be even worse. The plea of emergency through numbers, cannot be set up, as only 25 people were involved in all. The attitude of the prison staff, from the Governor downwards, was most hostile, prisoners being subjected to incredible insults from warders and even from principal officers. Some examples of the treatment:—

(a) In the freezing weather of January, 1940, men on exercise were sharply reprimanded for putting their ungloved hands into their overcoat pockets, or for using the prison pillow (made of sackcloth) as a cushion on their chairs whilst sitting in solitary confinement for hours at a time.

(b) Men subjected to unprintable insults were put in punishment cells on bread and water if they "batted an eyelid," the charge being "dumb insolence."

(c) Cells were so dark that one could often only read by placing the chair on the table near the widow, which was situated high in the wall; this was a punishable offence, as also was lying on the bedboard after lunch, or at other times during the day.

There were at least 18 hours of solitary confinement during the day, and such punitive treatment cannot be explained away by shortage of staff, as only one warder was on duty whether the cell doors were unlocked or not.

The Government White Paper No. 6162 was issued early in 1940, but every effort was made to keep copies out of the hands of detainees. Copies sent through the post were confiscated. Finally one man protested to the Governor that the regulations were not being carried out, to which the Governor said that he knew nothing of any such document. The detainee then produced a copy, which had been smuggled in, in a parcel and was assured that the Governor had never before seen such a document, which in any case would be impounded as detainees were not permitted to have it.

In mid-April, on a Sunday afternoon, detainees were told to have everything packed within ten minutes, and were then moved to another wing, where the cells were found filthy beyond description, many fouled with pigeon excrement. Not until the following day were time and facilities given for cleaning. Here, for three weeks, there was solitary confinement for 23 hours a day, and then, after continued protests, an extra hour's exercise was granted in the evening "if circumstances permitted," meaning in practice, about four times a week. As another great concession, men could, if they wished, sew mail-bags at their cell doorways at certain times of the day, and speak to their neighbours if these also chose to do the same work, as was not always the case.

So much for the earlier detainees. Now let us examine conditions in prisons at the time of the mass detentions.

BRIXTON

Brixton Prison in normal times is mainly used for the reception of Remand Prisoners, to whom special conditions and privileges have always been accorded, and detainees found from the outset that the whole establishment was very efficiently run. On the whole, the warders and officers were very fair in their treatment. Prison rules, however, are strictly laid down, and only gradually was modification secured, to meet the stipulations of White Paper 6162, as all decisions had to be referred to the Governor who was extremely cautious regarding innovations.

When the general 18B round-up began towards the end of May, 1940, the first arrivals were housed in F Wing which appears to have been disused for some considerable time and was found dirty and damp; furthermore, there were a number of cases of bug-infested cells. Efforts were promptly made to eliminate this evil, but with only temporary success.

A matter for criticism was the long-drawn-out process attending "reception." Prisoners arrived throughout the day and, having had names and particulars taken, were locked up for long periods, often running into several hours, in small reception cells, box-like affairs about the size of telephone kiosks. Eventually released from these, there came a search (involving stripping to the skin, often in the sight of convicted prisoners, and a compulsory bath), and then prolonged further waiting for a farcically inadequate medical examination, so that the cell was not reached until 10 p.m. or later. Such an ordeal for men suddenly arrested, without charges—some young, some up to 70 years of age—was most trying, and could surely have been curtailed.

It was at this prison that many were shocked at the wholesale arrests of young Anglo-Italians, many only 16 years of age, some arrested from school. No real discrimination seems to have been exercised; many could not speak a word of Italian, many had fathers or brothers serving in the British Army—one lad had four serving brothers.

After the general removals to Internment camps a certain number of men remained at Brixton on orders from the Home Office, and others were transferred to the prison for personal or other reasons. In connection with these an interesting development took place.

Until April, 1941, the ordinary prison rules and regulations were enforced, in spite of the existence of the Government White Paper No. 6162. This meant that:

(1) No evening association was allowed, all doors being shut at 4 p.m.

(2) Association at meals was not permitted. In practice no association took place other than at outside exercise periods.

(3) Detainees had sometimes been refused permission to see their legal advisers for a considerable period following their arrest.

(4) Generally no steps were taken to render the imprisonment non-punitive.

About April, 1941, however, legal advice was obtained that the White Paper had legal effect, and accordingly, writs were applied for against the Prison Governors and others for breach of Statutory Regulations. Immediately a change of front became evident, many concessions, which had previously been refused on the presumption that it was against prison rules to grant them, suddenly became possible.

The belief, therefore, cannot be avoided, that the Government never had any intention of applying White Paper 6162, until detainees themselves discovered, almost by accident, that its enforcement could be made the subject of public court proceedings.

WALTON GAOL

In design and construction all prisons are much alike, and each cell in each prison is practically a replica of the next. They are not designed to provide home comforts, they are designed to be frankly punitive, and they successfully achieve that end.

Regulation cell furnishings are standard. They are obviously calculated to provide the minimum of necessary comfort and are not intended to obviate hardship, which has never been considered inconsistent with the general punitive purpose of prisons. The list is as follows:—

Regulations also provide for the issue to each prisoner of the following items:—

1 hair brush, 1 comb, 1 toothbrush, 1 shaving brush, 1 towel, toothpowder, 1 metal plate, 1 mug, 1 tin knife.

The towel is changed each time the prisoner takes a bath.

These are the basic requirements which the State considers necessary, and provides, for its felons during their term of punishment.

Another item which by prison regulations should be in each cell, is a copy of the regulations themselves.

That part of Walton Gaol used to accommodate 18B detainees, comprising Wings A, B, C, D, E, F and G, with part of H, were mainly the old, and long disused, women's section of the prison. Warders variously assessed the period of disuse at seven, ten and fifteen years. The indications suggested that the longer period was the most likely.

The Under Secretary of State has categorically denied that the cells at Walton were dirty. It is not the purpose of this document to prove him a liar, but the plain facts leave only the alternative that he has been grossly misinformed and has taken no steps to check his information. It may interest Mr. Peake to know that there are prison officers who, at such time as they will serve a useful purpose, are prepared to come forward and swear that no effort was made to clean up the accumulated filth of years prior to the arrival of the detainees. The dirt was absolutely undisturbed save by the roosting pigeons, which had added their own quota of foulness to the stinking corruption of the place, and by the convicts who had slung into the cells the miscellaneous junk to serve as furniture.

"Not true that cells at Walton were dirty," says Mr. Peake to members of the House; yet nearly every one of seven hundred detainees is willing to give solemn oath that he was hustled into a cell that was literally encrusted with grime and excrement. The cumulative evidence is irrefutable; it tells of windows rendered absolutely opaque, some of them welded immovably, with cement-hard congelations of weathered grime; it tells of carpets of a slimy nature under a surface deposit of soot from the restarted primitive ventilation and heating system.

"It is true that some of the cells needed redecoration," says Mr. Peake. His gift for understatement would be amusing had it not been used to mislead.

Under the top coat of dust distemper was flaking off the damp bedewed walls. Still legible were the bawdy scrawlings of hoydens lodged here long before the Great War. Ceilings, once whitewashed, were dark as thunder clouds. Windows of the old gas-light traps were smashed. Alarm bells were broken, and in many cases unworkable, the whole place was a decaying shambles, patently unfit for habitation.

Nor was it possible in the first weeks of occupation to do anything to relieve these conditions. Water flung on the cell floors, produced a thick, foetid mud; impossible to clean it out properly as no brooms or other equipment were made available. Blankets, already unclean at the time of issue, trailed in this oozy mess

Checked against the list of standard cell furnishings it is found that any detainees provided with more than half these basic requirements were exceptionally well equipped.

Mats were non-existent for detainees. Wash-bowls and water jugs as a complementary set, were extremely rare, and even where one or the other item was provided it was usually so chipped, battered and punctured as to be unusable. Few, if any, cells contained both table and wash-stand; one of these items had to serve dual purposes.

Chairs, too, were rarities, and were often substituted for by crude stools; in some cases there was no provision of any seat.

This posed a nice problem.

It being a regulation, sometimes enforced and sometimes not, according to the disposition of the warder on duty, that bedboards must not be used between 7 a.m. and 4 p.m. certain unfortunate detainees had to choose between perching themselves on table or wash-stand and pacing the floors of their cells. The alternative was to defy the rule, put down bedboard and mattress, and risk a spell of punishment.

As to the other items of cell equipment, the slate and slate-pencil were cultural refinements denied to detainees; mirrors were not available for several weeks, and then only for a fortunate few; and the other utensils for cell cleaning, as already mentioned, were not provided.

In circumstances where men are locked into cells at 4 p.m. and their doors not again unlocked until 7 a.m. except under surly protest, the night commode or chamber becomes a very necessary item of furniture. Here at Walton the vessels provided were all of nursery size; hardly any of them had lids and many of them leaked badly. The reluctance to open doors after 4 p.m. thus made conditions even more barbaric and animal-like; indeed one detainee who rang for his door to be opened when suffering a severe attack of diarrhoea, was told curtly "use the floor."

Whether one feels abhorrence or approval towards such conditions is largely dependent on one's personal standards of decency. But it is hard to understand how even Sir John Anderson, Home Secretary of that time, could condone these happenings, unless one recalls this person's record in India.

From the time of arrival at Walton detainees experienced a nightmare existence.

The usual routine of prison reception was conducted so tardily that it spun out into a ceremony of interminable duration, involving each person in a waiting period of from two to seven hours in a box not much larger than a coffin and almost as airless. Built cheek to cheek in a long row these "reception cells" resembled a row of public lavatories. They left no room for movement of any kind and the plank seats forced one to sit bolt upright. They contained no reading matter and offered no view outside. Once locked in, after a tiring journey of many hours with only a sandwich to eat and nothing to drink, the detainees faced hours of hunger, thirst and severe mental and physical discomfort.

It was a strain amounting to torture—and with no apparent reason behind it.

This particular spell of vicious maltreatment was ultimately concluded and the further formalities of a slapdash medical inspection followed.

Very few of the detainees transferred from other prisons were given the customary bath on arrival, though some were made to strip and step in and out of an empty bath that it might be represented that the bath procedure had been followed.

By the time the medical inspection was over, all personal belongings had been impounded. Detainees were then given a mug of cocoa and a hunk of dry bread and locked away in the squalor of their cells. Next morning they found themselves without any of the necessary articles for personal hygiene and toilet. No combs, brushes, towels, soap or toilet paper were available.

The matter of personal cleanliness became a more pressing problem as days went by without their elementary needs being satisfied. It was a situation made the more infuriating because most men had toilet equipment in their impounded personal property but were denied access to it.

A week elapsed before even the most fortunate detainees were supplied with soap, and some had to wait considerably longer.

The total lack of proper toilet equipment enforced use of what communal facilities existed. They were not elaborate. On each landing of upwards of twenty cells there was a recess containing one sink and one lavatory. In the few minutes granted each morning for the "slopping-out" of chamber pots, the twenty or more detainees queued at this one sink to rinse themselves and their feeding vessels (drying had to be left to time), and to use the one lavatory. More often than not this one lavatory was defective, and the unfortunate occupant of the cell next to the recess on the floor below suffered increased discomfort because stale urine seeped through ceiling and walls.

The great obstacles to physical cleanliness would have been to some degree mitigated had it been possible to obtain frequent baths. Again prison organisation fell down so badly that it was over a month before many men were permitted their first bath, and consequently over a month before they could obtain clean towels.

For the first several days at Walton Gaol, apart from the period of "slopping out," detainees were allowed out of their cells for only 1¼ hours a day, divided into an exercise in the prison yards morning and afternoon; in inclement weather this privilege was usually suspended.

The remaining twenty-two hours of each day were spent in solitary confinement, without books, newspapers, cigarettes or tobacco, these not being allowed until later.

It is not easy to convey in words the stark horror of such an existence. To sit for hours on end without communion with others, and with absolutely nothing at all to engage mental or physical activity, produces a hiatus of the mind which threatens to overthrow reason. A natural reaction, when Bibles were distributed and avidly resorted to for mental relief, was in some cases a temporary outbreak of religious mania.

The spells of cell confinement were only modified when arrangements were made for detainees to perform convict labour; the sewing of mailbags and hammocks. Men were blackmailed into doing these tasks rather than suffer the alternative solitude. That this "Associated labour" was but a miserable privilege is shown in the fact that prison officers counted conversation an offence at working times, and smoking was prohibited. Nevertheless, so desolate was life at Walton that the opportunity for the reduction of solitary confinement to twenty hours a day was generally accepted.

Repeated applications for association in cells, for card playing or conversation, were firmly refused. The objection given was that such an innovation might be conducive to the practice of sodomy. This impudent and insulting answer to a perfectly reasonable request, obviously consistent with the terms of Command Paper 6162, is rendered the more inexplicable in view of the fact that this form of association is a feature of detainees' life at Brixton Prison and has been indivisible from life at camps.

The inference can only be that the Governor at Brixton is more favourably disposed to unnatural sexuality, or, as is plainly more likely, he is not influenced by an unhealthy and indecent outlook and is a sane and reasonable man.

All other efforts by detainees at Walton to lighten their conditions with eminently practical reforms were rebuffed in the same way.

Arrangements for private purchases from outside sources were extremely haphazard, and only after several weeks had passed. Orders were placed one week and money was taken from detainees' accounts. Goods were delivered the next week, and usually found to be at variance with those ordered, with a discrepancy against the purchaser.

Parcels sent by friends outside were treated outrageously, and flung into an ever mounting heap to await distribution. This distribution was conducted with such incredible inefficiency that there were many instances in which weeks elapsed between a parcel being received at the prison and being passed on to the detainee. In consequence of these maltreatments the contents of the parcels were smashed, and where perishable, rotten, and polluting all other goods in close proximity.

Remember that these parcels were often sent after great personal sacrifice on the part of the donor.

Other parcels sent to no individual, but addressed for members of an organisation, arrived in large numbers. These the Governor caused to be deliberately withheld and their ultimate fate is unknown.

These parcels and the goods purchased from outside sources were vitally necessary because of the disgusting quality and the dirtiness of the food served in this prison.

The foregoing is a general account of the conditions governing detention at Walton Gaol. It is not complete, nor does it include the extra hardships suffered in individual cases. It will be seen that the treatment of detainees was, in many directions, infinitely more harsh and the conditions more severe than those of convicted felons.

One other important point to note is that some slight amelioration of these conditions could be obtained by resort to heavy bribery of certain prison officers. (Names, dates and full circumstances to support this grave assertion are being retained for a future occasion). This expedient was only available to a very select few.

In the main, 18B detainees who passed through Walton suffered conditions which are but mildly described by the word punitive. Those who still remain in captivity have at least the consolation that they have already experienced the utmost vileness to which they can be subjected.

CONDITIONS AT STAFFORD PRISON

From 27th July to 18th November, 1940.

At Stafford 18B prisoners were housed in that part of the prison known as the Crescent, which was built about 1864. The interior is of a peculiar shape, so that, in the centre of the wing, prisoners could shake hands with one another from opposite sides of the upper landings, whilst at the ends the distance apart widens to about twelve yards.

For 120 prisoners there were but six W.C.'s and the same number of cold water taps, from which latter had to be drawn all water for washing, etc. The only hot water available was what could be heated on one small gas-ring on the ground floor, and there, in the evenings, a long queue had to form to make their tea, oxo and so forth. If the queue were too long, only the first comers were successful, the time allowed being too short for all requirements.

Cell lighting was very poor, gas jets outside the cells throwing a feeble light through a very thick reinforced frosted glass square set low in an embrasure, so that reading was most difficult.

It was stated by warders that the wing had been unoccupied since 1918, and the first job on arrival was to scrub out the cells to make them habitable. So too, for reasons of health and comfort, had the scanty prison furniture to be scrubbed.

Of the prison staff, the Governor was in general conduct, typical of the best type of army officer and at first seemed quite reasonable. Unfortunately there were times when his temper caused him to punish men for the slightest offence. The chief officers were of the usual harsh, bullying type. On the other hand, the warders were not unfriendly and would even engage in conversation when they knew they were free from observation.

Punishments for infringements of prison rules designed to apply to convicts, comprised deprivation of all privileges such as smoking, receipt of food from outside, association with other prisoners and confinement to cells for 23 hours in the day.

Up to the end of October the whole time, apart from 30 minutes morning and afternoon, when exercise was taken outside, was spent indoors. Many requests were made for permission to be outside—to have some work to do in the open air—but the excuse came that prison regulations allowed those two brief 30 minute spells and nothing more could be done; nor was anything done until late in October—when the lovely summer of 1940 had sped—and two squads were formed, one to dig and trench some grass land and the other for demolition work within the prison walls. Others worked indoors, some making mail bags, and some on inside prison duties, such as cleaning and keeping tidy the prison landings. These jobs, together with exercise, gave about 5 hours per day out of the cells, and, after many applications, a further two hours were allowed in the evenings for association, cards and other table games; a vast improvement on the treatment during the first weeks' 22½ hours' confinement but only part of the way towards "non-punitive" treatment as later understood and put into effect at Brixton and elsewhere.

During air raid alerts, all were locked in the cells and all lights extinguished. It is neither a pleasant experience nor an intelligent proceeding.

As reports came through that in some cases, following the hearings before the Advisory Committee, further detention had been ordered, the individuals concerned were separated from the main body and moved to the extreme end of the wing and kept entirely apart, it being an offence to speak to them.

At last came news of a removal to an Internment Camp, giving rise to much joy, and much speculation as to which camp it would be, York or Ascot. The few belongings were packed in readiness for the move, which came on November 18th, on which morning, at 6 a.m. all had to move out to march to the station, where a train was waiting. The morning was wet and dark; many were soaked with rain whilst loading their luggage on to a coach. The way led through a church-yard, and it was so dark that the military escort could not properly see the prisoners, and found themselves falling over graves or coming to a full stop against tombstones; there was a re-count at the station, and the guards seemed relieved to find that none had got lost on the way.

The party arrived at York Camp late in the afternoon, much pleased to meet many old friends they had not seen since the dark days of Walton Prison. Here—strange are the workings of authority—they could also associate freely with those with whom it had been an offence to exchange even a word at Stafford.

Some mention might be made of the Chapel at Stafford Prison. No doubt in years past it had been well cared for, as befitted a House of God, a corner amongst the stone walls, where a prisoner might, for a while be uplifted from the surrounding sordidness. Yet, as these prisoners found it, its condition was disgraceful and shocking. Birds had made of it their roosting place, and the seats allotted to the 18B detainees were encrusted with dirt and had to be carefully wiped before use. Almost as sickening, as in all the jails we have had described, was the atmosphere in which the "devotions" had to be carried on, with warders placed at various points where they could command a good view of their charges.

Not, on the whole, a pleasant experience. Yet, bad as it was, not to be compared with the scandalous conditions and treatment meted out at Walton.

THE BLAME

Now who was at fault in the matter of prison treatment?

It is plain that the blame lies between certain prison warders and official prison governors, the Home Office and the Home Secretary.

The victims of this maltreatment, these indignities—a number of whom are to-day broken men, in body and mind—were not hardened criminals. They were not prisoners of war—International Red Cross would not have tolerated such a state of affairs. They were not proven traitors, or else they would long ago have been brought to trial. They were men from all walks of life, from doctors to doorkeepers; British born and bred, naturalised British citizens, alien civilian and neutral subjects, all untried and uncharged.

It could have been different. With the first arrests in September 1939, a number of warders were sent from Brixton to Wandsworth to show the staff there how remand prisoners should be treated. Their presence was apparently resented and their advice ignored. For that, the whole Wandsworth Administration is to blame.

It could easily have been different. Prison Governors could have been given, and made to carry out, special instructions, in regard to the men. Warders had to be on duty whether cell doors were locked or not, and the torture of prolonged solitary confinement could have been avoided. Instead of parliamentary questions being warded off by disarming mis-statements and evasions, steps could have been taken to minimise or remove the vermin problem. Furthermore during removal from one gaol to another, elementary decencies could have been observed.

It could easily have been different had the Home Office and the Home Secretary had the slightest desire to make it so.

ASCOT CAMP.

Apart from those in Stafford Prison, most of the 18B detainees were in Walton Prison by mid-July. The appalling conditions of that prison had been made sufficiently well-known to outside quarters and the visiting prison commissioner to lead the authorities to hasten the plans they had in mind for transfer to an internment camp. News of a forthcoming move soon circulated around the prison and after some days was confirmed, but no hint as to the destination was given. A natural consequence of this secrecy was the spread of disturbing rumours. Acute distress was caused by a persistent story that detainees were going to Canada. No complete denials could be obtained to rumours of this kind.

On the 30th July, 1940, warning was given of a move early the next day. Relief at leaving Walton was tempered by trepidation as to what lay ahead. After an early breakfast, detainees were marched down to the basement, where property was restored to its owners. They were then piled into char-a banes for the journey to Lime Street station. Armed troops lined the prison approaches and armed soldiers sat in each coach.

At the station were more armed troops, and under the gaze of a crowd of curious spectators the prisoners stood about until two special trains were ready. There was one disgusting episode, referred to elsewhere and symptomatic of the prevailing Fifth Column fever—the stripping of military buttons and insignia from the tunics of men who had been arrested from the army.

Arriving at Ascot, the party was told off into groups of fifty, and after much delay were marched under an escort with fixed bayonets, along the road to the camp.

At the entrance stood a grim-faced "reception party" of camp N.C.O.'s, including a sergeant-major, who greeted many detainees with the remark that he would like to see them all shot. That seemed to be the general attitude on that day and for some little time afterwards.

There was no suggestion of haste and little of efficiency. On that blazing summer afternoon, after weeks of cell confinement, men were marched into a compound behind the camp buildings, there to stand for hours until the last group had arrived, then to be counted and re-counted endlessly until the officers were convinced (as was indeed the case) that one man had escaped during the journey and finally to undergo another farcical "medical examination" the only one that many had during the whole stay at the camp—wherein each group in turn stood stripped naked whilst a medical officer marched past them. Part of this "examination" took place in full view of the main road.

Still the parade continued. Many fell to the ground, fainting from hunger and heat. Eventually volunteer cooks were called for, for no food had been prepared, and after these had gone to the kitchen the rest marched inside for property examination. That over, men found their way to the various rooms which were to be their "homes" for the next six months.

It was late in the evening that a scratch meal was forthcoming, and then, having filled palliasses in a milling throng around the single straw dump, most were glad to try to find sleep.

The camp lay some 1¾ miles south of Ascot, and was originally the winter quarters of a famous circus. The soil in that district is of light surface loam and sand, and the loam quickly wore away, so that dust and sand pervaded everywhere, presenting great difficulties in cleaning the extremely overcrowded huts. Two parallel barbed-wire entanglements surrounded the camp, sentries patrolling between them night and day. On three sides turrets had been erected between the wiring and from these Bren guns pointed towards the camp.

Having all been intended to house animals or circus equipment, the buildings were in no condition to house human beings. Accommodation comprised six main huts with three small annexes leading off. The two largest huts were used solely as dining and recreation rooms. All flooring was of concrete, apart from the recreation room, which had board flooring over a sawdust ring. In addition, there were the cooks' bunkhouse, kitchen and a small wood-built hut situated away from the main building, used during the first month or so as a hospital, until an old store was cleared in the main building and adapted for that purpose.

During the summer months, 100 men lived in tents, these later being replaced by six Nissen huts.

Overcrowding was chronic. With the exception of the hospital, all the sleeping accommodation was of dilapidated and dirty three-tiered bunks. In three of the four main huts, approximate dimensions 70 feet by 25 feet, the military enforced a rule that there should be not less than thirty bunks in each. On first arrival, one of these huts held thirty-four bunks and had to house ninety-seven persons. The state of the atmosphere on a hot summer's night after the doors had been locked at 9 p.m. needs little imagining, especially as night "lavatories" consisted of one pail and a flat wall with runaway at the end of and forming part of the hut, and only cut off from the sleeping accommodation by a wooden partition in which was an open archway 10 feet by 12 feet. The main hut, only slightly larger in area, was the worst in the camp, housing at peak one hundred and twenty-seven men. Owing to its peculiar construction—it was windowless and the only ventilation was from skylights in the roof, which were, in most cases, fixtures and not able to be opened—this became known as the "Altmark" hut. . . .

In the kitchen, which was about 26 feet by 18 feet, there was inadequate accommodation, and the equipment found was only sufficient for the preparation of food for about three hundred and fifty persons, whilst there were at first six hundred and seventeen to be fed. It was with the greatest difficulty that volunteer cooks could be prevailed to stick to their heart-breaking task of preparing meals with such inadequate equipment, and for the first few weeks only a bare minimum of food could be produced from the rations provided. The food problem was aggravated because after weeks, sometimes months, of prison life on low diet the detainees suddenly found themselves in a position to take plenty of open-air exercise, for which their bodies were craving, and so day after day the one topic became—food! (It is significant that, about a month before the camp was vacated, important alterations were made to the kitchen and much additional equipment added, although the numbers had by then shrunk to about four hundred and fifty, a figure nearer to what the camp could reasonably accommodate).

The reader might sometimes wonder if the story of hardship is not perhaps, being stressed too much; whether, having due regard to the state of emergency existing, allowances should not be made. But two things stand out. Recognising that there was no justifiable ground on which most of these detainees should have been arrested at all, the Home Office had drawn up, to satisfy alarmed opinion in the Houses of Parliament, strict rules to ensure that the detention should be of a non-punitive nature; and many of the internees were middle-aged or elderly, some over 70 years of age, and some were cripples or partly invalids, still suffering from shock of arrest, worry over loss of business or employment, and unable over long periods to get in touch with wives and families, of whom many had been left destitute. These, as well as the healthy young Fascists pictured by the daily press, had undergone all the rigours of prison and now found themselves flung into a prison camp, where no proper arrangements had been made to receive them, and had themselves to set up, by the painful process of trial and error, an organisation to see that there were carried out by voluntary labour the many unpleasant but necessary jobs; cleaning out lavatories, cess-pools, grease-traps and the like, which must be done if such a primitive camp should not become a hot-bed of disease. Their indescribable misery in those

This picture-plan of the trial of Louis XVI, giving the names of his judges, and the chart of proscriptions of Parties in France from June 1793 to September 1797, which appears on the page facing, are taken from a volume entitled "Biographical Anecdotes of the Founders of the French Republic and of other Eminent Characters who have distinguished themselves during the Progress of the Revolution," Vol. I, published by R. Phillips, No. 71 St. Paul's Church Yard, London, in 1799.

"Biographical Anecdotes," contained 444 pages and listed 114 characters. The biographies make most interesting reading to-day. By noting the names of the persons who judged the king, nominally in the name of Liberty, and then considering the Chart facing—showing in order of dates how these persons, faction by faction, and sometimes individual after individual, went to their deaths as "enemies of the people," meaning the State executive of the moment—we obtain a valuable lesson in the folly of Government by Proscription. The picture, and the chart facing it, are warnings against the employment of methods of arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, such as 18B. This is not the way to defend democracy or to protect liberty and well-being of the people. These 1799 studies establish this truth beyond question.

CHART of the Proscriptions of Parties in France, from that of the Brissotins in June 1793, to that of the Royalists in September 1797.

This chart, published, as stated on page facing, in 1799, is a most interesting study. Consider the lists of deputies and individuals proscribed, faction after faction, who, in power, had judged and silenced opponents. What a marvellous realistic study in the tragedy of human error! We ask the reader to look at the names of those who tried the king and then note their place in this chart. Those who condemned followed their royal victim into annihilation. At the end, not revolutionary freedom, but imperial terrorism was re-established.

As with 18B in Britain, so in revolutionary France, the original excuse for The Terror was war, and fear of counter-revolution and enemy-conspiracy. Out of this fear rose the cry of clamour. Party after party fell victim to the cry. Each faction in turn was condemned until the struggle exhausted itself and from the crisis was evolved, not liberty, but mundane tyranny. Louis XVI ended in Napoleon I. In satire was the King avenged. Throughout the world to-day this ironic mock-evolution, this circular parade of hysterical non-progress, is being repeated. In no mood of cynical rejoicing, but rather in stern truthfulness and public affection, we bid the common people pause and consider the historic past. We want a democracy to arise that shall make an end of government by Proscription because of its essential wrong and its fundamental unwisdom. We want prisons and concentration camps abolished, the struggle for power to give place to jealousy for freedom. And we want those who call themselves democrats, and believe in the right to proscribe, to consider that proscription in the end destroys the libertarian, the progressive, and the democrat. It ends in Imperialism and clamour.

1793 to 1943 is 150 years! After so long a time—one-hundred-and-fifty-years—the lesson ought to be heeded by every thinking citizen.

first few weeks was only a little alleviated by a sometimes sympathetic but apparently helpless military staff who, as became clear with continued contact, had no knowledge of the treatment stipulated by the Home Office, and who certainly never showed any attempt to carry out the Government regulations during the whole period of this camp.

In every direction was gross neglect of even the most elementary things required to make life endurable. For several weeks no issue was made of either soap or towels, and many were finally reduced to trying to "wash" face and hands with sand. Clothes were unwashed as well as the person; metal plates and bowls had to be scoured with sand and could not be wiped, no material being available, not even the newspapers which had been found so useful in prison. In consequence, most men were soon eating from rusty plates. Eventually, small hand towels were put on sale at an inflated price. (Nobody seemed to care; nobody could do anything about it).

In the first three weeks, no letters came and, though cards were issued on the lines of army "field postcards", nobody knew whether these had reached their destination. Some of the newspapers had been screaming that there should be meted out wholesale deportation to Canada or elsewhere, and there was horror abroad in the camp and nerves broken down with thoughts of relatives and dear ones, long without news, tortured with doubts as to what had happened and wondering whether the first intimation would be of another "unfortunate" tragedy like that of the "Arandora Star." Permission to send reassuring telegrams home was brusquely refused. Sometimes distraught wives arrived at the camp gates and were turned away because they had no permits to make visits. This regardless of the fact that nobody in the camp had been advised either that such permits were necessary or where they could be obtained.

Such treatment was plain torture of men and women and in Britain, when the world was being called upon to rally to her cause of Decency, and Liberty, and Justice. . . .

When visits were eventually permitted, it seemed as if everything imaginable had been done to make them unpleasant and distressing. Along the centre of a small room was placed a trestle table, with chairs on either side. Visitors sat on one side, detainees on the other, sitting elbow to elbow, and, watching over them, was a sergeant, whose rough handling of this humiliating situation caused constant pain. Later on, this situation improved, but by then many who had experienced one visit preferred to forego further similar indignities.

In every department the same hopeless muddle and cruelty. Boots and clothes falling to pieces and neither replacement nor facilities for repair; constant under-feeding so that exercise had voluntarily to be restricted; letters constantly being delayed or disappearing altogether. Parcels were permitted from relatives and friends outside, but the "lucky" recipients were sometimes almost afraid to ask for them as most were damaged or spoilt beyond use, jam mixed with cigarettes, perishables in a rotting condition, as if they had been deliberately mistreated as part of the punishment.

With nerves and body both suffering, the proportion requiring medical attention grew. On arrival from Liverpool Prison, there were found neither hospital nor first aid facilities. Sick men simply remained in their bunks, to be attended to there, amidst all the noise and bustle of a hundred men, by a Medical Officer and R.A.M.C. corporal. After a week, a wooden hut, which at a pinch could house three men, was used, ventilated by windows which, when blacked out at night, blocked the only way in which air could enter. These conditions prevailed for seven or eight weeks. There were several doctors among the detainees, and these did their best to alleviate suffering, but were cramped in their efforts by lack of authority or equipment. At the end of September, a larger and better equipped hospital was opened, but it was situated at the worst possible spot, its doors opening into the main corridor and facing the dining room entrance, where hundreds of hungry men assembled three times a day, so that the noise and its effect on the patients need not be described. No special facilities were provided for the preparation of food for sick men, who had to try and recoup on such rough cooking that their fellow detainees with limited equipment could provide. Detainees themselves attempted to organise a first aid corps, but this never progressed very far as supplies and equipment were refused by the military, and private efforts by some of the monied detainees secured only a few needs.

The result of the poor feeding and general bad living conditions and of the earlier prison hardships were most noticeable during roll-calls, when numbers collapsed on parade. Here again was another instance of official inefficiency and stupidity, whereby six hundred men sometimes stood for half-an-hour or more under a broiling sun, or, at other times, went straight from bed to stand with their broken boots in icy puddles, whilst being counted and re-counted and while the camp was being searched, it eventually being found in nearly every case that an incorrect count was due to the military's own negligence. In many instances men supposed to be missing from roll-calls had actually been released or been moved to the hospital in Aldershot.

At no time during the seven months at Ascot was there any attempt by the military to keep records of the different sections within the camp (i.e., Anglo-German, Anglo-Italian, etc.) or of other circumstances which were patently necessary for the running of the camp. Anything which was done on those lines had to be done by the detainees themselves.

HAM COMMON.

About the middle of 1940, there began to filter through to detainees in prison or in Ascot Camp mention of "Ham Common," as a place where special interrogations were being carried out. Suddenly, without warning, one or more men would be told to pack their belongings and were loaded into cars or army vehicles and whipped off "into the blue," to return a few weeks later pale, thinner and, in at least several cases, looking years older. In due course their story would come out, that they had been to Ham Common.

Actually, they referred to Latchmere House, a large country house of some fifty rooms standing in its own grounds on Ham Common and situated some 12 miles from London. In this house were carried out, by some unnamed agency, investigations regarding suspect aliens of many nationalities and selected 18B prisoners.

It is still true to say that the agency operating at Latchmere House is unknown; because neither the Advisory Committee nor the Military Intelligence officers at either Peel or York Camps appeared to know anything about Ham Common or its investigations. Evidence was discussed at Ham Common of which the Advisory Committee professed to know nothing, although the Home Secretary has said that the Committee sees all the evidence and facts that come into his possession. It is believed that nowhere, save on one isolated occasion in the House of Commons, has the place been publicly mentioned; which from the facts available, is not altogether surprising.

Here are the facts as supplied by prisoners who were sent there.

After being driven into the grounds and to the house entrance, the prisoners were escorted to an assembly room on the ground floor and taken from there, singly, before a reception officer. A quite unnecessarily thorough search of both person and property was then made, all correspondence and papers, even of a purely family nature, being taken away. Detainees were then taken to the cells. The cells were small and furnished only with a bed, wooden chair and, in a few cases only, a chest of drawers. Windows were blocked so as to permit an aperture of only three or four inches, whilst wooden bars, interwoven with barbed wire, formed an additional barrier to any attempt to escape. At night the windows were closed and locked and, as the doors were tight fitting, the air became stifling. In these cells were spent in solitary confinement 22½ to 24 hours of each day — the former figure being more representative. Armed sentries guarded the grounds and guards with hip revolvers stood in the corridors.

Morning and evening an orderly officer entered the cells to enquire if there were any complaints. If there were, these were noted and frequently forgotten or ignored. Apart from that, not a word of conversation throughout the day.

Meals were scanty, inadequate to sustain proper strength. In quantity they were only about half the normal meagre prison diet. They were brought in by soldiers, or collected, when the cell door was duly unlocked, from the kitchen nearby; and if a few words were sometimes exchanged with the soldier it was in breach of the regulations. It was usually some ten days before the prisoners' accounts were unfrozen and limited extra food could be bought.

No newspapers were permitted and it would seem that correspondence inwards and outwards was destroyed, since letters were not delivered.

Exercise was taken during a half-hour period, morning and afternoon, on a lawn outside the house. At first, British and foreign detainees exercised together, but later, after protest, the British prisoners were allowed to exercise at different times. Here again, strict silence was enforced, prisoners having to walk up and down the lawn apart from each other. Armed guards stood about the lawn, others paced backwards and forwards outside the barbed wire perimeter, and yet more were seen looking out from various windows — in all, about five guards for each man, a display of force quite incomprehensible, unless it was to intimidate and weaken the mental resistance of the prisoners. Half an hour of such exercise and then back to the silence of the cell.

After a few days, "association" was allowed, two prisoners being allowed in a cell together for a few minutes, where they might engage in conversation. This association took place in cells in what was known as the "hospital wing," and there are grounds for believing that the cells had been prepared beforehand and that microphones were somewhere concealed. One man states that he found wiring in the chimneypiece, and received three days' punishment for so doing. Again, the temporary companion was often a stranger, sometimes a foreigner, and might possibly have been a police agent.

After a week or fortnight of this treatment, when nerves were beginning to wear thin, each man was given a severe cross-examination. This might come at any time of the day or night—one man at least was awakened and interrogated in the early hours of the morning. Every attempt was made by browbeating, threatening, cajoling and promising to extract admissions that might be used against the individual or the organisation to which he belonged. A favourite promise was that what was said at Ham Common would carry weight when the individual's case came before an Advisory Committee. Minute after minute, sometimes hour after hour, this pitiless accusing questioning went on, then finally the prisoner was taken back to his cell. Then, hours afterwards, the cell door might be opened to admit an officer with a supplementary question, or asking for a fresh account of some point which had arisen. In some cases, there came further prolonged interrogations intended, it seems, to break down all reserve.

But ingenuity was not exhausted. An officer suddenly burst into one man's cell to say a letter had just arrived giving news of an accident in which a relative had been seriously injured. The report was totally untrue and was apparently only another effort to induce a state of nervous breakdown in which the individual might be easily trapped into careless utterances.

Nerves began to crack. Mr. Compton Domville of London states:

"It was not long before my memory began to deteriorate. Certain periods of my life completely disappeared from my mind. Others who shared my experiences at Ham Common have since remarked on similar symptoms in themselves. Even at the time I noticed in others a growing mental hypertension. One association period I had I remember closely. On entering the room, my companion started pacing up and down the room, excitedly uttering disjointed phrases and almost ignoring my presence. . . . I, together with others there, was able to consult the resident doctor. He stated to me plainly that the treatment was intended to produce a state of 'mental atrophy and unreserved loquacity' ".

So the treatment continued, day after day, until, after stays of three to five weeks, the prisoners received orders to pack within an hour, and were returned to their former places of detention.

Latchmere House seems to have fallen into disuse. One story, in fact, says that the house was destroyed in an air raid during 1941. But the facts remain and they are ugly ones, which nothing can obliterate.

Who was behind it? Not, apparently, the Home Office. The War Office, acting through Military Intelligence? The Swinton Committee, alleged to be answerable only to the Prime Minister? Detainees have no means of saying. But whoever it was, they seemed to have authority wider than did the Advisory Committee, and may have had powers of recommendation regarding further detention or release even greater than those of the Home Secretary himself.

These are questions which demand an answer now, for the same mysterious O.G.P.U. may still be working insidiously against the interests of other citizens.

YORK RACECOURSE CAMP.

On November 1st, 1940, the personnel at York Racecourse Camp was completed to a total of four hundred detainees, including parties from Ascot, Edinburgh, Stafford, Brixton and Walton.

The largest party travelled from Ascot and was escorted by a specially picked company of "tough" Canadian soldiers who had been very specially informed that they were to escort a gang of dangerous prisoners of war, Fifth Columnists, traitors and "tough guys" supposed to be non-or anti-British. The first sign of this to the detainees was on leaving Ascot Camp for York.

On assembly at 7.30 a.m. at Ascot Camp, the detainees were checked out of the main camp on to a parade ground in batches of fifty, while alongside (though outside the barbed wire) the Canadian guards were receiving final instructions, and were made to demonstrate not only that they were loading their rifles, but that they would not hesitate to shoot on little or no provocation. The Camp Commandant made an address which included a remark that many of the escort guard were "Mounties" who could shoot quick and straight and had been given orders to do so if necessary.

A number of shots were actually fired into the air, apparently as a warning, which, needless to say, created much resentment, as the party included many ex-service men of this and the last war.

The detainees were finally marched off to the station, herded into a train, and told to remain in their seats and not to open windows or doors or try to communicate with other compartments. One or two, for lack of air, began to open windows, but quickly desisted and sat down with no little alarm following an inrush of a sergeant and/or corporal with revolver drawn and a soldier with rifle and bayonet pointed in a most threatening manner. Men were not allowed in the passages and could only visit the toilet singly after obtaining perrmission from an N.C.O.

After some time, some of the more venturesome inveigled one or more soldiers into conversation, and astonishment was expressed at finding the detainees to be British, not aliens. Thereafter the guards, apart from officers and N.C.O.s, relaxed and allowed the detainees greater freedom of movement, and at York, when the Canadians handed over the party, many shouted "Goodbye and good luck!" They were replaced at York Station by the York Camp guard.

As though similarly prepared for toughs and traitors, these fresh troops met the detainees with surly looks of contempt. Hand luggage, mainly comprising sandwiches, toothbrushes, towels, pyjamas, etc., was taken away and thrown in a heap (nothing labelled) on the station platform. Between fixed bayonets, at an unreasonably fast pace and repeatedly told to "get in step" and keep the pace, despite the distress caused among the older men, the detainees marched three miles to the camp, their way taking them through the streets of York, where many residents recognised respected Yorkshiremen among these supposed "traitors."

Severe but efficient reception was given at the camp, where there was a brisk search and registration routine. Then a wild scramble to recover property from the dump of hand luggage. This was followed by an issue of metal plates and mugs, knives, forks and spoons, all dirty, smelly and greasy or covered with paraffin. After this, detainees were sent to a stone-floored waiting room, a dismal disused "long bar" under the racecourse grandstand, ill-lit, damp and cold, unheated and without fires or stoves. Here they sat on forms, packed like sardines, to eat from what were supposed to be whitewood trestle tables, but were, in fact, black and greasy.

Beds were allotted in either "huts" or "dens." The "huts" comprised ex-booking offices and totalisator offices and were not too bad; each held between forty and fifty men. They were equipped with two stoves and folding metal beds; they were eight to ten feet high, twelve to fourteen feet wide and one hundred feet long, very draughty and otherwise badly ventilated. They were very damp except around the stoves. The "dens" were disgusting. They were glass-fronted sheds under the grandstand and moisture was constantly streaming down both the glass front and the other side formed by the under-side of the grandstand steps. The sole furniture was wooden two-tier bunks. No coat-hooks, lockers or cupboards were available. Each "den" was fourteen feet wide and about sixty feet long, and sixty to eighty men were packed in each. No toilet rooms or lavatories were installed and to get to the nearest convenience involved crossing an open yard of about fifty yards distance—not a pleasant journey in the rains and snowstorms of that period. Being locked inside from 6 p.m. to 8 a.m., the sixty to eighty men in each "den" had, perforce, to use buckets for toilet purposes. The atmosphere of the places during such period need not be described.

Early Ascot experiences in the matter of sparse rations were repeated here; though they were later considerably improved. Detainees' rations have always been bare, but there was usually oatmeal for porridge, the one food most detainees appreciated. Only at York did they seem in danger of losing this oatmeal, as no issue was made on one occasion for three successive days. This led them to believe that this mainstay of their diet was to be lost; a spirited protest was made and it was again issued on the fourth day and continually thereafter.

A fight begun at Ascot had to be begun all over again for clothing, especially heavier winter wear, which up to then had not been obtained, but despite promise after promise four weeks went by before even the most needy cases obtained essential boots, jackets and overcoats. Only the destitute (as ascertained by a military instigated "means test") were then catered for and others had to wait.

During the first period extra letters above the two issued weekly were very difficult to obtain and were frequently returned, sometimes four to six weeks later as "provoking and unsuitable." This state of affairs was later eased and almost any "special letter" was allowed, but each had to be typed and submitted in quadruplicate. Very little free stationery was issued and pens, ink, pins or clips had to be found by the detainees out of whatever collective resources they possessed.

No outside work was available and the only Government "payment" for work in the camp was the sum of 17/- per week to cover haircutting, shoe-repairing and tailoring for five hundred men. Appeal was made to detainees with means and to outside friends for contributions to a "Welfare Fund," from which one hundred and twenty destitute camp workers were paid a weekly token for service. Working hours varied between four and eight hours a day—wages were from 1/9d. to 4/- per week.

After the first month, the military authorities became much more considerate and understanding than at Ascot and some of the officers said openly that they thought British detainees should receive at least some of the privileges enjoyed by previous alien and refugee inhabitants of the camp.

A canteen, well stocked, though charging high prices, was provided, from which was promised 40 per cent. of the net profits. Only a small portion of the monies thus due was ever received. Twelve months after they had vacated the camp the sum due, estimated to exceed £200, had not been handed over.

Another valued privilege was permission to receive visitors in the canteen, under conditions less reminiscent of prison life, detainees sitting in my part of the room with their visitors and both being allowed to converse with neighbouring detainees or their visitors. (This much-valued concession has not been granted elsewhere before or since.)

Health.—Five detainees, one a qualified doctor, ran the camp hospital, but medical supplies were inadequate and had to be augmented out of the camp funds. These services were not paid for by the authorities although, without them, outside professional assistance would have been essential.

Sanitation and Hygiene.—All lavatories were dark and unlighted and toilet paper was rarely issued—best issue for any one week was one roll for fifty men. All camp cleaning materials were sparsely obtainable, and then only after repeated requests. No capes, rubber boots, shovels or litter bins were available. All drains were badly arranged and were frequently choked up, and often remained so for days on end until outside repairers came in. Detainees' offers to carry out repair work was not accepted, and tools for such work were not allowed.

No laundry was provided or possible (though the men improvised a semblance of one in a dark, unused toilet room) and drying facilities were absent.

Education and Entertainment.—Adequate accommodation, heating, lighting, equipment or other facilities were not available for classes and entertainments until the last few weeks before leaving the camp, and then only after repeated requests.

Kitchen.—Arrangements were dirty and inadequate. Cooking and vegetable cleaning had to be carried out in a dark lean-to hut until, after long delay, permission was obtained to build fresh accommodation. Compliments were afterwards paid for the good job made of the kitchen and its cleanliness and attractiveness; thus the 18B detainees left something of infinite value to future users of the camp.

In the last months at this camp, conditions vastly improved, so that detainees did appreciate that the "non-punitive" description of their incarceration was near to realisation, and those who were at York during the last month or so will say that there at least they were treated like human beings.

There-is, however, a sting in the tail. When leaving York to go to Huyton, detainees had their belongings rigorously searched, when very carefully treasured tinned and dried foods were confiscated, as well as recently issued articles of clothing (the latter under promise that new ones would be issued at Huyton) and, as stated before, over £200 carefully collected and hard-earned Welfare Funds, from inside and outside subscriptions and canteen profits, was not passed to their credit, either at Huyton or (up to the time of writing—February, 1942) at Peel.

HUYTON.

A "Penguin" booklet entitled "The Internment of Aliens" supplied a much fuller account of Huyton Internment Camp than can now be attempted. It told of misery so profound that many internees were driven to suicide. By chance, and their own determined efforts, 18B detainees were saved from the same degree of wretchedness suffered by the aliens who had gone that way before, but they too found Huyton a place of extreme discomfort, shockingly lacking in essential facilities and administered with gross ineptitude.

When, in March, 1941, advance parties arrived at the camp, they found utter chaos and unpreparedness so great that no effective efforts could be made to clear things up before the main parties arrived from Ascot and York. Bedding, discarded rags of clothing, scrapped pots and pans and junk of all kinds covered most of the open space in the camp, whilst inside the houses it seemed as if an army of wreckers had been at work. Electric wiring had been slashed through and fittings wrenched from walls; water pipes supplied miniature cataracts from many punctures and drenched ceilings had fallen in; windows were smashed and cupboard doors and other wooden fittings had disappeared, presumably used as fuel.

Perhaps the best comment on the position was the finding after a few days' occupation of the camp of the dead body of one of the previous occupants hidden away under a pile of stretchers in the camp hospital. Officers gave the impression that they had known him to be missing, but only an increasingly unpleasant smell, and not their investigations, led to this discovery.

The camp consisted of four streets of new jerry-built Council houses, the whole surrounded by barbed wire pallisading, surmounted by elevated sentry posts and patrolled by military guards. A four-acre recreation ground was separately wired off and available at certain restricted periods.

The houses, which varied in size, containing from four to seven rooms, were inadequately furnished with trestle tables, forms, a chair or two, and the requisite number of folding metal bedsteads. Strawfilled palliasses served as mattresses, but many were partly filled owing to maldistribution of the straw. Shortage of blankets meant that dirty remnants intended for blackout blinds had to be pressed into service. Cleaning materials, such as dusters and scouring powders, had to be bought by detainees out of their own funds.

The roadways were macadamised, but because of the layout to get from one part of the camp to another often incurred a wide detour. Intervening spaces, between the roads, were at best barren, uneven wastes, and in wet-weather soggy morasses. Around the kitchens and eating accommodation was, usually, a sea of mud, made passable only by liberal dumpings of cinders and pathways of rotting duckboards.

Food.—The kitchens were of an appallingly primitive nature, a corrugated iron roof being slung across supporting posts, to cover a few near-scrap boilers. This strange erection had no walls, and the ovens were but slightly better protected from the weather. Many appeals had to be made, and much time elapsed, before new boilers were installed to replace the original burned out and rusted wrecks. These factors, coupled with severely limited rations, made for a state of affairs where men were literally near-starving, since, through sheer inadequacy of the available equipment, much food was spoiled, and rations reaching the internees were insufficient to satisfy a normal appetite.

At the outset, no facilities were provided whereby the ordinary diet might be supplemented. One fact which will testify to the prevailing conditions is this: a detainee released at the time made it his first duty outside the camp to buy and send back for general distribution a ton of potatoes.

As eating accommodation was unlit, unheated army huts, incapable of seating more than a fraction of the camp population, it was always necessary for hundreds of men to trudge distances of up to half-a-mile in all weathers, fetching their meals from the kitchens to houses; thus it happened that all meals were usually cold before they could be eaten.

Some relief was provided when, after much unnecessary delay, a canteen was opened, selling strictly limited supplies of canned vegetables and fruits, milk, flour and cigarettes. The fortunate few possessing money and sufficient patience to queue for hours were somewhat aided by this development, but inflated prices were charged even for fixed-price proprietary brand goods—the bombardier in charge of the canteen even loaded "puchase tax" on goods such as foodstuffs well known to be free from such levies. The bulk of the unmonied people in the camp, however, had to manage on miserably short commons, only gradually improved as the cookhouse workers' strenuous efforts triumphed over enormous practical difficulties.

One should note that here, as in all other camps, the detainee was left to fend for himself. Having committed a man to internment, the Government apparently recognises no responsibility to see that he is fed. Raw rations are dumped into camp and it is left at that; whether there are men in the camp capable of converting these rations into consumable food, or whether reasonable facilities exist to enable them to do so, is nobody's business.

So tardy were the powers-that-be in acknowledging that, in preparing their own food and cleaning their own quarters the detainees were taking a burden from the shoulders of their gaolers, that for some time at Huyton it was disputed by the military that some remuneration was due to detainees who undertook kitchen and other work involving many hours' work each day. Ultimately, the point was conceded and payment granted, the usual payment being 1/8 per week! When outside working parties were permitted, their earnings were subject to a large deduction to subsidise this payment to camp workers.

Outside Work. Work became available in this way. Very heavy air raids on Liverpool were taking place, and volunteers were called for to assist in demolition and other somewhat dangerous work; these came forward to a total of about one hundred, all with some building experience, and were to be paid by the Huyton Corporation at Trades Union rates of pay for building labourers. This gave hope to many that at least they would be able to send home something substantial, to help their destitute families. Authority stepped in, however, and ruled that only half of their earnings should be credited to them, the balance to go towards a so-called Billeting Allowance, and towards token payments to inside workers. It is surely unique for prisoners to have to pay for their housing and keep.

Military Control.—Inefficiency was the watchword, and to make confusion more confounded the camp was overloaded with officers and N.C.O.'s, whose main occupation seemed to be to interfere with and obstruct one another.

Two Company Officers came into the camp, at irregular hours and not every day, to answer queries and hear complaints. Through them, application had to be made to see other officers, so that delays were prolonged, for without their "chit" it was impossible to gain touch with officers outside the camp wire. Illustrating the position is the case where a small list of paints, easily obtainable from any ironmonger or hardware dealer, was desired for the Concert Room—an army hut converted for this use by detainees themselves. The request was actually passed through twenty-one N.C.O.'s and officers before being satisfied.

Roll calls, during which the whole population of the camp, often including cookhouse staff, lined up in one of the roads or in the recreation field, were exhibitions of sheer stupidity. It seemed certain that, for some time, the correct roll was not known, so that sometimes, after the whole camp had been waiting in line for two or three hours, after they had been checked and re-checked by name, the count was still in dispute. In one case, a man found himself included twice, once under his own name and again under his business name, and another name on the roll was that of a man released weeks before from Ascot. These foolish happenings went on for weeks, until there was adopted the commonsense system, practised in all other house camps, of counting detainees before or inside their houses.

Visits.—It is believed that the Intelligence Officers were responsible for the very strict conditions governing visits from relatives and friends for a period at this camp.

Inside the army hut where visits were held, two trestle tables were placed edge to edge to impose a separation of at least four feet between visitor and detainee. Detainees sat elbow to elbow down one side; visitors similarly, on the other. Intimate domestic matters and private business affairs had to be shouted across that table, each couple (together with children, who were not allowed to go to their fathers) trying to retain the thread of conversation amid this babel; while all the time, prowling to and fro, listening first to this conversation and then to that, moved a most offensively mannered, sour-tongued Intelligence Officer. These were the delights of a visit, after prolonged separation, experienced by wives, families and friends, many of whom had travelled two hundred miles and more at expense they could ill-afford, for the bare half hour's conversation allowed.

Such was life at Huyton; dull, depressing and oppressive. So it went on, building up resentment and bitterness which found its expression later on, following the move to the Isle of Man.

HOLLOWAY.

"Where the weak sex were tortured."

Holloway Prison has housed many strange inmates and through its gloomy, desolate passages and wings have passed not alone the dregs of human society, but women whose names are now honoured throughout the world as pioneers and whose record of public service entitles them by public consent to the honours which have since been conferred upon them. Under the great Victoria Tower in the Embankment Gardens at Westminster stands the statue raised to one such woman (unveiled with ceremony and solemn state by the Prime Minister of the day who paid the highest tribute to the integrity and patriotism of the woman he was honouring) but who in her Holloway days was execrated, denounced and derided by that other Prime Minister who, nearly twenty years earlier, had imprisoned her and hundreds of her followers. Yet with this, and many other lessons before them, Governments never learn! They still commit the same follies, follow the same petty methods of political persecution and hatred, until again the wheel turns a full circle and the world gazes upon them with contempt and ridicule. So in 1940 Holloway once again opened its great steel-studded doors to receive within its sordid tentacles a body of women drawn from every type and class of society, from youth to old age, who were to endure without charge or trial for months and years, that timeless detention which even the most degraded convicted criminal is not called upon to endure! Between the two periods, however, the deterioration of the national character which had made it possible to prostitute every known sense of fair play, to violate the great principles upon which English Constitutional Law had been created throughout the long ages of the upward struggle for liberty, had been self-evident to all who had watched the scene with discerning eyes—for whereas in the earlier imprisonments the women had challenged the existing laws, and were brought to trial in the Courts of Justice, in the later period their counterparts who had broken no law, but were nevertheless refused the inalienable right of trial and without charge, were herded into prison cells, there to linger for various periods under conditions and in an atmosphere which were and are a disgrace to those responsible. Yet even in the earlier period the trials of those days brought to light the methods which an unscrupulous administration is prepared to employ against those who dare to challenge its corruption. In the great Conspiracy Trial at the Old Bailey in 1912, Counsel for the Defence, the famous Mr. Timothy Healy, K.C., addressing the Court said:

> "I almost hesitate to call this a legal enquiry, I regard it as a vindictive political act. . . . It is not the women who are on trial. It is the system of Government that is on trial. It is the method of rolling the dice by fifty-four Counts in an indictment without saying to what any bit of evidence is attributable.' The system is on its trial, a system whereby every innocent act in public life is sought to be enmeshed in a conspiracy."

Here is exactly the case against those who filled Holloway in 1940 with innocent and defenceless women, innocent because uncharged and untried, defenceless because all the ordinary channels of defence afforded to the lowest and most degraded criminals were dammed up against them, stigmatised by imputation at least as traitors to their country, execrated by press and public without any opportunity or means to meet their castigators, without hope of release or relief, however exemplary their conduct, condemned to linger in prison, many for years, and some to be eventually deported and cut off from contact with their fellows for an indefinite and unknown period of time and treated accordingly by those into whose custody they had now been so ruthlessly handed!

What manner of women were these and how did they meet the disaster and tragedy that had come upon them? And of what manner were their gaolers and how did they deal with the situation which now faced them? Under what conditions did these women live out their unhappy days? What did they do and how did they pass the grim and long hours now assigned to them as an existence?

There were of course several categories. There were the alien women housed togther in one wing with those of so-called hostile origin or association, amongst whom were self-confessed professional prostitutes, suspected drug runners, and even white slave traffickers. No distinction was drawn between such types and the normal family woman and young and innocent girls, some still in their teens. They were all the victims of the dreaded 18B Regulation! These had been interned from the summer and Autumn of 1939 onward and were already fully established when, in May 1940, the political prisoners began to arrive. The first batch of political prisoners was small in number and was placed in B Wing, where for a few weeks they lived at first in close confinment, and then in association, until they were assigned to F Wing, which was now to house the influx which began in June 1940 and to continue until the wing was full to overflowing.

In both categories of course there were women of every class and type. Elderly women, middle aged women, and young girls, titled women, professional women, wage earners, working women, mothers torn from their tiny children, their homes ruined, their lives wrecked. Tragedy was all around and no one could look upon that scene without sensing the mental agony that enveloped them, collectively and individually. Yet by that astonishing quality possessed by those whose ideals and standards dominate their inner conscience, they at once began to show a genius for adaptability to their strange surroundings.

Their courage and endurance must for all time remain an example unsurpassed in any period of our history. Many showed a nobility of character that won for them the gratitude of all who saw and knew them, and which eventually broke down the hostility of those who held them in their power. Who shall pay a fitting tribute to these women? What reward, when the hour comes to do them honour, can be a measure of their fortitude, dignity, and courage? Until that time those who lived and suffered with them are proud to have been allowed to bear with them the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune that met them on every side.

Those who enter Holloway through the massive doors see before them a great courtyard from which the main building rises, majestic in structure, said to be a replica of the main front of Warwick Castle. The entrance to the Central Hall is flanked on either side by great stone pillars surmounted by two enormous stone dragons, diabolical both in design and form. Their enormous and viscious fangs are fully exposed in the jaws of these monsters. Their great claws hold down the begrimed stonework while in one of these is clenched a gigantic key, symbol of the gaoler's power over his pitiful victim; Lock and Key is the predominating sound in the dread silence that envelops a prison cell, Lock and Key the tragic sound that signalizes the death of liberty to each individual as the great prison doors close behind him and the outer world disappears. And now this sound is hardly ever to be absent from the ears of the prisoners. Every officer carries a forbidding looking bunch of keys attached to a steel chain which engirdles her waist, and wherever a prisoner goes, wherever she may be, the sound of the keys and the chain seems to rise above every other noise—keys and more keys, chains and more chains, everywhere, which to the normal person eventually becomes ludicrous. But perhaps the most haunting thing in a prison is the air of suspicion which hangs over every part of the building. Everyone is afraid of everyone else, afraid to speak, afraid to look, afraid of the unknown. "Walls have ears" wrote an old lag. But not alone have walls ears but everything and everybody seems to be full of ears and in no other place on earth one would think does rumour emerge and spread so quickly as in the inside of a prison. It was once said that the prisoners knew everything even before it happened. That, no doubt, is an exaggeration but it is a fact everything is known so quickly in the prison cell that it often seems incomprehensible to the newcomer. This is the more remarkable since no officer ever speaks to a prisoner except on prison business and each habitually wears an expression of complete detachment which makes many of them resemble the wax figures of Madame Tussaud. Until one gets used to these women they seem like sub-human creatures from whom all human interest and feeling have been extracted. They are of course most afraid of their fellow officers, afraid to speak or give expression of any sort lest they be reported for some breach of discipline, and they behave as though some hidden eye were always upon them, for they know too that not only walls have ears, but eyes in addition. The unfortunate conditions under which they are compelled to work creates a vulgar insolence, as a kind of protective armour against any approach and as time goes on they become aggressive and noisy, and many of course tyrannical and cruel. Their raucous voices seem to resound through the wings like a rasping saw and they appear to take a peculiar delight in shouting on all and every occasion.

Yet the political prisoners soon grew to understand the position of these unfortunate women and with the exception of a very few were soon on good terms, at any rate with those officers who were regularly in charge of them. On their side these officers at first so antagonistic and unpleasant, soon came to respect and recognise the position of the political prisoners and did all in their limited power to ease the situation. Indeed nothing was more striking to a detached observer than the change of attitude wrought in the prison officer towards the detainee and it must be said here that it was the exemplary behaviour and constant co-operation of the political prisoners themselves which brought about this change in the prison officer. By their bearing alone an attitude of respect and admiration took the place of the earlier attitude of insolence and intolerance, and to-day in Holloway the political prisoner's lot is eased and softened because the original political prisoners bore themselves with such patience and dignity, even in the most provocative circumstances. Their conduct entirely disarmed their gaolers as it were and made life more tolerable for both the officer and the prisoner.

According to Command Paper 6162, the political prisoners were to be housed in prisons where certain treatment was to be accorded to them as to association and recreation in addition to other conditions in order that their detention should be custodial rather than punitive. It has now been brought to light that the prisons chosen were unsuitable to enable these recommendations to be carried out and in fact that it was impossible to carry them out in the existing circumstances. This however, was not true of Holloway and, so far as was possible, facilities were granted to the women internees, which went some way towards making life more tolerable than in the men's prisons.

Shortly after the first arrests, the Woman Commissioner visited Holloway and arrangements were made to transfer the early political arrivals to F. Wing, a larger and more commodious wing which had been used previously by young delinquents. This wing had a large flagged hall running the length of the whole wing from which the cells opened off on each floor. It had a kitchen and scullery and several baths; it also contained a room for recreation and games and long tables ran the length of the hall with forms and chairs where meals could be taken in association. When the first political internees were transferred to this wing they cleaned it and made it habitable and eventually they themselves organised and ran the wing, of which a senior officer was in sole charge. And now began a life and existence strange beyond words to most of these who had to endure it! The dreary sordidness of the whole scene defies all description, the dirt of Holloway seems peculiar to itself, it appears to ooze from the walls and the black stone floors of every cell and gives the impression that it is part and parcel of the place. The windows of the cells are begrimed with the dirt of ages and dust and fluff covers the floor, however often the broom is used. The cell becomes the home of every prisoner and most of the hours of her life in prison are spent within its narrow confines. All her possessions of the moment live with her—her clothes, her food, her toilet accessories. She washes, dresses, eats, sleeps and does everything else within the limit of its space. How to keep it tidy is a conundrum, how to keep it clean under such circumstances a miracle. The accumulation which gradually gathers in every cell baffles description and the least said about some of these the better, but many were gradually turned into living quarters characteristic of their occupants.

The prison food at Holloway was really horrible—there was no attempt to vary it nor to make it in any way palatable either in appearance or taste. It is prepared and cooked in the central kitchen of the prison and each wing carries its own food from kitchen to wing, whether that wing houses convicted prisoners or internees. In this way the internee constantly came in contact with the convicted women, all being lined up outside the kitchens to await their turn for the food for the particular wing they represented.

Those who carried the food in this way were known as carriers and each wing organised its carriers for the week, a different set of carriers discharging these duties on each day. The carriers also had to carry the rubbish and waste from their wings and here the first conflict with the authorities and the political prisoners occurred. They were requested to sort the rubbish in addition to carrying it to the incinerators. This they at once refused to do and very properly the authorities did not attempt to enforce such a degrading rule upon the political women. The writer of this section was a political prisoner and therefore lived in F. Wing most of the time and writes therefore with more knowledge of the life in that wing than of the conditions in the other Wings. But it is a fact that in this matter of the sorting of the rubbish attempts were made to enforce it in other wings and that those who refused were severely punished by solitary confinement in what was called the black cell, a terrible form of punishment which should long since have been banished from prison routine in a civilised country.

In general, however, the internees gave full co-operation to the prison authorities and observed, as far as these were known to them, the existing regulations. The strictest discipline was maintained and the attitude and treatment in this respect was precisely the same as that meted out to the convicted women, save that at first in the case of the internee this attitude was one of marked antagonism, every opportunity being given to emphasize the contempt and suspicion with which they were regarded.

In extenuation it must be said that these prison officers have been trained solely to deal with and handle convicted criminals. Their lives have been spent in an atmosphere of penal work and discipline and it could not be expected that overnight they could completely change this mental attitude to those placed in their custody.

Every effort had been made by the Government and press alike to bring into discredit those detained under Regulation 18B and the most fantastic stories appeared in the daily papers deliberately working up public opinion against these innocent people. One example of this is made clear in the following letter sent on behalf of the political prisoners of F. Wing to the Chief Woman Commissioner:

"TO THE CHIEF WOMAN COMMISSIONER.

In an article which we here attach, in the "Daily Express" of August 3rd purporting to represent the views of the Prison Officers' Association, a number of false and misleading statements appear, which are obviously meant to refer to members and sympathisers of the late British Union and which are presented in such a way that they are calculated to stir up public feeling against those of us at present detained in this prison. This view is borne out by the fact that this same newspaper in common with others has for several days carried articles complaining bitterly of the conditions to which alien internees are subjected.

Before such charges we are at the moment helpless to defend ourselves and we have unanimously agreed to make an earnest appeal to you to help us against so grave an injustice. The position we here set out:

(1) So far from being accorded special privileges (which might have been expected in view of our nationality) we are detained in exactly the same conditions as are those of alien and hostile origin in this prison.

(2) Those conditions are laid down by the authorities and to the best of our knowledge we have adhered strictly to every condition and rule laid upon us, being willing at all times to co-operate and assist the authorities to the utmost and realising the difficulties that have been created by the present abnormal situation.

(3) To suggest as does this newspaper article that "the existing staff have to act as waiters and waitresses to Fascist sympathisers detained under the Defence Regulations" is utterly untrue. The duties of the staff have nothing whatever to do with us. They are laid down by the authorities and no officer has ever been asked to wait upon us. We do our own work having organised it we hope to the satisfaction of those in charge of us; we carry our own food from kitchen to wing, we wait at table upon ourselves and wash up under a voluntarily organised system.

(4) As to visits, like every other detained person here we are strictly limited to one visit a week, to two letters outgoing and to the same number ingoing, as are all other internees.

In this wing a large proportion of our people are so poor that no less than 34 have responded to the request by the authorities for prison labour in order that they may earn the 3/- per week which such labour is paid. We know nothing of bottles of champagne in this wing, most of us ordering only goods which we can afford to supplement the prison diet.

(6) With reference to the increased work of the Prison Officers, we have recognised this from the beginning and by our conduct have tried to mitigate this so far as is in our power, but the truth lies in the fact that the extra burden is due to the increase in the prison population, the result of the Government's present policy.

We would finally point out that we are innocent both in law and in fact, no charge of any kind save that of a political nature ever having been made against us, no trial permitted us and no opportunity given to defend ourselves against those who are not only our political opponents but who in addition are our prosecutors, judge and jury. Hitherto political prisoners in this country have never been subject to the restrictions of convicted prisoners nor attacks of this nature from outside from which we are quite unable to protect ourselves. In the full belief that those who have watched our behaviour under what for us are very humiliating conditions, and in addition which we regard as utterly unjust and unfair will see that justice is done to us in this matter, we present to you this plea, knowing that it will not be made in vain nor turned aside by those who at the moment are in authority over us.

Signed on behalf of those in F. Wing."

To describe the personal tragedies that daily haunted the prison would be impossible, but they were ever present and the mental agony was felt everywhere.

Some women had been torn from their tiny children, having to leave them without time or opportunity to make arrangements for their well-being; some were penniless, ruined in a night, some had their husbands and sons arrested and for weeks could get no news as to where they had been taken or what was happening to them; some were ill and totally unfit to be placed in such an atmosphere and there were even pregnant women, forced to face the horrible ordeal of arrest and imprisonment in circumstances unprecedented. Complete lack of human sympathy was the routine attitude of their gaolers and that perhaps was the most fearful feature of these inhuman proceedings.

Some women had brought tiny children with them and in F. Wing a small baby lived in a dark damp cell for months with its unfortunate mother who, however hard she struggled to make the conditions decent, could not do so.

In other wings similar conditions pertained and the whole scene was one of desolation and misery for months on end. The cold and damp of the wings and the cells added to the discomfort and the wonder is that the bulk of the women were able to endure, without a serious breakdown, treatment and conditions of such a cruel and callous nature.

Lest, however, it be thought that these conditions were deliberately created, it must be pointed out that as time went on, the conditions improved and gradually this amelioration was of a very marked character until now the ordeal is greatly lessened and the life at Holloway is less unendurable. What is to be regretted is that these ameliorations were not introduced at the beginning of the whole unpleasant business.

Air-raids were of course a great anxiety, but the authorities had the good sense to order the cells to be unlocked at the sound of the siren and to allow association. Nevertheless women confined in a prison during such an ordeal had the extra anxiety of being away from their loved ones and of being in a constant state of fear as to what might be happening to them, for many hours had to pass before they could get news or information as to their safety.

One extraordinary example of how the normal ordinary person can accustom himself to the most gruesome surroundings may be given. One of the condemned cells in Holloway was early discovered by some of the more curious and observant spirits amongst the internees. To the ordinary person such places represent a feeling of awe and horror, to others a morbid if repelling interest—and so it was in Holloway, but gradually the morbid interest gave way to complete indifference, and the writer of this section, who at first regarded this dreadful spot with horror and dread, came finally to live in the wing where it stood and in a cell almost adjoining it and to take her meals daily and for months outside the actual basement cell known as the drop, without the slightest apprehension or dread. In fact it was scarcely noticed or remembered by those who daily lived in close proximity to its grim walls, windows and doors. So does familiarity breed contempt, even in prison.

PORT ERIN.

At 10.30 p.m. on the 16th June, 1941, the first party of British women left Holloway Prison for the Isle of Man. The party consisted of forty-two women and seven children, all of the latter under seven and two of them infants in arms.

Before leaving, those of the group who had money in their accounts were allowed to draw 10/- for expenses on the journey. Those without money set forth penniless, neither were they provided with any food.

Army lorries were used for the journey to Euston Station and the women were escorted by policewomen seemingly of a most uncouth and ignorant type.

At Euston Station press photographers were well to the fore, rushing about trying to photograph the party. The police gave instructions that no photographs were to be taken, but by this time, of course, the attention of the large crowds on the platform had been focussed on the 18B group and there was a general rush to stare at the party.

At about 5.30 the next morning Fleetwood was reached and here, after a long trudge, complete with luggage, through the town, a light breakfast (tea and margarine) was served.

After this came yet another walk through the town to a dilapidated hall — a most uncomfortable and primitive place—where the members of the party were expected to settle down for the six or seven hours which must elapse before the boat could be boarded. The police in charge, who were going out in turn for meals, were asked several times whether any food could be obtained, if only milk for the children for whom no provision had been made, but, according to the police, nothing could be procured.

At last came the next move—on to the boat. The women were hustled below into a small saloon, and there they had to stay until the boat arrived at Douglas. There were still no food to be had and although a few cups of tea were obtained (paid for by members of the party) most of the tea had been spilt by the stewards before it reached the saloon.

Most of the children were sick and the others were crying from hunger. Two of the older children had whooping cough and they coughed and vomited all the time, causing much anxiety to the mothers of the other children with whom they were shut in.

Douglas was reached in the early evening and then came the worst part of the whole unpleasant journey.

As in the case of the men sent to Peel, the Manx papers had done everything in their power to inflame public opinion against the detainees even before they reached the island. The time of their arrival had been published and the local inhabitants undoubtedly encouraged to make the trudge through the town as unpleasant as possible. The children were placed in a van waiting by the quay, but the rest of the party, by this time completely tired out and very hungry, had to walk by the longest route from the quay to the station. The streets were thronged with people, most of whom made abusive remarks. At Douglas Station, there were still more jeering crowds, but at last the party was aboard the train bound for Port Erin.

On arrival, they were taken into the station waiting room, where much time was spent by a large number of people who were pouring over the lists to ascertain to which particular boarding houses the various members of the party had been allocated. By about 9.30—twenty-three hours after leaving Holloway, during which time one very light meal had been provided—most of the detainees had reached their new "homes."

The Port Erin camp, staffed by a group of civil servants, is a great improvement on Holloway Prison, but with a little organisation it could be very greatly improved.

On admission to Holloway Prison, there is no proper medical examination, but at least there is the farce of appearing before a doctor who asks "Are you well?" and occasionally, apparently to vary the formula, "Are you pregnant?" but in Port Erin even this formality is omitted. In its earlier days when the camp housed thousands of aliens and was crowded to such an extent that internees were sleeping two in a bed, on several occasions landladies had been considerably alarmed to find that some of their boarders were suffering from venereal disease.

Soon after arriving at Port Erin, it was found that several of the other children included in the 18B party had contracted whooping cough and one, an infant only a few months old, died a few months later from the complaint. Many of the local children also developed whooping cough.

Many of the 18B women had hoped that in Port Erin there would be work available which would enable them to earn a little money. They were soon disillusioned, however. There were many jobs in the various administrative sections of the camp, but these were all filled by aliens, and it was generally believed that instructions had been given that 18B's were not to be allowed to work, this despite the fact that they were at least as competent as the alien internees. One girl—a most capable worker—was offered domestic work, which she was most anxious to accept in order that she might be in a position to send a little money to her mother, a widow whose three sons as well as this daughter had been interned. She was, however, refused permission to accept the employment.

There was a department known as the "Service Exchange," where orders were taken from local inhabitants for knitted garments. The civil servant in charge was a woman who knew nothing at all about knitting and who made a point of employing as her assistants aliens as ignorant as herself on the subject. There was constant friction and most people who offered their services, for which the remuneration was quite inadequate, soon gave up working for the Exchange as the small amount earned was not worth all the trouble involved.

One or two of the younger detainees were offered work in a local potato crisp factory. They were to work for about forty-two hours a week for a wage of 15/-. Out of this 15/-, howeverer, they were compelled to pay 7/6 towards their maintenance, 2/6 to the Welfare Fund, the purpose of which fund remained a mystery to most detainees, and at least 1/6 to provide a substitute to undertake the household duties which each detainee was forced to perform. This left a balance of 3/6 per week for forty-two hours' work in a most unhealthy atmosphere.

There were no particular hardships in the camp, the degree of comfort of the individual detainee depending on the particular boarding house in which she happened to be lodged. In some boarding houses the food was very poor, whereas in others there were no grounds for complaint in this connection. The life is a very boring one with very little to employ one's time and the delays in receiving correspondence (for a letter to take three weeks to arrive from England is not unusual) are so long that there is a feeling of being completely cut off from home and friends. For a month or so it can be endured, but when the months drag on into years, without for most people even an occasional visit from friends or relations, it becomes more and more depressing and cannot fail to have a bad effect on the physical and mental condition of the detainee.

THE ISLE OF MAN DETENTION BILL.

Many people outside the barbed wire detention camps were surprised at the indignation that the Bill aroused amongst detainees. They could not understand the fierce opposition which, to the extent of their limited powers, detainees put up against the measure.

The general public probably reasoned along the following lines: these people are going to be sent to a safe spot, where the conditions of internment will be less punitive, so why should they complain? Such an outlook might be expected, for we live in an age where it has been regarded as normal to put personal advantage before community service; and this war, whilst showing up many high lights of personal sacrifice and heroism, has also exposed dark places where self-seeking has run rampant.

The detainees did not want removal to a safe place. The British people among them resented deportation from their native land and wanted a fair hearing before their own people, an opportunity to prove their innocence of any treachery or traitorous intent, rather than to be tucked safely away out of sight, out of touch with their families and business affairs. Already, large numbers of them had been working from Huyton camp, Liverpool, constructing air raid shelters and carrying out demolition work after raids, when no other labour was available. They wanted to be of further assistance and local Government officials in Liverpool certainly regarded their removal with much misgiving.

Turn now to the Government and to consideration of their motives. They had not previously displayed an anxiety to improve conditions of detention, although that now proved a useful argument, and useful too, perhaps, in establishing in the public mind that the men concerned were "traitors" enjoying ease and comfort in safe and beautiful surroundings.

Mr. Herbert Morrison, introducing the Bill on the 25th March, 1941, said the transfer would make control and supervision easier; and that modified and special arrangements would be made as to visits. Over a year later, there is still no sign of these "modified and special arrangements."

Mr. R. R. Stokes, speaking on the same day, pointed out that the move would effectively cut off the detainees from their legal advisers, and that, indeed, has been the case, since no Isle of Man solicitor is known who is in a position to act for the detainees in regard to 18B regulations, and the cost of having a solicitor travel over from the mainland, meaning at least two days away from his office, would be prohibitive. It is virtually impossible, having regard to the delays in correspondence (letters taking several days each way) to satisfactorily handle such matters through the post. That is surely adequate reply to those who claim that no legal rights have been lost through this deportation.

What Mr. Morrison did not admit either is that a further barrier has now been erected between the detainees and the Home Office—the Isle of Man Government—whose word seems to have become final in details of food, clothing and other supplies, supplying of canteen and otherwise. Members of Parliament have learned of these things only through letters from individual internees. The Home Secretary inferred that it was impossible and well-nigh unthinkable that the Manx Government should at any time dispute the direction of H.M. Government at Westminster; yet since that time in at least one matter (Conscription of Women) the House of Keys has flatly repudiated and challenged the dictates of the House of Commons. This can happen at any time that Manx authorities feel strongly enough to exercise their rights. It may happen at any time.

The main point, for the moment, is that this body of men, this bogey so long paraded before the public, is now safely out of the way, and can at any moment be cut off entirely from contact with relatives and legal advisers. Moreover, a more sinister thing has happened, in the creation of a precedent. In the House of Commons in July, 1940, demands came from a number of Members that deportation to one of the Colonies, or to Canada, should be ordered. In spite of Government assurances, there is no certainty that at some future time there may not be decided upon and forced through Parliament a Bill to authorise deportation to some more distant part of the world.

Home Office assurances are not a sufficient safeguard. The Home Secretary has most solemnly assured the House that no British subject has been deported to the Isle of Man prior to the introduction of the Isle of Man Detention Bill. This is totally untrue. There is still a man at Peel camp who was sent to the island long before the Isle of Man Detention Bill was passed. Not only this, but there is the case of a British subject who was sent to Canada among alien internees. It is true that these were isolated cases, but even as such they show that scant attention has been paid to civil rights in such matters, and they are fair indication of the measure of confidence to which Government assurances are entitled.

Thus it will be seen that the Isle of Man Detention Bill was a bad measure in that it seriously affected detainees' interests; that it enabled an intermediary body, the Manx Government, to exercise influence in detainees' affairs, and that it positively established a highly dangerous precedent and made it possible to outcast blameless citizens.

The Bill passed its third reading on the 3rd April, 1941, and removal from Huyton to Peel, Isle of Man, began on the 12th May.

MILITARY ADMINISTRATION.

Whenever the control of detainees' affairs has been left in the hands of military representatives the result has been confusion and muddle with much consequent discomfort and hardship falling to 18B prisoners. Outside of normal army routine the responsible officers have, almost without exception, displayed shameful incompetence, complete lack of understanding of their own and detainees' position, and an utter unrepentant slackness towards duties which were clearly theirs and the adequate performance of which was vitally necessary to general welfare. It was an injustice to those detained that they should have been passed over to the mercies of such men, and it was grossly unfair to the officers themselves that they should have been given tasks for which they were obviously unfitted. As if they had been haphazardly recruited from various walks of civilian life, without any reference to aptitude or suitability to the job in hand, they bungled their way along from one mistake to another, most of them themselves resentful because they had joined the service as would-be fighting men only to find themselves appointed gaolers to a collection of their fellow countrymen. This same resentment was all too evident in their permanent attitude of indifference to the tasks now alloted to them.

To detail each irritation, each pettifogging stupidity, or even each major example of maladministration would be outside the scope of this present document, but in order to demonstrate the impossibility of detainees correcting the conduct of detention camps and counterbalancing military ineptitude it is necessary to explain how administration is organised, and to show instances of the manner in which the complained of slackness and inefficiency have been insuperable barriers to the improvement of the detainees' conditions.

Theoretically all detention camps were given a measure of self-government in that an internal detainee administration, comprised of a Camp Leader and staff, were made nominally responsible for the smooth running of the camps. Excellent as this idea would have been with enlightened application, it has fallen down badly because in practice the authority of the Camp Leader and his staff ends abruptly at the barbed wire, and all the efforts on the part of the detainees' representatives met with rebuffs and obstruction from the military on whom they were dependent and to whom they were, perforce, subservient. Minor reforms, affecting such matters as camp cleanliness and meal service, could be, and were, introduced by internal volunteer administration, but events proved that these offices were chiefly intended to shift much of the "donkey work" from the shoulders of the military, to bottleneck and narrow down a spate of complaints, all representations being ordered to pass through the camp office, and to "take the can back" and generally shoulder the responsibility for the shortcomings of the military administration.

A Camp Leader's lot under military jurisdiction was particularly unhappy; if he did not speak up for the legitimate disgruntled detainees, he was subject to the kicks of his comrades in misfortune, and if he did speak up in strong enough terms to capture the unwilling attention of the military officers he was likely to be sent back to a prison as an agitator and unruly influence in the camp.

Good fellows as some Camp Leaders undoubtedly have been, the results they produced could never be more than a reflection of the Camp Commandant's measure of co-operation. Where co-operation was non-existent, as in most detention camps, the Camp Leader's record is an unfair commentary on his organising and administrative ability, and at no time was it in any way true to say that the conditions endured by detainees were due to their own lethargy or lack of zeal.

When the first 18B camp opened at Ascot, the Commandant, Major Veitch, addressed assembled detainees, the keynote of his harangue being the necessity for co-operation between detainee and military. His speech was warmly applauded by the detainees, who believed that it was made in good faith. It seemed to portend a much more reasonable attitude than had been encountered in prison establishments. Major Veitch then asked the assembly to appoint a Camp Leader and accepted the strongly supported nomination of Mr. T. P. Moran. He further indicated his desire that Moran should be assisted by detainee Lieut. Hamer. These appointments being generally approved, the era of "co-operation" began. A few weeks later, after Moran and Hamer had threatened drastic action in regard to certain major grievances, both men were hurriedly transferred to Brixton Gaol.

Since Command Paper 6162 refers expressly to conditions of detention in prisons, it has never been clear if its terms were intended to apply to detention camps, but it is fair to assume that the spirit, if not the letter, of 6162 was for application wherever detainees happened to be lodged. Yet at Ascot the military authorities had no official knowledge of the Command Paper, and they would inaugurate no improvement until action had been separately sanctioned by the Home Office. Contact and co-operation between the military and the Home Office seemed so inadequate as to be almost non-existent. There were departments that played Box and Cox with one another on every subject. To every request or complaint submitted by the Camp Leader the same formula was returned. The procedure was as follows:

(2) The Camp Commandant agreed that the complaint was justified and that the alteration or innovation was desirable, but pointed out that he had no authority to attend to the matter and must approach the Home Office.

(3) The Home Office, by letter, acknowledged the reasonableness of the complaint, but explained that they can do nothing without approaching the War Office, which controlled the camp and supplied the guard.

And so it would go on, with no department willing to accept any responsibility, and all of them "passing the buck" from one to the other, while the complaint still received no attention, and deplorable conditions still prevailed.

The only times the military showed any punctilious regard for rules was in the application of their own regulations, which usually made for the acute discomfort of detainees. Supreme example of this was in the conduct of Roll Calls.

Ignoring the sane expedient of counting men in their appointed rooms, and so having an immediate check on the identity of any absentee, it was the military practice to herd out the entire camp personnel on to an open compound at 7 a.m. Here, often in a muddy morass, detainees stood in line while counted and re-counted separately by a sergeant and an officer, who could rarely find agreement in their figures. This musical comedy routine was accompanied by an elaborate ceremonial involving a march on and off of guards with fixed bayonets, much grave saluting between officers and other ranks, and a mock solemnity that made the whole procedure a travesty of military efficiency. Throughout this fantastic burlesque, often stretched out to as long as an hour's duration (at Huyton it sometimes lasted three hours), detainees were seriously expected to maintain a demeanour of respect!

Roll Call ended when the junior officer had reported "All correct" to his senior, and when the guard had been marched away, but then, like as not, some mistake would be discovered on the military side of the wire and the farce would be repeated over again.

Roll calls were at first held three times daily; later they were cut to twice per day. At Peel they are still taken twice each day, but under police control, with such efficiency and despatch that they give the minimum possible irritation.

It is important to note that these confusions on Roll Calls were quite unnecessary and were usually the result of military failure to keep proper records. There have been several occasions when muddle was solely due to the fact that men were supposed missing when they had been previously released or transferred.

There were many features of camp life in which military co-operation was an absolute essential. This is particularly apparent in the conduct of such matters as "special" letter facilities, legal affairs, handling of detainees' monies, and the receiving and sending of petitions and other data relative to detainees' cases.

At all camps other than Ascot it has been the practice for officers to make themselves available within the camp, at certain fixed hours, for consultation on these matters. At Ascot a much more complicated system was employed. Anyone wishing to approach the military on any subject had to hand in a chit, outlining the nature of his business, at the camp office before 9 a.m. After the military had been notified of all such requests, a list would be returned to the camp setting out which officers would see which detainees, and at what time. The detainees must report to the gate at that time and wait in the open, irrespective of weather conditions, until it was indicated that the officer was ready to see them. The waiting period varied from half an hour to as much as five hours! There were even occasions when men anxious to conduct affairs vital to the well-being of their dependants outside were put off with the plea that such and such an officer was on leave. When the interviews were finally conceded, they were usually handled in a way to which the gravest exception must be taken.

Rather than recognising it as their duty to attend to these matters, the military always viewed requests as if they had been asked to perform some personal favour. They responded grudgingly and usually made each interview the occasion for prying into the personal affairs of the detainees who came before them. It is not suggested that all officers comported themselves the same way, but certainly most of them followed the unpleasant example set by one Capt. Petrie, a pompous windbag who exerted preponderant influence in detainees' affairs at Ascot and Huyton, and during early days at Peel.

But for the voluntary detainee organisation within the camp, these early days at Ascot must have been a nightmare of turmoil. The military apparently considered their full responsibility discharged when they had dumped the daily raw ration materials inside the camp gates. All cooking and other camp routine fell to detainee labour, not only unassisted but usually positively obstructed by military organisation of the camp. A typical example of the difficulties created was the fact that the Camp Leader was expected to keep seven hundred men informed of military orders, which were varied or added to from day to day. Applications for a typewriter for office use were unavailing and but for the emergence of a Camp Secretary, who volunteered use of his own portable machine, the position would have been impossible.

With internal organisation somewhat stabilised, the Camp Leader and his assistants made representations to the military upon the following main points:

(1) The subject of rations. These had been below the amounts specified on an official statement of rations.

(2) The subject of delivery and despatch of letters, at that time only effected after inordinate delays.

(3) An effort to speed up Advisory Committee hearings. At the then rate of conducting these hearings it was reasonably calculated that it would take over two years before all cases could be heard.

(4) Request for issue of essential clothing to destitute detainees.

(5) Request for issue of tools and cleaning materials.

(6) Request for arrangements for some form of remunerated labour for destitute detainees.

(7) Request for a canteen or other facility for obtaining cigarettes and supplementary rations.

(8) Subject of visits by friends and relatives.

(9) Enquiries regarding whereabouts of impounded property and articles missing from parcels. (Pilfering makes a long-standing complaint against military representatives responsible for handling parcels).

(10) Application for essential structural repairs and alterations to camp buildings (this covered subject of leaking roofs, ventilation, etc.).

It was after making strong representations on these points that Moran and Hamer were transferred to Brixton Prison as potential trouble-makers.

One practice for evading military responsibility at Ascot Camp was the playing of "general post" with the army officials. It worked this way.

An officer would be appointed Welfare Officer. He would listen carefully to representations on the subject of camp welfare and give solemn assurances that some action would follow. After a week without any result, he would be again approached, only to inform his questioners that he had handed over the position of Welfare Officer to another officer, who must henceforth be approached on all these matters. For days one could chase around from one officer to another, only to find, when thoroughly tired of the whole business, that the original Welfare Officer had reverted to the job and was now all set to begin the pernicious game all over again.

Conditions obtaining at the various camps are briefly described elsewhere in this document, reference to the appropriate section will plainly disclose that it was inept administration alone that was to blame for much of the hardship endured. It is noteworthy that the strongest complaint against military administration is earned by those conducting matters at Ascot and Huyton, where the same set of officers were in control. Major Veitch, Capt. Shaul, Capt. Petrie, Capt. Collins and their staffs were the people whose control brought strongest resentment and it was the two last mentioned officers, Petrie and Collins, who, by their insufferable boorishness and arrant stupidity, did most to create a temper for the revolt at Peel, Isle of Man. If Major Veitch could claim that nothing he did personally calls for complaint, nevertheless he cannot evade all responsibility for what happened under his command.

After a joint petition from detainees to the Captain, Petrie and Collins were transferred, their places being taken by lesser irritants, Intelligence Officers Captain Harris and Lieutenant Brown. This was followed by a short period during which it seemed that the Peel Commandant, Major Francis, was intent on redressing grievances. Unfortunately, Major Francis was suddenly and inexplicably removed to make way for a Major Dunn. Attempts to improve conditions ceased, military frigidity increased, correspondence delays re-occurred and the parcel post arrangements became deplorable. The canteen service remained absolutely inadequate, and generally it was apparent that grievances were no longer receiving consideration and were not being referred to the respective higher authorities.

Two more references should be made before leaving this subject.

First, regarding administration of health services, it is an indisputable fact that facilities provided would have been hopelessly inadequate but for the indefatigable voluntary efforts of detained medical men. The efficient handling of emergency cases has always been due to the unselfish work of such volunteers, who have yet had to contend with mulish obstruction from the military authorities. The case in point occurred at Peel, when a detainee died during the night. Dr. Bode, a detainee, had to administer his attentions by the light of a hurricane lamp because the military refused to turn on the main light switch.

Secondly, in regard to arrangements for religious practices, there is again a major complaint. Several Church of England ministers were among the detainees, some of them padres of the last war, and they have always contrived to give some form of Divine Service from the earliest days in detention camps. It was, however, only with difficulty that they succeeded in obtaining the necessary equipment for serving Communion and observing other holy rites. After pressing representations were made at Ascot, and after a certain amount of delay, arrangements were made for regular visits by a Catholic priest, such an arrangement becoming an established feature at all later camps until, at Peel, detainees were allowed to walk to the church in the town. Nevertheless, one vastly important religious practice was at first flatly forbidden—the visiting priests were not allowed to take confession. The secrecy of the confessional, inviolate throughout the centuries, was called into question by these bungling military Bumbles. Worse than that, it was imputed, intentionally or otherwise, that the confessional and the Catholic priests involved more potential instruments of treachery. Twelve months after this important objection had been silenced at Ascot, it was again advanced at Peel, and for five weeks confessions were disallowed.

And still one might go on, amplifying a hundredfold the complaints against the military, still without any exaggeration or distortion. In well-nigh two years of detention, there had occurred a multiplicity of incidents, which prevents any brief summary from covering a tithe of the illustrative detail. But, lest enough has not been written to convince the reader of military shortcomings in respect to detention camp administration, one important aspect is more fully described in the following section.

RIOT.

The events of Saturday, the 20th September, 1941, were sufficiently publicised at the time for everyone to have some knowledge of the riot at Peel. The reliability of such knowledge depends upon whether it was acquired from the press, from the Home Secretary's statement, or from personal accounts from detainees.

First press accounts were luridly drawn by Manx reporters, who found this an occasion for sensational journalism outside their usual experience, and a further opportunity to vent their spleen against 18B detainees. It was these reports which first made headlines in the National press. Later, National newspapermen came to Peel to follow up the sensation story and, apparently, despite the fact that true circumstances belied this view of the happenings, felt impelled to continue in the same strain.

Here is the substance of the newspaper version, variously printed under such headlines as—"Mob Law Wins"—"700 Fascists Riot"—"Fascists Cause Night of Terror," and "Rioting Fascists Injure Guards."

"700 Fascists interned at Peel, Isle of Man, rioted on Saturday night and continued the disturbance at intervals throughout Sunday" . . . "They yelled for return to the camp of three runaways who had been recaptured and placed in cells" . . . "They stoned military guards knowing that they had no power to retaliate" . . . "Wild disorder for many hours" . . . "shouting and catcalls" . . . "smashed every window in hotel" . . . "demanded 'send the prisoners back'" . . . "Riot at peak for several hours" . . . "Their demand was refused—reply was violence" . . . "Number of soldiers injured" . . . "Captain struck by bottle" . . . "Shots fired in the air" . . . "fusillade of missles" . . . "hour's bombardment" . . . "Resident described night of terror."

This was the tenor of all newspaper reports of the incidents. They not only conveyed a greatly exaggerated picture of the events but gave the public an entirely false understanding of the cause of the trouble.

The riot was not a result of any immediately prior occurrences, but was a culmination of deep-seated resentment grown out of a long period of maltreatment and denial of elementary justice. What transpired after the arrest of three escaped prisoners was the spark to light a ready tinder which was bound to flare up at some time. Men had harboured their brooding grievances in the face of extreme provocation. Capt. Ryan's conduct on that Saturday afternoon brought them to breaking point.

The three runaways were brought back after the combined efforts of naval, air force, army and police detachments had been applied in the search for them. Their escapade had that about it, that element of adventurousness, which always appeals to British men. It is safe to say that the men who challenged such odds, whatever the reason for their captivity, had a certain grudging sympathy from many outside the wire of detention camps, as well as the approval of the majority who had shared their detention. When the men in the camp saw the returned prisoners, they greeted them with cheers of encouragement. No cry was set up and no effort was made to bring the men back into the camp itself.

Capt. Ryan, overjoyed at the recapture and appearing to be flushed with delight, shouted to the cheering detainees "They couldn't get away from us," a bombastic boast utterly discountenanced by the fact that the men had escaped from his charge and the fact that his part in their re-arrest had been to wait by a telephone in the adjacent hotel. His remarks were resented, but were not the cause of any demonstration. This came later.

After individual detainees had been called out by the military in connection with the matter of the escape, they returned to the camp with information that the three recaptured men, by now lodged in camp cells, had been without food for forty-eight hours. Representations were at once made to the military in reasonable and proper fashion that a meal be supplied to them. Capt. Ryan's reply was—"They must wait—they've starved for two days and it won't hurt them to starve for a third—they've given me plenty of trouble, now I'm going to give it to them." This was the military attitude responsible for the demonstrations which followed.

Failing further straightforward applications, in several quarters, that the men be fed, during which a meal was turned back from the gate when brought from the house the men had formerly occupied, temper in the camp became strongly roused. Men gathered at the wire opposite the military offices and shouted repeatedly their demand for humane treatment of the prisoners in the cells. The shouting was ignored and some angrier detainees decided that the time had come when more strenuous means must be used to gain attention to their legitimate complaints. Stones were thrown at the hotel in which military offices were situated and several windows were smashed.

Increased military guards were rushed to the scene, but still no responsible officer would parley with the camp's elected leaders. At no time were missiles thrown at the guards; detainees' greater satisfaction being derived from pelting the hotel itself, property of Mr. A. E. Ostick, instigator of many of the vilest press attacks on them. After little over an hour, the superintendent of camps on the island had arrived and he interviewed detainees' representatives. The prevarication of Capt. Ryan delayed reasonable settlement of the matter until 1 a.m., but all signs of disturbance had ceased considerably before that time—as soon as the military had indicated reasonable willingness to consider the detainees' viewpoint.

At no time were more than two hundred and fifty men concerned in the demonstration, and it is deeply regretted that two members of the soldiery sustained very slight injuries from missiles rebounding from the hotel walls.

This was the full extent of the disorder at Camp M, and at no time, either on the next day or subsequent days, was there any further outbreak.

Lest it be supposed that the foregoing is biassed in favour of the detainees, here is an extract from the account of the affair given by the Home Secretary to the House of Commons on October 2nd, 1941.

"The recapture of these men and the manner in which they were dealt with on their return to the camp was the immediate occasion of the disturbance. It was not possible to conduct them to the detention cells without exposing them to the view of other persons detained in the camp, and a number of these persons staged a demonstration of welcome. The officer in charge of the camp refused an application of some of the inmates that a meal should be sent to them from the camp. These men had been given a meal on the patrol boat, but this was not known to the men in the camp, and a story was spread that the men were being starved. These circumstances appear to have caused a feeling of resentment and after dark this found expression in a considerable amount of shouting and stone-throwing at buildings in the vicinity of the camp. The extent of the disorder has been exaggerated in many of the published accounts. No assault was directed against any individuals, and although damage was caused to windows only two persons were slightly injured. The Commandant of the internment camps on the island was summoned and, on his arrival, he sent for the camp leader, warned him of the seriousness of what had occurred, and made it plain that the disorders must cease immediately and complete silence be maintained for at least an hour before he would listen to any representations which the men might wish to make through their leaders. Complete quiet was at once restored and after a lapse of an hour and a quarter he met the group leaders, who told him that the demonstration was due to resentment aroused by the treatment accorded to the recaptured men. The Commandant explained that the men in question were, in fact, being given a meal, and sent the group leaders back to the camp with another warning against further disorder. The rest of the night passed without incident."—(Hansard, Vol. 374, No. 103, Col. 714/715).

Here was a straightforward explanation, which, although deprecating the methods used, did show that the demonstrators believed themselves possessed of profound reasons for making some form of protest. It is surely significant that the Commandant of the Isle of Man internment camps ultimately promised that food would be sent to the prisoners, despite previous assurances that they had been fed on the patrol boat.

The press, having convinced themselves and the public that their distorted and exaggerated account of events was a true one, now set up a clamour for severe punishments against the detainees. Cartoons and rhymes were used to suggest that occupants of Camp M led a life of pampered luxury and demand for a "firm hand" and strong repressive measures grew each day.

Bowing before the storm, Mr. Morrison announced that he would impose a month's suspension of privileges against all members of the camp. He particularly mentioned that all cinema visits would be stopped. (This last concession to press agitation was really a pitiful bluff, for Mr. Morrison must have been fully aware that up to that time the privilege of visiting cinemas had never been extended to 18B detainees). A further punishment was to be the removal of "a number of persons likely to cause trouble" to Walton Gaol.

The removal was actually in progress whilst Mr. Morrison was speaking. During the morning of October 2nd, eighteen detainees were suddenly told that they were to be ready to leave the camp, with their baggage at 1 p.m. Fourteen of these men were members of the British Union section; some definitely took no part in the demonstration. How they had been selected was, and still remains, a mystery. (One man removed was the leader of the British Union section, who had personally done more than anyone else to bring the Saturday night disturbance to a close). There was a strong suspicion inside the camp that voluntary informers had been co-operating with the Military Intelligence officers and so paying off old scores or satisfying private vendettas. There was no appeal against the removal order; all the selected eighteen men had to go.

They were taken by closed pantechnicon, with lorry loads of armed soldiers before and behind, and convoyed by motor-cycle despatch riders to Douglas Gaol. Their final destination was kept secret at this time.

At Douglas, an air of secrecy was maintained, the men being only identified by numbers.

At 6 a.m. next morning they were aroused, breakfasted, and in due course marched, under heavy escort, to the boat. Spectators lined the quayside and included many press men and photographers, some of whom shared the crossing.

At Walton Prison, reception proceeded as usual. An officious reception warder ordered one man, an ex-officer of the last war, to remove his medal ribbons as constituting a badge. When met with a firm refusal, he did not press the point.

The eighteen men were allotted a Wing of the prison, which had been badly damaged in a recent air raid. Windows at both ends and the roof still awaited repair, so that the whole place was intensely cold and damp. Rain poured into some of the basement cells where prisoners were housed. The heating system was out of operation. Even in the cells, with windows closed, overcoats had to be worn. Meals had to be brought through the prison yard from other wings and were generally cold when received.

In this way were the supposed "trouble-makers" punished; and so Peel was saved from further "nights of terror."

But this is not the end. Within four months, out of the eighteen desperadoes assumed responsible for the disturbance, three were back in Peel camp, three had been released on an unsuspecting world, seven had been transferred to Brixton Prison, either at their own request or to appear again before an Advisory Committee, and the remaining five were awaiting, and daily expecting removal either to Peel or to Brixton.

Thus it is shown that the whole business of "removing the trouble-makers" was nothing but a shameful bluff, carried through to deceive Parliament and satisfy misinformed public opinion.

THE POLICE IN CONTROL.

It was as a direct result of the disorders described in the previous chapter that Metropolitan police, under Superintendent Ogden of the Vice Squad, were drafted to Peel and put in charge of 18B camp.

Newspapers reported this development with comments to the effect that the Superintendent was of the type to stand no nonsense from the "tough boys" in the camp. The whole detachment of police came with militant intent to quell the seething agitation they believed to exist. They were considerably surprised to find no occasion for drawing batons and facing an unruly mob.

With none of the bombastic braggadocio of former commandants, the Superintendent soon established himself as a man who, while prepared to brook no infringements of discipline, was yet prepared to give full and sympathetic consideration to detainees' legitimate complaints. He, sooner than anyone else, has striven to implement the terms of Command Paper 6162 and has succeeded in bringing about great improvements in conditions of detention.

Perhaps his first improvement was unintentional. By requisitioning the Creg Malin Hotel adjacent to the camp, as police headquarters, he effected the removal of its mischief-making proprietor. For this, detainees owe him relief and gratitude. Through the offices of his various police officials, camp amenities have been vastly improved. Social club centres have been encouraged and a camp reading room has been made available.

The room in which detainees receive visitors has been rendered less black and cheerless. (Although the visits themselves, still under the supervision of Military Intelligence representatives, are by no means as favourably arranged as those in better days at York Camp). Parcel delivery has been speeded up. Newspapers are delivered on the day of publication instead of, as hitherto, the day after. Strenuous attempts are being made to eliminate unnecessary delay in delivery of letters.

Most gratifying is the fact that inflamatory items have disappeared from the local press and newspaper sensation-seekers have been politely discouraged.

Where the military found it impossible to arrange for 18B detainees to share the privilege enjoyed by alien internees for visits to the cinema, the police, surmounting any obstacles there may have been, have made a cinema visit a regular weekly feature.

Administration of detainees' funds, always previously a cause for serious complaint, was immediately improved. For the first time, regular statements of accounts were issued, and a committee was formed by detainees to act, with the guidance of the Commandant, in the disposition of all communal camp funds.

Bills charged against the camp unfairly are questioned by the Police Commandmant and where they are found to be disproportionate due rectification is secured. In a recent instance where bills were presented for damage and dilapidation to property in the camp, the Commandant upheld the Finance Committee's opinion that the dilapidations were covered by a plea of fair wear and tear, and the bill was subsequently withdrawn.

In general demeanour, the police officers have appeared more friendly, because less impersonal, in their relationship with detainees. Because they are men of stature and mature understanding, this tendency towards familiarity has increased, rather than diminished, the respect in which they are held. From this attitude the detainee is able to derive a new morale. To be recognised again as a human being, instead of a numbered animal is of unlimited service to him.

There are many vexatious Home Office rules still felt to be onerous. There is still the injustice of the whole thing known as 18B Regulations rankling in the minds of detainees. But, for the first time in nearly two years, they are not being treated like cattle. The police have maintained a record of honesty and scrupulously fair service in the performance of their duties.

An intelligent interpretation of camp regulations has led detainees to co-operate readily in the smooth operation of camp affairs. In return for their understanding attitude, the police have found that they have reasonable people to deal with. There have been none but very minor infractions of discipline since the military abdicated camp control. These having been dealt with justly, there has occurred no bitterness between gaolers and gaoled.

If men are bullied, maltreated and swindled over a long period, and denied redress or any consideration of their complaints, then, if they are real men at all, there must come a time when they are bound to rebel and cause just such commotions as occurred at Peel in September, 1941. It may be argued that this commotion was not a proper way to express complaints, but it was only a culmination of a discontent existing after many reasoned petitions had failed. It brought the police into control; it brought order out of chaos.

Detainees are fair-minded individuals and do not hesitate to give credit where it is due. But they are not so impressed by what Superintendent Ogden achieved that they credit him with supernatural powers. What he did could have been done by any former custodian in his place and with his initiative. Thus an important question arises. Why was no improvement effected before? Why, if these reforms were possible; if the implementing of Command Paper 6162 was possible under the police, was no reform attempted before?

If the conditions now obtaining at Peel are in the spirit of the Command Paper, and it is plain that they are nearer the letter of that document than any previous conditions have been, then, by their very difference, they constitute a fierce indictment of the treatment experienced in the past.

MATTERS FINANCIAL.

In our earliest days, we learned what we thought was part of our heritage—the English tradition: "Don't kick a man when he is down." Internees' experience, throughout has been such that they could not be blamed if they concluded this tradition has been lost.

It was so in regard to financial administration at internment camps.

True, many were also robbed in prisons, of small items of personal property, sometimes of money; specified articles ordered through warders were all too often substituted by cheaper goods, or accounts over-debited; or, on transfer from one prison to another, or to a camp, balances would simply disappear, repeated requests for transfer being ignored or side-stepped. Better was expected, however, of military control. But read on and form your own conclusions.

The position of most 18B prisoners—the monied portion was so small as to be ignored—was that their internment had cost them everything they had, job, pension rights, insurance policies, home, everything; and could now promise them, after release, utter destitution. It was men in that condition who tried to find work of some kind inside the camp, and this was available for only a minority and was miserably paid: 1/8 a week at Huyton, only a trifle more at Ascot, 3/6 at Peel, up to 4/- (in a few cases) at York; sometimes supplemented from the detainees' own Welfare Funds, sometimes paid entirely from them. Outside work yielded slightly better remuneration, but was sometimes deliberately "milked" by the authorities on one pretext or another. On top of that, however, it must be recorded that detainees' own accumulated funds have completely disappeared, at Ascot, at York and Huyton.

Detainees were not allowed to have legal tender money in their possession. For inside payments and purchases, Canteen Cards were issued at Ascot and Huyton, and token money at other camps, all against balances in individual accounts.

The accounts were handled by the military, who were also charged with holding special accounts, termed "Welfare Funds," created by voluntary subscriptions by internees or their friends, and approved allocations from canteen profits. The Welfare Funds were intended for the improvement of camp amenities, making nominal payments to men undertaking work of general social benefit within the camps, and assisting less fortunately placed detainees.

At the first camp, Ascot, the Commandant, Major Veitch, definitely promised that 50% of canteen profits should go to the Welfare Fund, and the remainder to the "Barrack Damage" account. Canteen prices were well in excess of normal retail prices, even for fixed price goods, so that substantial allocations were therefore expected. Some optimists even expected that, since Barrack damages were not likely to be enormous, they might not even account for the whole of the 50% balance, and additional amounts would accordingly accrue for the Welfare accounts; certain cynics, however, suggested that such a position would not be allowed to arise—and they were more than justified. Generally, however, the scheme was accepted as sound.

Because certain detainees assisted in the keeping of the accounts, we can give some details of the system adopted.

For each detainee a separate account card was kept and there was a detainees' bank account, into which was paid all incoming monies, represented by remittances to detainees, earnings of outside working parties, etc. Money addressed or due to individuals was posted to the appropriate accounts cards.

So far, so good. But no accounts card existed to show the balance to the credit of the general Welfare Funds; in the case, therefore, of donations of a general character for welfare purposes, or the expected periodical transfers from canteen profits, no appropriate entries appeared in any account book or other records.

Cheques would be drawn from time to time to cover amounts paid out to detainees through account cards or tokens, and presumably would go to the credit of Canteen Account.

Now it would have been perfectly simple, at any time, or each time a camp was vacated, to draw up a balance sheet on the following lines:

Receipts.	Outgoings.
Remittances to individuals.	Credited to Account Cards.
Outside workers' earnings .	Payments to inside workers.
Donations to Welfare Fund.	Credited to Barrack Damage account.
Transfer from Canteen Account.	Expenditure on camp amenities.
	Balance

when it would become clear what balance remained for welfare purposes.

On that basis, there would have been no complaint. It remains as a plain fact, however, that when representations were made, the military stated emphatically that detainees had no right to see or criticise their own Welfare account, and that no check was available on canteen profits. To this day, there is no information to be had of what money is due to detainees from any camp.

Ascot. Artisans were continually working on the premises, building new punishment cells, enlarging the cookhouse, laying new drains and erecting new barbed wire fencing. The work was by no means necessitated by Barrack damage, but it is by no means clear that detainees were not called upon to pay for it. Be that as it may, it still remains a sheer impertinence, and quite unjustifiable, that prisoners should be made to pay for the upkeep of their own prison, through any sort of Barrack Fund. Presumably, even had the money been used to purchase weapons in guarding the camps, there would still be no right to question the proceeding.

Certain detainees keep well-supported private accounts, in their own interests, and it was adduced from these that at Ascot camp the canteen profits and other income totalled £910 16s. 3d., and the total expenditure, to camp workers and for camp amenities, amounted to £610 0s. 6d. The assumed balance of £309 15s. 9d. was never accounted for, and it is asked—what happened to it?

Yet another matter for enquiry is what happened to the wireless set and furniture, cost £70, purchased by detainee funds? These have not been seen since detainees were transferred from Ascot camp.

It is appropriate to mention here the military practice at Ascot of using detainee labour for military official or semi-official purposes, and leaving such labour to be paid for by detainee funds. Squads of men were used for camp maintenance work; building drains and making paths, while others were employed building a new barbed wire compound for later arrivals at this place. Other men worked in the gardens of "Woodstock," a house used as Officers' Mess. It is strongly alleged that the military authorities made no payment of any kind for the work thus performed, and that the payments which they instructed should be made were only possible by the improper usage of detainees' monies entrusted to their care.

York. At York camp, the position is more clear as a better system of accounts was adopted. It was further simplified because the canteen was managed by private contractors, who paid into a camp fund an agreed percentage of their takings. Here again it was proposed to impose a charge on canteen profits for "barrack room damage."

The accounts at York camp, agreed by the military a few days before its closure as a place for 18B detainees, showed a favourable balance of £192 6s. 8d.

Once again it was asked—what happened to this money?

It has been suggested that a sum of £92 6s. 8d. was sent on to the detainees' next camp at Huyton. If there be any truth in this story, there is still the question—what happened to it when it reached Huyton?—and the further question—why only £92 6s. 8d.? It is not quite certain that even this inappropriate amount has yet reached the detainees to whom it rightly belongs.*

Huyton. Detainees from Ascot and York were united at Huyton in March, 1940. It required some hundred workers to run this singularly ill-equipped and ungainly establishment, and after six weeks a grant of £50 was made from canteen profits to enable some payment to be made to them. (It is important to bear in mind that a very large number of detainees had been rendered absolutely destitute by detention, and these insignificant payments from camp funds were to many a sole source of income).

After heavy air raids in the district parties were taken from the camp to engage in demolition work. It is understood that the Council concerned paid full Trades Union rates for the men thus employed, without which condition many men refused to work lest they be displacing any available labour outside. First charge against wages of detainees taking these jobs was an impudent percentage of deduction, stated to be on account of a "billeting allowance." Significantly enough, the amount of this deduction, made against the provision of mean rations and ill-equipped dwellings in Huyton camp, was larger than the billeting grant given to provincial housewives asked to accommodate civil service evacuees! The remaining aggregate earnings of the demolition workers, being some £30 per week, was fairly apportioned to cover costs of camp workers' wages.

No canteen accounts were published during the entire period of Huyton camp's usage as a place of detention for 18B prisoners, and no acknowledgment was shown of the £92 6s. 8d.

* £92 6s. 8d. was credited to camp funds at Pool in the autumn of 1942. The balance of £100 seems to have disappeared without accounting.

suggested to have been transmitted from York.

From careful calculations, it is deduced that the canteen takings at Huyton were in the neighbourhood of £960. In view of the inflated prices imposed, it is fair to suggest that a gross profit of £240 was made. No detainee ever saw a penny of this money save the £50 already referred to.

Since reaching Peel, Isle of Man, the administration of detainees' finances has been much more satisfactory. The strain on camp funds caused by provision of camp workers' wages is greatly relieved because the Manx Government, as is only just, makes small provision for a certain number of cooks and cleaners. (At a rate of 6d. per day). Again, destitution is not the same problem as it has been at previous camps because of wider scope for outside work on farms and land-drainage schemes. Most favourable aspect of Peel camp is that a proportion of canteen profits is faithfully transmitted to general camp funds, full accounts are available and, under police supervision, detainees have been encouraged to take a keen interest in the position of their accounts.

One item shown in early accounts at Peel still causes great resentment. It is a debit for £56 for the residue of goods alleged to have been packed and sent to Peel from Huyton. They were sent in the care of a military sergeant and the bulk of them never reached the canteen at Peel. It is grossly unjust that detainees should have been charged for defalcations or losses for which they could not have been responsible.

The foregoing is a summary of the details backing detainees' assertions that they have been made the victims of double dealing and sharp practice. Repeated requests have been made in official quarters that some form of inquiry be instituted. When Home Office representatives have visited the various camps they have heartily agreed that these matters were deserving of the closest investigation, yet there is still a strange reluctance to do anything.

Now, we have tried to discuss this matter dispassionately. But all who have followed the press reports, and particularly the Manx press, will know that there were times when Courts Martial were a weekly occurrence in regard to officers and N.C.O.'s attached to internment camps, on account of their unjustified debts, or actual peculation of public or private monies; and until there is some attempt to explain what has happened to the various Welfare Fund balances, it can only be assumed that, with 18B prisoners too, unscrupulous men, clad in His Majesty's uniform, have abused their positions of trust.

Consider the position of the detainees. Through accident of birth, or because they have violated the time-honoured political dictum—never demand reforms ahead of public opinion—British citizens, hundreds of them, were deprived of their living and financially ruined, made destitute.

In internment, as their clothing wore out, they were issued, as though it were a great concession, with the shoddiest kind of clothing and footwear; and as these became damaged or torn, were made to pay, out of what they could earn within the camp or hard-hit relatives could send to them, for necessary repairs, or call upon their better-off companions in misfortune to meet the bills.

The only efficient medical advice has been that given willingly by a fellow internee, a well-known London specialist; the British authorities would pay him nothing at all for what he did; those in the Isle of Man offered him first 3/6 a week.

Dental service, of a sort, was given free. But if a man, even one without funds, required repair of a dental plate, he must be prepared to see the cost debited against him as soon as he has any funds to his credit, however great his other needs may be.

On release, the final hardship comes. The very fact of release implies that after the fullest investigation the Home Office is satisfied that the man can safely be at large; in other words, the whole internment is admitted not to have been justified.

Then, thrust into a world taught, and eager, to suspect and mistrust him, lucky if he has a decent suit to stand up in, the victim is granted by way of recompense and to enable him to start life anew, the noble sum of five shillings.

The Welfare Funds had as their primary object the supplementing of this paltry sum by a pound or two, to lesson the initial hardship and cover those first empty days of liberty while the man was adjusting himself to the outside world and could find himself a job.

It is this compassionate effort which has been stultified when inefficiency and crookedness have conspired to conceal accounts and hold back the rightful funds of 18B detainees. We can think of nothing meaner; of no plainer case where authority should step in and deal with those responsible, and make honourable amends to their victims.

THE USE AND MISUSE OF M.I.5.

Behind the external war, there has raged, continually, an internal one, waged by established political parties against a possible rival. No quarter has been given. Fascist thought, regardless of whether it was or was not in sympathy with any foreign power, was the enemy; so in many indictments against British subjects detained under Regulation 18B we find the charge:

"He was sympathetic with the system of government of a power with which His Majesty's Government is at war."

How this squares up with the fact that many of the countries now allied to His Majesty's Government have themselves political systems paralleled to those of Germany and Italy, is something only a politician could explain; but that provides no valid defence to a detainee before the Advisory Committee.

The mind of Mr. Herbert Morrison on the subject was revealed in a House of Commons speech on the 10th December, 1940, replying to one by Mr. Stokes:

"What is the lesson of Nazi Germany? It is that the republican politicians were too soft—not that they were too hard—in applying to what was a revolutionary situation classical liberal doctrines and so on. I am sure that my hon. friend would have dealt more properly, with full legal advices and procedure, with Herr Hitler if he had been in Germany at that time. . . . If I had been running the German Government at that time, that man would never have got out. He would never have survived. He was an enemy of the State and he ought to have been shot."

This may be a sound comment on the attempted insurrection of Hitler and his subsequent mild political imprisonment. But such reasoning, concerning the punishment of an overt act, cannot be held to justify internment without trial, or the subsequent job victimisation, of persons who hold heretical political opinions. This argument is a complete surrender of the principles of democracy to a punitive opportunism of fear.

It may be said that Fascism denies democracy and aims at establishing a totalitarian state. A Fascist may have no right, therefore, to plead for democratic treatment if he denies democratic principles. Neither have democrats a right to violate democratic principles, which cannot be outraged nor denied with impunity. Democracy is the constitutional protection of mankind. Only when democratic society falls short of full economic democracy and so tends to become plutocratic need it be afraid of its political democracy, and extending the full rights of free discussion and assembly even to Fascists. A happy social democracy need have no fear of Fascist intrigues or conspiracy, which would remain abortive. Inherent in society is the ancient right of free men to uphold even political error. No Government has the right to assail such right. It has been claimed by the friends of the imprisoned 18B prisoners that this right was smashed by the Home Office. But one of the means used has been M.I.5, otherwise known as Military Intelligence.

The widespread nature of unjust political discrimination against detainees, before, during and after detention, has been indicated in some measure elsewhere in this document; the full story cannot be told until after the war. One is apt, of course, when placed in distressing circumstances, to imagine all sorts of hidden conspiracies. But that truism cannot explain away what has happened before one's eyes.

The Secret Police were features of all old-time books about Czarist Russia, until their mantle was assumed by the Ogpu. Nowadays, it is the Gestapo that is dangled before the public gaze, as an example of what we must avoid in this free land; the secret agent, the agent provocateur, and all the rest. Against such institutions this war is being fought . . . But you may not have seen this report in the "Manchester Guardian" of January 15th, 1940:

"The Executive Committee of the Civil Servants Clerical Association is to meet next week to consider further action following the refusal of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Capt. Crookshank) to receive a deputation concerning the activities of M.I.5 agents in the Government departments.

The deputation hoped to have pointed out that civil servants had been dismissed or relegated to subordinate positions on the basis of charges made against their loyalty and reliability, although those charged were not told the origin of the detailed nature of the charges.

Mr. L. C. White, assistant general secretary of the association, told a reporter that it appeared that these M.I.5 agents, who looked after civil servants and others in munition factories and other places, operated in many cases upon the receipt of anonymous letters.

After enquiry, the agents recommended that employees should be dismissed or removed to work where they could not reveal confidential information.

'About one hundred cases have been brought to our notice since the war began,' said Mr. White. 'Most of the people affected are those alleged to have Left Wing views or to have been active in political work. . . . It is unfair because there is reason to believe that some of the information that M.I.5 gets is unreliable. The accused should be informed of the actual charge and given an opportunity to reply.'

Capt. Crookshank has stated that the matters are appropriate for discussion, if at all, by the Whitley Council for the Civil Service."

The procedure will be noted. No open enquiry, but sudden transfer or dismissal, without redress or right of appeal. In a way it is an extension of 18B to the public still at large. Capt. Crookshank's inference will also be noted; that the matter is not really appropriate for discussion at all.

There is in Peel now a man who was attracted to and joined British Union because of its apparent promise to promote economic and industrial efficiency in Britain. He also had a passionate belief in Empire and in the welfare of the working people. At the outbreak of war, his abilities earned him the position of works manager in an aircraft factory in North Wales, where he instituted a number of improvements and came up against vested interests from time to time. If he criticised production methods with vigour, it was surely not to his discredit.

This man had occasion to write to his home town asking for re-payment of a debt. A few weeks later, a director of the firm asked him to carefully sponsor a new employee, and he did so, even became friendly and mentioned to him his past connection with British Union. Suddenly, came detention under 18B, charged with "acts prejudicial," the sole evidence being remarks passed by the new employee. His son, disgusted with what had happened, asked permission to leave the works; he, too, was threatened with 18B. From the time of the victim's detention, agents of M.I.5 shadowed and worried his wife until an appeal had to be made to the Regional Commissioner to call off this persecution and give the poor woman some piece of mind.

Thus a promising production engineer was lost to the war effort because of political discrimination possibly coupled with self-interested malice.

A Welsh farmer and his daughter, belonging to one of the oldest families in Pembrokeshire, began to receive police attention in 1940 because of British Union membership; constantly being visited on one pretext or another; a son was even prosecuted for riding a horse without a light—a charge never brought before or since in the whole country.

The house was raided early in June, when certain Fascist papers were confiscated. A week later police came again, to accuse a son of saying in a certain village that "we would lose the war"; that was untrue, as he had not been off the farm premises at the time mentioned. In August, about a dozen soldiers on motor-cycles entered the yard and one, a corporal, asked for the loan of a spanner; this led to general talk, leading to joking questions as to whether the farmer ever listened to "Lord Haw Haw," and so on. Presently, all went away excepting the corporal, who then passed remarks abusing army life generally, said he was miserable in his billet, and asked if he might come round some time to listen to the wireless.

The same evening the corporal returned, bringing a friend, and whilst left alone turned the wireless on to a German station. They were entertained to supper and stayed on late. Next night, they came again, and were again asked to supper. By this time their behaviour had aroused suspicion, so that when they returned two nights later they were asked if they were detectives, and strenuously denied the fact. Again they had supper and then went away and were not seen again.

In November, the father and daughter were arrested, under the usual brutal circumstances. Three months later, the Advisory Committee heard their case, the chairman telling them that he considered they had been badly treated, and he was advising immediate release. He asked about the soldiers who had visited them; they had made a statement that swastika flags were being made at the farm to welcome Hitler, and that parachute troops that might land on the farm would be hidden. Striking his pencil through the rest of the accusations, with the remark that they were obvious lies, the chairman said he was perfectly satisfied with the explanation given.

The farmer still remains in Peel camp, whilst his farm suffers for lack of labour.

Another man still detained—not in British Union, but long interested in Fascist thought—was employed by a large insurance company. Early in June, 1940, his employers (following the procedure in very many cases) were visited by the police and warned about him, so that he was suddenly transferred from the Head Office to a small evacuation office; at the same time his house was visited in his absence and his wife was asked two questions; had he ever belonged to British Union, or had he any foreign blood; apparently an attempt was being made to build up a case, but the reply in each case was negative, so the police went away.

The next development was at his office, where a newly employed female clerk was allotted to him. Obviously acting under instructions, her job was to find something incriminating; why otherwise should she, a girl of about 22 or 23, have suddenly interposed into a general conversation the question: "Do you think messages could be transmitted by means of music?" Quite innocently, he discussed how this could be done, through the arrangement of musical programmes, or by particular kinds of syncopation. He was arrested on July 1st, and at his Advisory Committee hearing seven months later that conversation was thrown back at him.

Just three examples of M.I.5 at work.

The employment of traps, and agents provocateurs, are as old as diplomacy itself. They are devices of the corrupt and inefficient. One did not think, though, to see them flourish in modern Britain.

How is M.I.5 recruited. No layman really knows. Some say it is largely composed of "young hopefuls" of all ages in the Conservative Party, who wish to make a mark politically or possibly diplomatically. The "Manchester Guardian" report certainly indicates political bias. Agents we have met include a British Union member who was expelled for lack of common honesty, and another man who had earned a considerable competence through particularly nasty activities in regard to divorce cases. But our experience is limited—we move among ordinary decent men and women—and it must be clear that there are agents of more character than those we have mentioned, though obviously character and ability for this kind of work do not necessarily go hand in hand.

In the various internment camps, however, there have been good opportunities for seeing Military Intelligence at close quarters. There, the officers have been on a higher social plane, unsuccessful barristers, and occasionally a genuine scholar (otherwise quite inefficient) in a particular language. All have the spy complex very marked, to a degree which can be termed pathological, imagining the wildest possibilities, and living in a world of gun-running and gangsterdom.

These officers have not hesitated to use the services of people whose character has broken down under the worry of internment, and have turned "nark." Here are extracts from letters received in the camps from two such "broken reeds":

> "Since moving in a complete atmosphere of Fascism, as in all the prisons and camps in which I have been detained, I have realised, mostly from overhearing conversations, that when supporting the Fascism (sic) regime as I did before detention, I must have been living in a fool's paradise, and I now fully realise my mistake.
> "I have definitely decided to abandon all participation in the B.U. and break with all my former friends and associates, as I feel I have been duped, or used as a tool for their ulterior motives."

Such is the stuff of which "agents" are made; may they get their just reward. To crawl and squeal on your comrades is considered the worst offence of all, even among criminals. To infer, by filthy innuendo, that innocent men have done something their one-time comrade is ashamed of is about the rottenest action one can think about.

What have these "narks," "snoops" and Intelligence Officers achieved in two years of the most careful scrutiny of the intimate details of detainees' lives? Precisely nothing; and that because there is nothing there for them to find. All the breaking open of cigarettes, cutting of cakes, opening of tins, steaming off of postage stamps and pouring over letters and the hundred and one other things laid down in detective fiction have not yielded one small plum to enable authority to say "I told you so." Yet, like the child in the nursery story, still they plod on looking for the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, when sensible, normal people would have given it up long ago.

In many well-authenticated cases, release has been promised or hinted at, if only a detainee would get certain information or betray imaginary secrets. Sometimes the man approached led them up the garden, but no matter, on they went; finding nothing. In a particularly vile case, an Intelligence Officer offered release to a detainee if he would lay evidence against a brother officer, whose sole offence was that he desired to treat detainees as ordinary human beings.

The real purpose of these Intelligence Officers cannot readily be ascertained. They act as a second censor; snooping into the letters of certain detainees; perusing books and periodicals despatched (in accordance with Home Office rules) direct from the publishers; they censor camp cinema shows, even the B.B.C. news and the daily newspapers. At times, even the most innocuous books are banned by them, if sent to particular individuals. In fact, it often seems as if they just exist to make things a little more difficult, and to justify their own existence; refusing proper access to books through the lending libraries; refusing correspondence courses; and preventing adequate correspondence. Sorriest farce of all is their solemn scrutinizing of letters to Members of Parliament which, nowadays, they are not allowed to alter in any way; even there they insist that the special sensitised paper be used, preventing any writing in invisible ink!

Really sinister is the process known to detainees as "Funfing."

A detainee will suddenly be sent for. He will be asked, quite politely, to take a seat; it is a real danger signal if he is also offered a cigarette. Then starts one of these freakish interviews, so stupid as to compete seriously with a Dixon Hawke fiction story:

> "Who do you think will win the war?"
> "Are you part of the pro-German element in the camp, or are you pro-British?"
> "Why did you move from House X?"
> "What do you think of Mr. Churchill?"
> "Do you like the Japanese?"
> "Do you intend to continue political activity during and after the war?"
> "Did . . . tell you he was going to join Scotland Yard when he was released?"

And to crown it all:

> "Of course you know we don't employ 'snoops,' don't you?"

These and scores of other leading questions have been asked. The reader may laugh; but the detainee was not always in the position to do so, as often his liberty, and the well-being of his family, depended on what he answered. Hints were frequently thrown out that the officers themselves had sympathy with particular Fascist ideals and had at one time almost joined British Union.

All the paraphernalia of the detective technique, as outlined in those advertisements appearing in cheap American magazines, headed "Be a detective and earn big money." And all yielding exactly nothing, though it went on week after week, month after month. Their employers must be very patient, or very stupid.

But it is clear that a good deal of their reporting gets to the Advisory Committee, where detainees are often confronted with practically verbatim accounts of conversations in their own quarters, twisted so as to make a good point.

One is reluctantly forced to the conclusion that political discrimination and bias is the guiding motive, looking for justification for what is otherwise unjustifiable.

We have tried to give a picture of the position in the internment camps where are confined British men and women. It seems to us not far removed from the state of affairs in 1817, when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended on baseless grounds, later completely condemned by historians, under an Act "to empower His Majesty to secure and detain such persons as His Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and the Government." Two quotations from "The Age We Live In," vol. 1, by James Taylor, D.D., reveal further similarities:

> ". . . . it was in the month of June (1817) that the conduct of the Government in employing spies and informers had been exposed and condemned in the House of Commons."
> "Lord Sidmouth's biographer affirms that none of the Government spies were 'employed in the first instance by Lord Sidmouth, they themselves found him out' and 'if they in any circumstances instigated the conspirators to crime in order to betray them, the treacherous act must have been entirely their own.' There is no reason to question the truth of this statement."

The position became so bad as far as suppression of public opinion was concerned that

William Cobbett ceased publication of the popular "Weekly Political Register" and fled to America, observing that:

"Lord Sidmouth was sorry to say that I had not written anything that the law officers could prosecute with any chance of success . . . . I do not retire from the combat with the Attorney General, but from combat with a dungeon . . . . any sort of trial I would have stayed to face . . . . but against the absolute power of imprisonment without even a hearing for a time unlimited, in any jail in the kingdom, without the use of pen, ink and paper, and without any communication with any soul but the keepers . . . . against such a power it would have been far worse than madness to strive."

Possibly the following quotation from the "Black Dwarf," a contemporary political periodical, relative to the Cabinet, which appeared on April 2nd, 1817, will give a further interesting parallel:

"(They) talked of patriotism when they meant plunder, and their object in embarking in a war with France was, not to conquer that country, but ourselves."

Are our politicians turning back the clock a century and a quarter? Are the liberties of the public being insidiously chequered?

THE PRESS.

In preceding chapters it has been clearly shown, by statements of the Home Secretary himself, that persons detained under Regulation 18B are not deemed guilty of any offence. They are held in custody solely because the Home Secretary subscribes that he has "reasonable cause to believe" that in certain unspecified circumstances—which may never arise—they MAY act in such a manner as would assist the enemy.

The Home Secretary's belief is apparently founded upon certain known facts about the individuals detained. It is convenient at this point to re-state, very briefly, the main heads under which detention orders may be issued, since these represent the primary known facts in which Sir John Anderson and Mr. Herbert Morrison find "reasonable cause" for their beliefs. They are as follows:

(a) HOSTILE ORIGIN—The reason being applicable when one or both parents of the detained person, or the detainee himself, were once aliens of one country or another with which we now happen to be at war.

(b) HOSTILE ASSOCIATION — Which head may cover any relations, family, social or commercial, with nationals of enemy countries — EVEN THOUGH SUCH RELATIONS MAY HAVE BEEN SEVERED LONG BEFORE THE OUTBREAK OF WAR.

(c) Membership, or former membership, of any organisation believed to have had sympathy with the system of Government of those countries with which we are now at war—EVEN THOUGH SUCH MEMBERSHIP WAS ALWAYS LEGAL AND FULLY SANCTIONED BY EXISTING LAWS.

Regarding (c), it is important to note that approval of such a purely domestic matter as a new Agricultural Policy sponsored by Mosley's British Union could—and actually did—lead many innocent people to months in gaol. There is a case on record in which one of the reasons given for a man's detention is that he once stood for Parliament as an anti-Tithe candidate. (He is a man with an outstanding record of military service to Britain).

It will be seen that these causes for supposedly "reasonable" belief are perilously wide in scope. It is no exaggeration to submit that in one aspect or another they might touch on the pre-war activity of nearly a quarter of the population. The margin for mistake and detention without adequate grounds is dangerously large—and there is ample proof that mistakes have occurred.

Out of a total of 1,817 arrested under Regulation 18B, about 1,288 have already been released from detention, many of them unconditionally. Circumstances affecting national security have changed so little since the arrests were effected that it seems only reasonable to assert that if these people are fit and proper persons to be at liberty now, then they must have been equally so at the time of their detention.

In some cases, where it has been patently evident that suspicion of ill-intent was not sufficiently justified to warrant further detention, the victim of 18B, by then duly stigmatised in the public eye, has been allowed to go free. In other cases, where the unfortunate detainee has been unable to perform the very difficult task of dispelling hazy and insubstantial suspicions, he still remains in a prison or barbed wire cage. There he must stay as weeks become months and months drag on into years. He must endure the hardships and vileness of conditions detailed elsewhere in this document whilst dependants and loved ones outside suffer want because denied his support. His only solace is Mr. Morrison's repeated declaration—"These people are not charged with any offence"—and even that solace is completely negatived by the obvious fact that not one person in five of the general public believes such declaration.

"No smoke without fire" is a saying that finds great currency in this country. Send a man to gaol for a lengthy period and no matter how much you proclaim his possible innocence the lay public will nod its head sagely and knowingly, happily convinced that such things could not happen in England unless some grave misdemeanour had been perpetrated.

In view of the respect in which British justice has hitherto been held, this attitude of mind is hardly surprising. Whether it should be so or not, there can be little doubt in the public mind that 18B detainees have been tried and found guilty. In this erroneous opinion they have been encouraged, led and unscrupulously misinformed by the most terrible machine of propaganda—THE PRESS.

Reminiscent of its behaviour when the Prime Minister asked the public to reserve judgment upon the capitulation of King Leopold of the Belgians, and the press promptly leapt in to rend the character of that unhappy monarch, is newspaper treatment of 18B detainees. With complete disregard of the Home Secretary's declarations, they have attacked the subject like hungry jackals attacking a near helpless prey.

The anecdote printed with subtle intent to defame; the mean inuendo; false interpretation are only the lesser injustices for which 18B detainees must one day demand redress. Treason has been charged against them by more than one malicious newspaper out to make sensational headlines. The relevant cuttings are carefully preserved for the time when the responsible publishers may be invited to explain their accusations. They are among hundreds of press extracts retained to prove that a campaign of calumny has been maintained right up to the present date.

Extracts from offending newspaper matter will not adequately illustrate the full reason for complaint, as, in many cases, it is the inference to be drawn from articles in complete form which constitute most grievous libels. The articles themselves are too lengthy to be embodied in this statement, but lest it be supposed that a persecution mania, arising out of a lengthy spell of unmerited imprisonment, might have led to the interpretation of innocent newspaper comment as something more sinister, the example which follows may be taken as typical.

An article entitled "I HELPED TO GAOL THE TRAITORS," written under the name Ewart Brookes, was published in the "Daily Mirror" during August, 1940. In the centre of the article a panelled announcement stated:

"Ewart Brookes watched and joined the British Fifth Column rats. Read his story and see if you agree that prison's too good for them."

The writer is, therefore, a self-confessed informer who claims to have supplied the police with data leading to many detentions under 18B. His article makes a sensational little adventure story and is totally unembarrassed by restricting demands of truth. He writes:

"If Sir John Anderson will put them (the detainees) on trial I volunteer as a witness . . . I will tell of the men and women who, when war broke out, rushed to join civil defence organisations and stamp their treachery with a forked lightning badge."

(It is made clear that the badge referred to is that of British Union).

This is followed later in the article with:

"I will tell how I turned over to authority personally conducted dossiers of these traitors . . . ."

Later again he declares that he will tell so much that men and women will—

"line up outside the prisons and barbed wire camps in which these suckers live in comfort and will demand the right to hang them from the nearest lamp post."

The writer of this scurrilous nonsense has not left himself the excuse that his accusations are directed only against a few individual detainees. His penultimate paragraph plainly states:

"As far as aliens are concerned, Sir John may have been extra and superbly cautious. As far as our own British brand of rat is concerned he hasn't put a finger wrong."

Not a finger wrong, says Mr. Ewart Brookes—yet the Home Secretary, with infinitely more information on the subject, has since seen fit to release two-thirds of the original number detained! The "lucky" 1288 released have gone out to associate with the public taught by Mr. Brookes, and the "Daily Mirror," to regard them as rats and traitors.

One large circulation Sunday newspaper described certain 18B arrests under a streamer headline across a whole page: GAULEITERS TO BE ARRESTED." The article that followed was made up of a list of names and descriptions of the latest detainees. These names included that of Lieut. Francis Christopher Fane, R.N., who was granted his unconditional release only after spending more than a year in captivity.

The name Fane is deservedly respected, not only at home in Lincolnshire but in a far broader sphere. It is known with honour in the Forces of the Crown and Lieut Fane may claim that he has endeavoured to maintain a proud family record. His claim is belatedly recognised by his release without any restrictive conditions. His freedom is restored to him and he is officially regarded as one with all the other Englishmen willing and ready to serve their country. But who would argue that his position can ever be the same? He has been publicly branded as a Hitler puppet and no retraction of such charge has yet been published. Only those well acquainted with public temper at this time can fully realise what approbrium has thus been attached to his character.

Lieut. Fane's case is not exceptional. It is representative of many cases of innocent men now released and many still awaiting the Home Secretary's pleasure.

Where men have been named in offensive newspaper matter the imputations are dreadful indeed, and will doubtless be the subject for challenge—effective and successful challenge—in the appropriate place, when clarity of mind and freedom to discuss the issues involved in Courts designed to stand between the citizen and the Executive are again functioning assets of our Constitution. The position of the average detainee who has not been individually mentioned in the press is not less invidious and equally deserving of redress.

The average 18B detainee, though deprived of his rights of free citizenship, is not otherwise unlike the average free citizen. He has only a crude understanding of the complexities of the law, and, in any case, could not afford recourse to expensive litigation. How then is he to protect his character and protect those private interests which inevitably suffer when character is impugned?

During detention, he is forbidden to write to newspapers, and even after release he does so only at his peril. While in detention this is a complete and unbreakable ban. Thus he is forbidden any attempt to correct glaring misrepresentations and distortions of facts. The Home Secretary, who is armed with plentiful power to enable him to prevent the publication of mischevious and false matter, which he has himself deplored in Parliament, displays noteworthy respect for freedom—of the press—by doing nothing at all about it.

It is true that occasional misgivings about the Regulation have found expression in various mediums, but only one newspaper, the "Manchester Guardian," has expressed consistent opposition. In the main, such trepidation as has been displayed has been not so much about how the Regulation has been applied in the past but how it might be applied in the past but how it might be applied in the in the future. Newspapers find it truly horrifying to reflect that it might be applied against newspapers. These selfishly inspired misgivings in no way compensate for the evil the press has worked on present and past 18B victims.

In criminal proceedings, any newspaper which ventured sub judice pronouncements on the guilt of the accused person would be guilty of contempt of Court, and, if convicted, fined and the responsible person might even be imprisoned. Finding that considerations of expediency and economy do not demand the same restraint in the case of detainees, who are neither charged nor awaiting trial, the press voluntarily appoints itself prosecutor, judge and jury. It then passes such judgments as are calculated to appeal to that inflamed public opinion it has itself so shamelessly misinformed.

It is difficult for anyone who has endured the detainee's experience at the merciless hands of the press not to sound a harsh note of condemnation. To him no condemnation seems harsh enough.

He has been used as "whipping boy" for the unhealthy entertainment of readers of the yellow "tabloid" press; he has been used as an experimental guinea pig by sedate and serious papers and reviews intent on proving or disproving, with the aid of pontifical men of law, that the cause of liberty is best served by its negation; and to him it seems that he has been used as the subject for exercises in unrestrained invective, by every gossip columnist, every hardened hack, and every aspiring amateur of the pen, writing in every medium from the national press to the most remote little local "rag."

As has been said before, extracts from newspaper matter, given without the full context, would not properly illustrate the very solid grounds for detainees' complaints against the press. The reader is reminded that files of cuttings, sufficient to justify every assertion here made, do exist, and will be produced as required, even though reasons of space prevent reproduction here. Any reader of this document who is also a student of the popular press will reasonably agree that further proof is unnecessary. Nevertheless, there is one section of the press which, though of no great importance in general influence, demand special mention—and from which quotations must be given.

The papers of the Isle of Man demand this particular mention because:

(a) The British Government at Westminster has no direct authority over them.

(b) They are not restrained by the same laws of libel that apply on the mainland (thus any litigation undertaken against them would involve extra complication and cost).

(c) They may, and it is reasonable to suppose that they do, by their own attitude to detainees held on the Island, influence the attitude of their readers. This means that they are in a position to prejudice not only the Manx people with whom detainees may have to come in contact in the course of work on farms and land reclamation schemes, but also, and this is of immense importance, they are in a position to prejudice the attitude of guards and personnel of the detention camps.

To suggest that one paragraph in one issue of a local newspaper is likely to exert any great influence is patently ridiculous; but when all local newspapers, daily and weekly, in a geographically detached region work to a like opinion; when they are from time to time supported by organs of the National press; when prominent local figures endorse that opinion, and when no counter opinion is ever given publicity, it would be expecting too much of human nature to hope that the reading public should not be swayed, and their attitude not be biassed, by such weight or propaganda.

These things considered, one is entitled to expect a sense of responsibility dictating press conduct. One is entitled to expect newspapers which eschew sensationalism to take pride in sober, objective news presentation. One might think to find a stronghold of that press dignity which commercialism and ballyhoo have ousted from Fleet Street journalism.

So much for expectations; what does one get?

Here are some extracts from an "Isle of Man Examiner" report of the arrival of 18B detainees on the Island. This report is headed

"TRUCULENT VISITORS."

"The contempt in which those who would undermine national stability in pursuit of a political belief are held by true blooded Britons was shown late on Monday (12th May, 1941) night when one of the Manx steamers engaged on Government work arrived at Douglas with about 600 18B detainees . . . ."

The words we have underlined clearly impute treachery to the uncharged detainees.

"The ship's passengers were mostly members of the British Union of Fascists . . . ."

Actually, the Fascists were a minority in a party which was largely composed of British subjects of Italian or German origin.

". . . . There were many typical Englishmen for whom one can have nothing but a feeling of utter loathing."

One or two detainees had hoped to impress on bystanders that they were not traitors by chalking "18B" upon their clothing. This pathetic precaution is described by the "Isle of Man Examiner" as:

"merely another instance of their depraved attitude of mind."

The report ends:

"Shortly after 7 o'clock the first of the two special trains left for Peel, and the second one departed just before 8 o'clock—and as a result the atmosphere of Douglas became all the purer again."

On the same day (16th May, 1941) the "Isle of Man Daily Times" published an item subheaded "The Corner Mob in the Camp." Two separate paragraphs will suffice to show its tone:

"These Fascists can fight, but with their tongues, and though we treat them with contempt we give our readers a few of the thoughts of these traitors now at Peel.

"We were, however, asked a poser at Peel this week by a Government official. He asked how could we or anyone else account for a man wearing the Mons Star and the Military Medal turning against his own country, as was the case of one man now behind the wires at Peel."

Such writings can only be interpreted as positive assertions of treachery. They permit no other reading.

In the same issue of the paper another news item ends with the question:

"Why all this secrecy over the Fascists? The public are allowed to look at the skunks at the Zoo."

This was the beginning of a long chapter of insult and persecution. When events at the camp did not provide news items, then news items were shamelessly invented, all of a character to give openings for new and more violent outbursts of contumely.

A purely imaginary ban by Manx farmers against "Mosley men" gave opportunity to quote one farmer as saying:

"We look upon these men as traitors to the Empire. I would rather work till I drop than have one of them on my land."

This item, in common with many of the most scurrilous fabrications, appeared also in the London "Daily Mail." The falseness of the news is best proved by the fact that 18B detainees, "Mosley men" and others, have subsequently worked regularly on Manx farms and enjoyed perfectly civil relationship with their employers.

That visitors to detainees may bring their husbands, brothers or friends presents of creature comforts to lighten the ordeal of detention sends the Manx press, and certain Manx officials, into a frenzy of protest. Mr. A. E. Ostick, formerly resident proprietor of an hotel adjoining the camp and a member of Peel Commissioners, a gentleman of whom more must be written, furnished grotesquely exaggerated accounts of the quantities of foodstuffs delivered in this way. His accounts, taken up acidly by both local and National press, were the basis for an outcry against alleged "luxury feeding of Fascists" ("Isle of Man Daily Times" 4/7/41 to 8/8/41, and other papers).

The circumstances that public seats on Peel promenade had been enclosed in the barbed wire fence of the 18B camp caused another flutter among the Town Commissioners, and incidentally gave the press an opening to report a Mr. Jenkinson as saying:

"I do not object to the aliens using the seats . . . but these Fascists are different—they have turned against their country."

The accumulation of cuttings offering "news" couched in similar terms to the examples given would themselves fill a large volume.

Here follows an instance in which gross misrepresentation is the weapon used to stir public animosity against detainees.

First the bare facts:

On the night of Sunday, September 7th, 1941, in accordance with normal practice at that time, all camp lights were switched out at 10.30 p.m. They were switched off by a master switch controlled by the military and situated outside the camp itself; thus no detainees would be able to switch on a light until such time as the master switch was turned next morning.

This being the recognised signal, detainees proceeded to remove blackout materials and throw open windows for the night. About half an hour later, by a careless mistake on the part of the military, the lights were again switched on, and before the mistake was corrected, or detainees could all be awakened to effect the necessary re-adjustment of blackout curtains, lights had been exposed for several minutes.

Here is the incident as recorded in the "Isle of Man Examiner" (12th September, 1941).

"PEEL RATS KICK UP A RUMPUS.
"Many Lights Show Out to Sea.

"Considerable noise was heard in the neighbourhood of the Fascist detainee camp at Peel late on Sunday evening, when there was yelling and shouting and the banging of pots and pans. At the time the camp was in complete darkness, but suddenly over a score of windows facing the promenade were lit up by electric light, reflecting into the bay and visible far out to sea. When the lights were shown there was further shouting, and after a few seconds the lights were put out with a few exceptions. One light in the middle of the promenade and another in Victoria Terrace stayed on for several minutes. Eventually the lights were put out, but other lights were showing on several occasions. The matter appears to call for serious investigation, as the showing of lights out to sea is so dangerous to people living on the Island."

In the editorial of the same paper, the matter is taken up again in these words:

"THE PEEL RATS.

"The disgusting behaviour of the British traitors at Peel last week-end calls for serious investigation. These men—if they can be called so—seem prepared to do anything which will upset the people and damage our cause. It is a matter of serious import that they should be in a position where they can switch on lights exposed out to sea, and the proper way to deal with them is to deny them any artificial lighting at all. They are the scum of the country and are not worthy of the slightest consideration. We do hope that some serious notice will be taken of last Sunday's outrageous behaviour."

And here is how the story was distorted for the readers of the world's largest circulation daily newspaper:

"LIGHTS UP IN BLACK-OUT.
"Fascists Protest.

"British Fascists interned at Peel on the coast of the Isle of Man switched on bedroom lights 'wholesale.' The men said they had a grievance The lights shone out to sea for fifteen minutes during the black-out. More than twenty boarding houses forming part of the camp were illuminated, and some lights were switched on and off like signals." ("Daily Express," 11/9/41.)

So, it will be seen, is a careless action by the military guards used to the severe discredit of the detainees. The embellishments supplied in the "Express" report give their version of the affair an air of complete authenticity and incalculable harm accrues to the detainee, who is already hard put to it to establish his claim that he is a sober, responsible individual.

The anxieties suffered by relatives of detainees through these mischevious reports, and the baneful influence they may exert, is shown in the worried letters which reached the camp after each of such publications. The wife of a man who has served Britain in war and peace (he was a member of the Shackleton expedition to the Pole) wrote a letter including this passage:

"I have striven desperately to urge men who know your record to make representations to secure your release, and at times I have been hopeful of useful aid. Then comes news of this kind (the "Express" report of the lights incident) and I cannot sincerely blame them when they say that people guilty of such dangerous conduct should not be freed. Why! Oh why must you do such terrible things which only make people hate you?"

A number of marriages have actually been wrecked by such damnable lying.

Even the foregoing quotations of defamatory newspaper matter lose significance in comparison with what was let loose after the so-called "Fascist Riot" at Peel. This subject is more fully dealt with in the section of this statement devoted to "Riot." Here it is sufficient to record that those primarily responsible for the "exaggeration" deplored by the Home Secretary were the Manx newsmongers, who acted as representatives to the National press, prominent among these being Mr. A. E. Ostick of the Creg Malin Hotel, whose masterpiece of graphic fabrication made "splash" headlines in the "News Chronicle." When the more highly trained reporters of the National press did reach the Island the situation was only aggravated. As if bound to justify the expense of their trip to Peel, they began to manufacture sensations out of the most trivial happenings—sometimes without any happenings at all. Failing this, they sent back "local colour" stories which, though vivid, bore scant relation to the truth.

Discovery of a tunnel by which three escapees had crawled under the wire fence of the camp, led W. A. Dixon of the "Daily Herald," and many other reporters to compose a fantastic tale of a mass-escape attempt.

The discovery was obviously legitimate material for a piquant news item—but the mass-escape plan never existed outside reporter's imaginations. It was deliberately invented to "build up" the news value of the tunnel find. Nor was this all. Detainees, who had spent the normal quiet and monotonously boring week-end in the camp, were dumbfounded to read in the press one Tuesday (30th September, 1941) that, in addition to planning this mass-escape, they had been burgling their own canteen (a small lock-up shop) and engaging in riotous brawling.

Since Mr. Dixon is one of those who compiled this lying nonsense, let him tell the story his own way:

"The discovery of the tunnel followed a disturbance in the camp canteen, during which a number of detainees were injured. Some of the detained men broke into the canteen with the object, I understand, of toasting in wine the completion of the tunnel and the prospective bid for freedom. There was a free fight, in which empty bottles were used as weapons. Eight men were put into the camp 'glass house' as a result of the brawl." ("Daily Herald," 30/9/41.)

The whole deliberate fiction was front paged under one inch headlines. Other National dailies and the B.B.C. generally regarded as the guarantor of news authenticity, shared the story of fighting and injuries, causing God knows how much alarm and concern to the families of detainees.

When men pressed for permission to send home conciliatory telegrams they were told—"the matter is not sufficiently important."

Damaging effect of these and other reports on the outlook of the general public is reflected in the correspondence columns of the papers responsible. Here is a typical letter to the press:

"I protest against the utterly flabby treatment of the rioting Fascists in the Isle of Man—I refuse to call them British. If we are fighting with our backs to the wall why not shoot these Quislings and so save complications? Why should they live in peaceful surroundings while other people have to sweat and toil and die.—J. White, South Molton." ("Daily Mail," 24/9/41.)

And here is an extract from another:

"These so-called men, these spineless creatures, revolted, knowing that their guards were not allowed to hit back. . . . These are the men who, rather than fight for their country, prefer to attempt to betray it in the hope of receiving good jobs if their betrayal is successful. And these dirty, would-be traitors are the ones who are allowed to throw broken bottles (wine bottles, I expect), old tins and mud at their guards." (Letter in "Daily Mirror," 25/9/41.)

These two letters indicate an attitude of mind that is by no means rare.

Regulation 18B and the machinations of an unprincipled press have directed against a group of men and women, held in captivity without trial or charge, with no means of proving their innocence, and no defence against the foulest calumny, an intensity of hatred that is mercifully uncommon in the British people. Here is a situation that shrieks aloud for rectification.

If it is really necessary to the well-being of the country to commit innocent men to prisons and prison camps; to scrap their rights; to reserve or totally dispense with charges against them; if these unconstitutional, un-British measures are truly necessary, then we, the detained, must reserve our defence and submit, with what patience we can muster, to our unhappy lot. But is it too much to ask, in view of this absence of charges and of our reserved defence, that all men of fair mind should reserve judgment upon us and press vilification be silenced.

There is another aspect at which we can only hint, as we have only suspicions, not actual proof. That is, that the press is used, deliberately, by certain anonymous quarters, to create bias against detainees at moments when new moves are contemplated against them, or sympathy for them threatens to become too strong.

Commander Bower, M.P., seems to have the same suspicions, so that he remarked in the Commons on the 21st July, 1942:

"In the last few days there has been a very tendencious press propaganda tending to discredit the internees. Coming just as this debate was pending, I cannot help wondering whether this is absolutely fortuitous."

RELEASE.

That Defence Regulation 18B has been administered oppressively is proved overwhelmingly by the fact that, of the 1,160 persons released to date from detention under this regulation, only one man has been given even partial vindication. We refer to Mr. Ben Greene, former Hertfordshire J.P., who, after twenty months of detention, was released on the 7th January, 1941, with all the original charges levelled against him unreservedly withdrawn by the Home Office. Even here, however, possibly to save their faces, the Home Office imposed the nominal condition upon him that he must report to the police any change of address.

Other releases have taken the form of a "revoked order" or, as in the majority of cases, a "suspended order." It is in the circumstances of these releases, and the refusal of vindication to hundreds of men and women returned to a world convinced that they are actual or potential traitors to their country, that the fully punitive effect of this regulation can be seen.

Command Paper 6162, which purports to define the conditions of detention, expressly states that "the condition of the confinement will be as little as possible oppressive."

Can it be other than oppressive that a detainee should read in a newspaper that he has been released, yet that he and the Camp Commandant should continually telephone the Home Office for three days before he actually is freed? This happened.

Can it be anything but punitive that detainees should receive anxious letters from their relatives asking for their whereabouts, as local police said they had been released; and that a month of mental stress should have to be endured before actual release takes place? This happened in several cases.

Is it not oppressive that the release should not come until as long as five weeks after the date on the release order, a gross delay which could do irreparable damage to business affairs, or to the health of the detainee and his relatives? This was a common occurrence.

Can it be anything but malicious treatment that Military Intelligence officers should question detainees—twice in one man's case—on the views of fellow detainees, suggesting that satisfactory answers would bring their own release much nearer? This despicable practice was once a regular routine.

It may be contended that muddle and what is called "red tape" are responsible for delays in fulfilling the intention to release men. Yet does the knowledge of Governmental ineptitude lessen the mental torture of its victims? Furthermore, even this excuse meant nothing where the price of release is the invitation to become an informer. So obvious was it that the Military Intelligence officers concerned were flagrantly over-stepping their duties that, after strenuous protest, they were removed from their posts.

The punitive effects of the Regulation can also be seen in the release of certain men and continued detention of others.

Ex-servicemen of the last war, Englishmen who bear decorations for heroism and service, have been casually informed that the Home Secretary sees no reason for their release. In the meantime, British subjects of enemy origin have been released against their own wish, while avowing their allegiance to Hitler. These men, two of German origin and one of Italian parentage, left M Camp, Peel, after protesting against a release which might cast doubt upon their German and Italian loyalty. Farcical limits are reached when we find one of these men of German origin being forced to join the British army.

It is equally difficult to understand why, of men detained on precisely the same ground—membership of a particular political body—some should be released and some kept in detention indefinitely. There are hundreds of such cases, where it seems that the deciding factor has been not the decided judgment of the Advisory Committee or the Home Secretary, but the whim of some local official; for if the holding of certain political views has led to detention, what intelligence on earth could decide, at a distance, that one man has changed his attitude and can safely be released, whilst his neighbour must still be confined, in the public interest?

One prospective Parliamentary candidate for British Union was abruptly released, although only five days earlier he had been notified that he must be further detained. Could his views have changed in so short a time?

But punitive treatment endures after release. Every man and woman released, after months of detention, knows that he or she can be whipped back into internment at any time, for there has been created a new and vicious form of "ticket-of-leave" system. This became clear and was brought to a definite threat by Mr. Herbert Morrison in the House of Commons on the 27th November, 1941, when he said:

> "It must not be assumed that the curve of detentions is always going down. There may come a time . . . . that it may be necessary for the curve of detentions to go up again and, believe me, provided that I carry the support of the House with me, I shall not hesitate, in the changing situation that may arise, to detain every person whom I think with reason might be a danger to the State in the situation of anxiety."

This is no mere threat. Men have been released, perhaps by mistake, through some inefficiency in high places and, after so long as six weeks of liberty, have been re-arrested.

Fifteen men serving in the army, mostly as volunteers, were detained for sixteen months and then abruptly released, having been arrested under a wrong clause of Regulation 18B. For a few days, wives, relatives and dependents enjoyed a heartfelt relief; then came the tragic shock. All were re-arrested under new orders. The cruelty of such frivolous play with human liberty is only exceeded by its utter pointlessness; pointlessness which is revealed in the fact that at least eight of the men have since been released again.

But it is the stigma attached to any released person which carries its punitive effect back into civil life. He leaves detention without any withdrawal of the imputation that he is a potential traitor. The facts of this matter were notably summarised by Flight-Lieut. Boothby when he said in the House of Commons on the 26th November, 1941:

> "But to the British citizen interned under Regulation 18B, or the friendly alien interned under Regulation 12 (5A), a stigma must necessarily attach not only to himself, but to his children and his children's children. We cannot get away from that fact."

The Home Secretary will not admit the error. Every man released carries with him, often endorsed upon his identity card, which must be produced whenever he seeks employment and upon many other occasions, a stigma, making him an outcast amidst a public possessed of a Fifth Column complex.

Under a Suspended Order, the detainee often finds that he may not live in his own town, often even in his own county. A man from Kent reached home to find his wife and family acutely destitute. A local job was available to him; a job that would have enabled him, in some small measure, to compensate his family for the grievous deprivation they had suffered. The job had to be rejected because the police forbade his residence in the county. Little imagination is needed to visualise the anxiety with which he had to search for work elsewhere, still, in effect, as far from his family and home life as ever.

In a second case, a schoolmaster in the East of England was likewise debarred from living in his own county. Driven to take hotel accommodation elsewhere, he suffered the unpleasant indignity of being locked in his bedroom. The landlord, no doubt an excellent citizen, had considered it his bounden duty, on observing that his guest's identity card bore traces of Regulation 18B, to keep such a man under restraint.

Other men have gone out of detention to find their families completely broken up. There are three known cases in which wives have deserted their husbands rather than continue to live in an atmosphere of spiteful malevolence too great for human endurance. The number of shattered engagements is too great for computation.

Many ex-detainees have found their wives in a state of irreparably damaged health. A Bolton ex-serviceman, released after nineteen months' detention, discovered his wife in a condition of physical collapse because of her endeavours to keep on with his job as caretaker of a three-storey warehouse.

Some cases illustrate a vicious misunderstanding by the general public. A Brighton butcher had his premises bedaubed "Traitor." An Islington trader had his shop ransacked. An Ashtead man wrote that he left his timber-yard "full of poles, timber, sheds . . ." and returned to find it bare and depressing. "A timber-yard without timber is awful . . ." It would seem that those who have incurred the Home Secretary's suspicion are no longer protected by any laws of property; that they are regarded as fair game for "patriotic" vandals and thieves.

Released, yet still suspect, subject of whispered back-door gossip, of scandal handed over the shop counters of their neighbourhood; undesirable employees; the released detainees are marked men wherever they go.

A Worcestershire man obtained work with a forestry unit, and there is no doubt he would have been an efficient organiser in work of great value to the country. When the Labour Exchange observed the evidence of 18B detention on his identity card and reported this to his divisional director, he was immediately dismissed. He was informed that his membership of British Union was sufficient reason for this treatment.

Another former member of British Union has been forced to change his employment no less than seventeen times. From most jobs he has been dismissed because of such membership. One firm of Government contractors who employed him as a lorry driver gave the Security Clause in their contract with the Government as the reason for his dismissal. This, they said, forbade the employment of members of British Union. Questioned in the House of Commons by Sir Irving Albery, the Minister of Labour denied that such instructions had been issued by his Department. Be this true or not, the fact remains that ex-detainees may be victimised, and are being victimised, either by employers or Government departments.

In the case mentioned, salt was rubbed into the wound when, on application for relief at the local Labour Exchange, the man was refused any form of assistance. This in spite of the opinion of Mr. Craven Ellis, M.P., who wrote "I cannot believe that this would be refused."

Lieut.-Colonel Sir Thomas Moore, M.P., asked in the House of Commons:

> "Is the Right Hon. Gentleman aware that men who have been released from internment camps have their identity cards marked to show they were so interned? How is it possible for them to get jobs?"

There was no adequate reply. There could be none. The press did not report the question.

There is as much injustice attached to release as to actual detention. That cannot be emphasised too vigorously. It is unjust that men and women of good character should have been flung into prison without warning and detained for more than two years without charge. It is unjust that their cases should have been considered by a tribunal whose findings have frequently been over-ruled by a single Minister of the Crown. It is unjust that established Courts of Law have been bound to refuse the ancient right of Habeas Corpus, a right treasured by the British people for more than eight centuries. Equally unjust is the complete lack of explanation when release from detention is granted. It is damnably unjust that with so much mystery about their detention and release, men and women should be denied public vindication by the Minister responsible for creating that mystery. It is a flagrant travesty of justice that they should be left exposed to the condemnation of a world taught to regard them with gravest suspicion.

There can be no computing what misery; what depths of desolation and utterly helpless desperation may come from this ultimate cruelty.

The point has been put forward that because some three quarters of those originally detained have now been released that there was never any justification for detaining them.

Mr. Morrison replied to this suggestion that changed circumstances justified him in altering his decisions.

It must be recorded however that a large number of those who have been released have joined the army and we should have thought that no amount of change of circumstances would have warranted accepting a man in the army if his status as a "suspected person" still existed.

We should admire Mr. Morrison a great deal more if he were man enough to come out into the open and admit that the whole thing was a mistake from start to finish, and that there never was in point of fact any justification for the detentions.

Because the great majority on release have to report themselves weekly or monthly to the police it is logical to assume that in the eyes of the authorities they are suspected of traitorous intent.

There are numerous cases of such persons being required to do this right up to the moment they have joined His Majesty's forces.

It is perfectly good logic to suggest therefore that the Forces are being obliged to accept men of suspected traitorous intent.

This of course is a very wrong procedure unless of course we must assume that Mr. Morrison knew perfectly well that such men had no suggestion of traitorous intent and if that is so why did he compel them to report regularly to their local police? Was it just to damn them still further in the eyes of their neighbours?

WAS PARLIAMENT DECEIVED.

Imprisonment for offences against the civil or criminal code is a survival from those far-off days when the king or his barons had absolute power to cast their rivals or serfs into dungeons, perhaps to inflict physical torture upon them, as punishment to themselves or deterring examples to others. Modern civilisation calls for modified treatment, so that the mere fact of confinement under unpleasant conditions, coupled with coarse and barely adequate feeding, and forced labour, is regarded as sufficient punishment for most offences; but, mark, it is thought of as punishment. Actually, it is the family of the wrong-doer who are usually the worse hit, because while he, at any rate, is housed and fed, they are left outside, deprived of their breadwinner and exposed to such obloquy as neighbours may inflict upon them—but that is a thing our legislators do not often consider; for one thing, there are no votes in it.

It is obvious in any case that to sane people the mere fact of imprisonment is punitive and oppressive; otherwise gaols would have terrors for nobody, would serve no purpose whatever.

Whatever the Government thought and felt about Regulation 18B, Parliament was distinctly restive when the matter was first under discussion, and this feeling was only set to rest by Government assurances, embodied in the Command Paper 6162, already set out in this document, laying down strict precautions to be adopted to ensure that the imprisonment would be as little oppressive as possible.

Paragraph (1) reads as follows:

> As persons detained in pursuance of Regulation 18B are so detained for custodial purposes only and not with any punitive purpose, the conditions of their confinement will be as little as possible oppressive, due regard being had to the necessity of ensuring safe custody and maintaining good order and good behaviour.

We will make nothing here of such matters as temporary deprivation of books, extra food, or tobacco and cigarettes. In war-time, all should expect inconveniences and loss of solaces and luxuries. Further, it is unnecessary to stress such things, in view of the manifold examples of cases where the Command Paper was not complied with in far more serious respects, to a degree counter both to ordinary humanity and to the expressed will of Parliament.

Ignorance of these matters cannot be pleaded by the Home Secretary, as innumerable and continuous representations were made through prison officers, visiting magistrates, Home Office inspectors, petitions to the Home Office and complaints to Members of Parliament (where these were not obstructed or lost in transmission). Yet applications and petitions were ignored, and parliamentary questions were disposed of by deliberate evasions or downright lies; and when pressed both Mr. Morrison and his Under Secretary, Mr. Peake, have indignantly denied that conditions were oppressive.

Consider some of the circumstances attending arrest and first arrival at prison. How men were seized in their homes, at places of business or employment, or elsewhere, and, without any opportunity to straighten up their affairs before being whipped away into timeless imprisonment, bundled into gaols or local police stations; were not allowed, in some cases, even to acquaint relatives with their fate and whereabouts, or to ensure that children would be looked after; were sometimes paraded, handcuffed or chained together, through the streets of their own town. How an ailing man of 76 was taken on a long and arduous journey, handcuffed, and thrown into gaol to die. How men were threatened, even struck, by police bullies in search of kudos.

Picture how men in His Majesty's forces were in many instances detained in a manner contrary to the Army Act and King's Regulations, were paraded before the public view wearing handcuffs—in one case, a serving officer was handcuffed to a junior rank, a breach of every army code; how regimental badges and badges of rank were torn off uniforms, to provide a public spectacle at a Liverpool railway station.

Read again the testimony of Mr. G. B. as to the birth-pangs endured by his wife, whilst, unattended, even unprovided with articles of hygiene, she lay in a cell at Shrewsbury.

Recall how a child of 10 underwent police interrogation and then, instead of being returned, as promised, to his mother, was placed in a public institution; and we would mention here another case where both parents were arrested on a ridiculous charge, their children also being put into an institution; the London Council (of which Mr. Morrison has been so important a member) later on sending to the mother, still in imprisonment, a bill for their keep.

Were these things punitive? Were they oppressive? Or has the English language changed its meaning?

It is laid down that detainees should be kept apart from convicted prisoners. Yet there are established cases, at Maidstone, Winchester and Walton prisons, where this was not done; and at Brixton and elsewhere many men were made to strip in the presence of convicted prisoners, who sometimes assisted in searching their property.

Frequently, treatment was meted out worse than laid down for convicts. Unless, that is, it is customary for prisoners to be lodged in cells reeking with filth and denied facilities for properly cleaning them; unless it is usual to keep prisoners in solitary confinement twenty-two or twenty-three hours in a day, for days or weeks on end; unless it is typical of English gaols that towels and soap should not be issued until several days after arrest, and that men should, in default of proper cell fittings, be forced to wash their clothes in a cell urine utensil.

Visits were expressly allowed, subject to suitable supervision.

In a number of cases, notably at York, Cardiff and Leeds, these visits were refused. Still, in prisons, they are limited to fifteen minutes' duration. Rules have varied according to the person in charge, but often a warder has sat between the detainee and his visitor, and an embrace, even a handclasp, refused.

On the transfer to Ascot, a permit system was instituted, but was not notified either to detainees or their friends; so that for a period it was a common spectacle to see visitors who had in many cases spent their last few shillings, even borrowed money, to gain touch with husbands, to obtain advice as to how homes should be kept together, turned away and walk, weeping bitterly, along the road back to the station. Somebody had bungled, or somebody didn't care. Telegrams and urgent letters sent from the camp, giving instructions how permits could be got and stressing that it would be futile to come without one, were deliberately delayed or suppressed, resulting in yet more wasted journeys and bitter disappointments.

At Huyton Camp, an Intelligence Officer, Capt. Ormstein, laid down that detainee and visitor must be separated by double table width. When several detainees and their friends were present conversation had to be carried on in unnaturally-raised tones amid a babel of voices, distressing to both visitors and visited; small wonder that after one such experience visitors avowed they would rather undergo separation than such painful meetings.

Food could be sent in; and, packed by loving hands, often at personal sacrifice, was allowed to lie in dirty rooms awaiting the pleasure of those detailed to see to it, eventually reaching the detainees in a battered and rotting condition, or not reaching them at all, having been pilfered by some scoundrel in uniform.

Immediately following the mass arrests, in early June, 1940, letters, inwards and outwards, were subject to extreme delay, it being usual for a letter to take a month in transmission, exchange of letters rarely being accomplished within six weeks. So families without means were cut off from touch, wives in many cases not even knowing their husband's whereabouts; and traders and commercial men engaged on work of extreme national importance unable to contact their businesses and works. It was ruled in prisons (with the exception of Stafford) that no more than two letters could be received in one week, so that frequently a man would receive letters from casual acquaintances, whilst those from his family or business were returned, without explanation, to their senders. This aggravated an already distressing state of affairs.

The situation then became acute on transfer to Ascot, when first of all a printed "field card" was allowed to notify the change of address, and then two 24-line letters, written on sensitised "prisoner of war" note-paper, were allowed weekly. But relatives waited for many days without news. It was so with a Stockport man, who was telegraphed on the 31st July advising of his wife's coming confinement; not until 17th August was a reply allowed to reach her. Reassuring telegrams were not allowed to be sent, or were much delayed, whilst letters were pouring into the camp asking "Where are you and why don't you write?"

Of all the trials undergone by 18B detainees, this barrier to reasonable communication facilities has always been a major provocation to discontent and mental stress. Still in May, 1942, there were many occasions when letters took a month in transmission.

When a detainee's home town is bombed, he waits with great anxiety for news that his family is safe: is it not punitive, not oppressive, that his anxiety should be protracted over weeks before his heart is set at rest?

Says the Command Paper:

> "A detained person will be given full opportunities to make representations in writing to the Secretary of State regarding his case and treatment."

How has this been interpreted? At the outset, a single sheet of paper, probably the most important document a man has ever had before him, in which to make his appeal against detention for an unknown period, on undisclosed grounds. Legal advice was not permitted as to its compilation. In one case, only five minutes were allowed in which to write it. One man was refused it altogether at Walton, resulting in failure to lodge it within the prescribed ten days.

After this, there was the right to petition the Home Secretary. Some petitions got lost altogether; most of the others never seem to have been acknowledged.

"Medical attention will be provided . . ." So we read on.

At Walton Prison, a man with duodenal ulcers could not get any attention at all apart from powders. Another was refused permission to obtain medicine which had not failed, over a number of years, to reduce a complaint to a minimum of discomfort; when he pressed the point, the doctor left his cell and ordered the door to be locked.

Also at Walton, two men required dental treatment. One, a Sheffield school teacher, after ten minutes of acute agony during which the doctor had only succeeded in breaking the top off a tooth, was told that nothing more could be done. When he had undergone weeks of pain, the stump was removed by a dentist at Ascot Camp in a completely painless manner and without trouble. Another, with acute toothache, asked for a dentist, and was told the dentist was only available once a week; after a sleepless night, he entrusted himself to the prison doctor, who took it out—without a local anaesthetic.

Altogether, a pretty story. Legal minds may still be divided on the point whether the 18B Regulation is legally valid at all; but none, surely, will have two minds about the manner in which it, and the Command Paper, have been carried into effect.

It is submitted that there are only two possible explanations. Either the Home Secretary and the Home Office have been lax in tolerating the many abuses which have been allowed to go on in breach of the Command Paper; or that there never was any serious intention of honouring it.

Detainees have their own feelings in the matter. It is for members of Parliament, however, to decide if, and to what extent, they may have been deceived, and what they propose to do about it.

CONCLUSIONS.

In the foregoing pages it has been attempted to outline the origin and working of the 18B Regulation. Such shortcomings as are evident —and they are many—have arisen from a number of causes; the conditions under which the compilers had to work, inside an internment camp and therefore cut off from many sources of enquiry, and aware all the time that at any moment authority might step in and seize their writings, to be impounded or destroyed, or turned to use against them; the reluctance of a great many detainees to discuss their cases, lest publication should prejudice their own chances of release or subsequent immunity from re-arrest; and the fact, all too well appreciated, that the compilers themselves do not profess to be professional writers. Yet setting all that aside, there remains that it has been their lot to live through or to see suffered by others, day by day, the hardships and cruelties complained of or to have heard them related at first hand; and to have read the pathetic letters received by detainees from sorely tried relatives, or from men who, after release, have still found oppression and manufactured hatred dogging their every step. Unfortunately, the women's case cannot yet be given in any detail.

Piecing the story together was no light task. Personal distress and anguish are things of feeling, not to be set down by ordinary men in words; and in striving to remain objective it has been endeavoured to avoid high-flown phrases, keeping rather to blunt fact, as is our English way.

The fact that most of the victims were alleged or avowed Fascists is no justification for the treatment meted out to them, if the statements in this document are correct. It is not our purpose to defend the political views of these victims. But it is demanded that an enquiry be made of the wrongs done to them, and that adequate redress be made wherever that is possible.

THE DEMAND.

As has been shown, nearly two thousand men and women have suffered grievous hardship and loss as a result of this panic legislation, forced through Parliament by means of threat and deception.

We demand that there be set up an impartial body, independent of any Government department, which shall review every case where a British subject has been detained or has been the subject of restrictions under Regulation 18B, and where it is found that in view of all the circumstances the action was unjustified, proper amends shall be made under the following heads:

Victimisation.

This we put first and foremost. Remember the words of the Under-Secretary of State, Mr. Osbert Peake: "Why should they be tried? . . . There is no charge against them." (Hansard, Vol. 370, No. 41, Par. 517).

For three bitter years false accusations have been launched against these unfortunates of State, and the possibility has already been envisaged that the slur will remain with them for the rest of their lives, and be borne by their children and their children's children after them. That must not be. We demand that definite Government declarations be forthcoming, and given proper publicity through press and radio, refuting the lies and calumnies that have come to be accepted as fact; furthermore that, apart from any matter of Court proceedings for libel and slander, it be constituted an offence, punishable by law, to conduct further persecution, or business or social discrimination, based on the fact of 18B detentions or restrictions.

Rehabilitation and Redress.

1. Where positions of a permanent nature, whether in private or public employ, have been lost, they must be restored, with due adjustments for lost time; or should this be found impracticable in individual cases proper compensation must be awarded, to include reasonable allowances for loss of pension rights, loss of career and similar damage sustained.

2. Similarly, all other employed persons to be reinstated, or proper compensation awarded if similarly paid work cannot be obtained.

On the contrary "The New York Times" was permitted to use the evidence supplied by the

3. Proprietors of businesses or shops shall be rehabilitated, so that they shall not have lost by their internment; every aspect must be considered—e.g., loss of or damage to business connections, damage to goodwill, loss of ability through long idleness.

4. Compensation shall also be granted in respect of:

(a) Damage to health or mental faculties.

(b) Material losses sustained, for instance, where dwelling, furniture or other property has had to be sacrificed or mortgaged during and/or as a result of detention or restrictions.

(c) Losses sustained by and hardships enforced upon internees' families.

where these have arisen solely as a result of internment or the imposition of restrictive conditions.

5. In assessing compensation, there shall be taken into account any breaches, that is, failure to carry into effect the provisions of Command Paper 6162, the terms of which met with approval in Parliament.

Those are the amends which we feel should be made. There is no desire by internees or others to make money out of the situation, but harm has been done and must be righted.

BEN GREENE CASE

Reference has been made in the body of this work to the internment of Ben Greene.

On January 7, 1942, Ben Green was released from Brixton Prison and a week later he received a long letter from the Home Office which concluded with the following words:—

"After considering the report of the Advisory Committee the Secretary of State thinks it right, taking account of the nature of the allegations in the above quoted particulars and of the exceptional publicity given to them, to inform you that these allegations should be regarded as withdrawn."

Ben Green proceeded to take action for false imprisonment and for over a year the matter hung about in the courts, with one appeal after another. The hearing came up in April, 1943, and after some days Ben Greene withdrew the case, because of the impossible legal position. His case established beyond any shadow of doubt that no 18B person can possibly win any action for false imprisonment for the following reasons:—

1. To win such an action the plaintiff's innocence is not a material factor. He must prove that Secretary of State did not believe him to be guilty, or in other words, he has to prove the state of mind of the Home Secretary.

Lord Clauson stated the legal position in this way:—

"The only thing which in this action can be discussed will be when Sir John Anderson said 'I have reasonable cause to believe.' Was he lying and was it the fact that he did not believe anything of the kind?"

2. To prove the state of mind of anyone is difficult enough but in the case of an 18B it is made quite impossible because at the behest of the Secretary of State himself the most essential evidence can be excluded as it was in this case by the claim of privilege. The Secretary of State declared:—

"I have examined the plea of the Advisory Committee including the transcripts of the proceedings and the reports of the two Committees and I have to inform you that I object to their production other than for letters and documents passing between the Committee and Mr. Greene or his advisors on the ground that it would be contrary to the public interest that they should be disclosed. Further, I have to say that it would be contrary to the public interest that evidence should be given as to what passed at any of the proceedings before the Advisory Committee."

This claim for privilege was upheld by the court and the most important evidence was thereby excluded and Greene withdrew his case to save some of the costs.

It should be noted, however, that in Capt. Ramsay's libel case against "The New York Times" there was no claim for privilege but Secretary of State. Whichever the leg the boot is on, the 18B prisoner goes down!

Kurtz admitted that he was a paid Government agent and admitted that in such circumstances it was his duty to lie. Though he had denied to Greene's solicitors the fact of his alleged report, in the witness box he withdrew the denial and the only evidence not covered by privilege was nullified. To cap all the Government now require Greene to pay well over £1,000 for the legal costs for daring to bring an action for alleged false imprisonment.

EDITOR'S STATEMENT.

[Whilst this work was passing through the press, the editor and compiler indicated to the publisher that he wished to change the foreword. It was not easy to make this alteration so the following paragraphs from the intended revised foreword are published as the editor's and compiler's concluding word.—Publisher.]

I leave it to the reader to judge for himself whether the facts as presented ring true. If he feels that they do ring true then I ask him not to allow the cry of those so unjustly treated under this regulation to go unheard and unanswered.

I am bringing these facts to the public notice, not merely for the sake of the sufferers themselves. It has been said that "a house divided against itself will fall" and the same is true of a Nation. More than ever do we now need complete national unity and if those who are abroad fighting for liberty feel that injustice is being perpetrated in their own country they can hardly be expected to give of their best.

This is no matter of personal surmise for I have seen letters from all three services indicating that the writers are gravely concerned by what they have heard about the administration of regulation 18B.

My final appeal to all who are impressed by what they read is that in every possible way they will bring pressure to bear on their elected representatives so that The Mother of Parliaments may compel the executive to cease from abusing the war-time powers conferred upon them; with, I venture to think, too lively a fear for the military dangers of the present and too little regard for the constitutional dangers of the future. It would be sad indeed for Britain and her allies if we gained a military victory only to find that we had lost the most precious thing for which we are fighting.

I wish to make it quite clear that so far as possible I have refrained from showing any political bias for any party or section but as a British Officer with active service in the last war I am naturally prejudiced in favour of England.

PUBLISHERS' AFTER-WORD

A prayer was presented in the House of Commons on July 8, 1943, to annul certain Regulations under the Emergency Powers Act, by Sir H. Webbe. The attack was directed mainly against the delegation of powers by Ministers. Major Lloyd George resisted the prayer and contended that, during the war, these powers were necessary. Finally, the motion was withdrawn. Seven days later, the continuation for another year of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, dating from August 24, 1943, was discussed. It was evident that the manner in which the liberty of citizen, undemocratically and objectionally termed "subject," under the 18B Regulation is curtailed, meets with growing dislike in the House of Commons. Mr. Pickthorn, whom I have attacked for his anti-Socialism in the past, but with whom I agree on this matter, said that, next year, some of the House would divide against the Government unless, by then, its intentions for the future were made clear. Mr. Montague, though wanting other restrictions to continue, expressed the opinion, that:—

as soon as we can get back to those fundamental principles of the British Constitution in respect of personal freedom the better. I hope that in priority of abandonment the restoration of personal liberty will take the first place.

Mr. Stokes contended, as he has on other occasions, that it was never the intention of the House that a Regulation should be passed to keep persons without trial under detention for any indefinite period of time, and he added:

Whatever may happen, this House will be held responsible after the war for any injustice that may be proved to have been done to people who have been so detained.

Mr. Stokes referred to special cases, and, as regards Capt. Ramsay, said:

I do not believe that the hon. and gallant Member for Peebles and Southern (Capt. Ramsay) would do anything consciously against the interests of the country. I know he has odd views, but if people are going to be locked up for having odd views, quite a number of Members of this House are in danger. His views about race or religion have nothing to do with whether or not he should be locked up. He was in the last war, and he has three sons in this. However cracked his views may be on one particular point, I do not believe he would do anything contrary to the national interest. I suspect other motives. I should be most interested to hear whether his knowledge of certain telegrams which passed between high officials in this country and America had anything to do with his detention. Other people are detained for the same reason. One was tried under the Official Secrets Act and acquitted on all points but is still detained under the Regulations and, as far as my knowledge of the case goes, for the same reason. My right hon. Friend knows well enough to what I am referring. I think the House is failing in its duty and always has failed in its duty on this point by not demanding that the hon. and gallant Gentleman should come to the House and state his case. Whether he is in a fit state to do it after three years of detention I do not know. Personally, I should not be. I should have measured six feet of earth by now if I had been locked up so long. I do not believe any harm would be done if his whole case was reviewed and his liberty restored.

With respect to Sir Oswald Mosley, Mr. Stokes, backed up in his views later by Mr. Boothby, who also mentioned the case of Admiral Sir Barry Domville, considered that the proper thing to do was either to let him out or shoot him after trial, and there was a flurry in the House when he stated that it had been admitted that no foreign money was coming into the British Union organisation, Mr. Morrison believing that that was a quotation from the private report of the Advisory Committee and so should not be given, whereas Mr. Stokes subsequently quoted Hansard of 10 December, 1940, to prove his assertion.

It is hard to avoid the conclusion that, as stated by Mr. Pickthorn, Ministers have not really made the necessary effort to present to their imaginations the extreme heaviness of the penalty inflicted upon the victims, deserving or undeserving, of 18B. It does require some effort of imagination to bring home to oneself what that situation must be. It seems to me, personally, an infinitely worse fate than death. I would sooner be shot or hanged, with or without trial, than detained for two or three or nobody knows how many years, without charge being made against me, in such circumstances, that I think my existence would be certainly a curse to my children and grandchildren for ever afterwards.

Mr. Morrison in his reply maintained that the Government and the House acted as regards Regulation 18B with their eyes fully open, but he agreed that it was a highly exceptional Regulation, adding:

I do not feel any great sense of pride in administering it.

He explained that cases are reviewed irrespective of whether those detained ask for a review or not, and said:

They are not only periodically reviewed in the Department; they come up to me, and I consider them personally. There have been cases in which one, two or three years ago I would not have authorised release, but where I have thought that, even apart from any change in a man's mind, which sometimes takes place, it was right in the different circumstances to release. There are even persons of very doubtful respectability whom I would not have let out but whom I let out now with some risk, recognising that in present circumstances it is safe to let out people whom I could not let out earlier. I think that is the common sense way of dealing with the matter. I have made many mistakes in letting people out, and I also hope that, broadly speaking, I have not made many mistakes in keeping people in.

At this time, there were 429 persons detained, or 100 fewer than in July, 1942, of whom 286, Mr. Morrison stated, are persons of hostile origin or associations, 55 were concerned in acts prejudicial to the public safety, and 88 were members of the British Union or active in the furtherance of its objects. To describe some of these detainees as "nasty bits of work," as Mr. Morrison did, seems to be going beyond the limits of fairness, for, not knowing to which class of internee it applied, the House could not object. After all, there are some "nasty bits of work" at large.

The opinion has been expressed in some quarters outside the House, and to some extent in the House, that these Regulations are dangerous because they enable people with whose opinions others do not agree to be shut up. This is a most dangerous thing that can come into our consideration of this matter. I would, therefore, invite the attention of my right hon. Friend to this point, and I think he will agree with me. I do not ask him to accept my word, but I gather that these Regulations, including 18B, are intended to deal with those who overtly or covertly act as agents of the enemy and not those who express themselves in favour of any totalitarian system or any form of government foreign to our system. If it were true that they were to be shut up because they were in favour of any totalitarian system or any Constitution foreign to our system, Communists would have to be in prison, including the hon. Member for West Fife (Mr. Gallacher). The right hon. Gentleman himself at the Trade Union Congress accused the Communist Party of being practically in favour of violent revolution in this country. . . .

The only justification for the Regulation is that the people arrested are those who are in some way acting overtly or covertly as agents of the enemy. It is necessary that that should be made clear. Otherwise we should get into a dialectical dilemma; the Home Secretary himself would, because of the speech which he quite properly made the other day at the Labour Party Congress. Even more dangerous statements are being made outside. Many people are suggesting that because a man expresses an opinion in favour of a totalitarian form of government he should be shut up if it is in favour of Fascism but not if it is in favour of Communism. That way lies complete dictatorship. Nothing could be more dangerous. It is a view which is being expressed by the Communist Party, though we could reply, any Socialist or any Tory could reply, "You ought to be shut up too." Another impression is growing up outside.

Before the debate concluded, Commander Sir Archibald Southby referred to the growing apprehension both inside and outside the House of the increase in government by Regulation and by Order, the apprehension of members themselves being evidenced by the greatly increased attendance at each debate on the subject. As regards 18B itself, Commander Southby declared that he himself had never been one of those who wished to do away with it, and he added:

If you can produce for me a man convicted as a traitor to this country, not only will I acquiesce in his execution, but I will be prepared to take a hand in executing him. But I do say that the time has now come to review the way these Regulations work. The most obvious example, in my view, of the danger inherent in this type of legislation lies in the fact, that we, as Members of Parliament, have allowed a Member of this House to be locked up without insisting upon being told why he has been locked up. I conceive that it may be necessary to lock up any or every Member of Parliament, but I have always said—and I adhere to it—that you should not lock up a Member of Parliament and silence his voice without first coming to this House and saying, as could be done in Secret Session, why he was being locked up and giving him the opportunity of standing in his place or at that Bar and defending himself against the charge.

As a matter of fact I believe that, if a sufficient number of Members put down a motion demanding the presence of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Peebles and Southern (Capt. Ramsay) either in his place or at the Bar of this House the Government would have to produce him here so that he could answer the charges against him. It cannot be right that you should silence the voice of a Member of Parliament in this way.

The contribution of Mr. Boothby, however, was noteworthy as being an excellent summary of the position. In the course of his speech he said:—

I intend to deal with Regulation 18B and also with Regulation 20 (a), which in my opinion is even more pernicious; because 20 (a) entitled the Executive to imprison an alien against whom a deportation order may have been made. It may have been made on reasonable grounds, and in time of peace no one questions the right of the Executive to make such an Order; but simply because it is physically impossible to execute the deportation order owing to the fact that there is a world war, the Executive has arrogated to itself the right to imprison the person against whom the deportation order is made. That is a very serious thing. It may have very serious repercussions in the years that lie ahead. It is even more arbitrary than 18B.

In opening this debate the Solicitor-General said that the good faith of the Executive was implied and assumed, and was subject to the review of the High Court if necessary, and if it could be impugned. But nobody denies that the Executive act in good faith. Nobody has suggested that the Home Secretary puts people in prison because he does not like their faces or has some personal spite against them. The fact remains that the High Court of Justice has no power whatsoever in regard to the administration of Regulations 18B or 20 (a). It is known that the High Court judges hate Regulations 18B and 20 (a). There are many cases which I could read out to my right hon. and learned Friend, but he knows them well enough, in which the judges have expressed profound dissatisfaction with them. They do not like them.

Most of the people detained under Regulations 18B and 20 (a) were put there in the supreme emergency of 1940. I still maintain that it was generally thought and assumed by this House that those people were being taken into custody for a comparatively short period of weeks while the supreme emergency lasted; but their detention has now turned into penal servitude for an indefinite period of years, without any right of appeal to any tribunal, public or private. I believe that that is wrong and I will never change my opinion on this point.

What are the concessions for which some of us are asking at the present time, and have asked for every time these Regulations have been debated? They are very moderate concessions. For two years now we have asked the Government to establish a properly constituted legal tribunal sitting in camera; to give these internees a chance of putting their case, and to judge by the results. Let them also be represented by counsel, should they so desire. Above all, allow them to know what the case is against them. It is never a good thing to try a man without charging him; and nobody can say that it is. It is a bad business. But that is what we have done to these people. In nine cases out of ten they have no idea of what they are charged with. They are there, eating their hearts out in doubt and misery; and that is cruel and wrong.

An hon. Member mentioned Sir Oswald Mosley, and I quite agree with much that he said. I would try Sir Oswald Mosley, and if he were found guilty of high treason I would shoot him. Failing that, I think he might do much better work for the country outside prison than in, under whatever surveillance the Home Office may consider necessary. The same goes for a man like Sir Barry Domville. No one can persuade me that a man who was second-in-command to Admiral Tyrwhitt in the last war, was going to do anything but fight the Germans if they landed in this country. He is a man of over 70, with a record of distinguished service to the State. What is the point of keeping that man in prison at the present time? There is also the case of the hon. and gallant Member for Peebles and Southern (Captain Ramsay). I would certainly have had him before some properly constituted tribunal as a Member of this House before committing him to prison. As I have said before, and now repeat, I often wonder what would have been the position of Charles James Fox in this country to-day, if he had been a Member of this House and had made any one of a whole series of speeches that he made during the first Napoleonic War. He would have been in Brixton Prison before he was half way through the first one if the Home Secretary had had anything to do with it. It is not in accordance with the tradition of this country.

The Home Secretary has recently been making speeches in the country about the future organisation of government, and talking of the control of monopolies. So far as monopolies are concerned, I am with him a large part of the way. But I would just say to him that control of the bureaucracy is equally important. And where you get the monopolies and the bureaucracy getting together, that is the greatest danger of all, because we are on the pathway that leads directly to the totalitarian Fascist State.

The House concluded its sitting by extending the Emergency Powers Act for another twelve months. Whether in the meantime these powers can be modified, as suggested by Commander Bower, remains to be seen.

Since this debate, the press has informed us of the death, on active service, of Captain Alec H. R. Ramsay, Scots Guards, eldest son of Captain A. Maule Ramsay, M.P. The father was allowed to attend a memorial service and then returned to Brixton Prison. Alec Ramsay is said to have been a brilliant scholar at Eton where he was head of the "Oppidans." Leaving college he entered the Army, and in this war he served in Norway where he was wounded, but was able to escape by plane. On recovery, in the early spring of 1942, he begged to be transferred from his battalion in order to serve abroad again, and he went through the Libyan campaign, contracting, as a parachutist, from sand in the lungs and exposure the illness from which he died in the Military Hospital, Johannesburg, on the 19th August.

Whilst Earl Winterton cannot be expected to understand economics, or to realise that Stalinism is not Communism, there is point in his argument concerning the operation of 18B.

When the repressive Regulations were introduced, the Communist Party, then anti-war because of its own hireling character, and the existence of a Russia-German Pact, was afraid of being suppressed. So it cried out against legislation it now approves, not from principle, but purely from a mean party political power complex interest; that is, from the standpoint of unprincipled political scoundrelism.

On this point, so that readers may judge for themselves, we reproduce the following article from the columns of the "Daily Worker," for Wednesday, July 3, 1940:—

NEW ANTI-LABOUR REGULATION.

A new Defence Regulation giving the Home Secretary power to suppress certain organisations and to make participation in their activities illegal, has been made by a recent Order in Council.

The new Regulation concerns any organisation which, in the opinion of the Home Secretary, is "subject to foreign influence and control" or of which the officials have, or have had associations or sympathies with the system of government of an enemy country, and which is in danger of being used for purposes prejudicial to the public safety, the defence of the realm, the maintenance of public order, the efficient prosecution of the war, or of the maintenance of essential services.

Such an organisation can be the subject of an order by the Home Secretary, the effect of which will be to make it illegal for any person to summon a meeting of members, attend any such meeting, publish any advertisement of such meeting, enlist support for the organisation, or make or accept any contribution for the organisation.

Any member or creditor of the organisation or the Attorney-General can apply to the Court to wind up the affairs of the organisation and to dispose of its assets. The Court may, if it is satisfied that the organisation is of the kind described in the Regulation, order its funds to be disposed of in any way the Court thinks fit.

GOVERNMENT POLICY.

The new Regulation, 18AA, is in continuation of the Government's policy to invest the Home Secretary with arbitrary powers against persons and organisations which the Government may at any time wish disposed of.

Power to make participation in a political organisation of itself an offence is almost unprecedented in British legal history. The nearest analogy is the early nineteenth century ban on trade unions and the persecution of their members.

In France, of course, it was precisely under such powers as that given to the Home Secretary by Regulation 18AA that the Communist Party was suppressed.

The Regulation was made at a meeting of the Privy Council in Buckingham Palace on June 26. It is not known which Privy Councillors were present.

LABOUR AGREEMENT?

It would be interesting to hear from the Labour Ministers, who are, or have been made, Privy Councillors, whether any of them were present at the June 26 meeting and whether they approved of the new Regulation.

The point is important because the Regulation could quite easily be made to apply to the great trade union and labour organisations of this country, which have always had international connections, and which, in a period when these organisations become "troublesome" to a reactionary Government, may be held to be capable of being used for purposes prejudicial to the "maintenance of public order."

The entire working-class movement is entitled to know whether the Labour members of the Privy Council had any hand in framing or approving of such an anti-Labour Regulation.

It is hoped that the reader has found food for thought in the above few notes but should he be interested in obtaining other information the following literature is recommended to him for his perusal.

Three Conferences and a Speech

By C. H. NORMAN

Recent weeks have been marked by much coming and going on the part of those men in whom the peoples of the Allied Nations have been foolish enough to entrust absolute control of their lives, liberty and property in the past five years. The three dictators, Messrs. Churchill, Stalin and Roosevelt have been meeting in conclave with their Chinese counterpart, the purpose of the various Conferences apparently being to devise means of speeding up the slaughter of their countrymen and those of enemy States in various parts of the world. The Conferences of these major figures was preceded by a preparatory conference of the lesser lights of the various Foreign Offices. In addition that curious person, Field Marshal Jan Smuts, has been taking some months off from his duties as Prime Minister of South Africa for the purpose of informing the world at large what he has to offer as a prophet of things to come. It may be worth while to consider for a few moments the purpose of these mutual genuflections and complimentary barrages.

Perhaps it is a little reckless to refer to the purpose of these Conferences, as the official announcements are so vague and self-destructive when analysed, the one against the other, that not much "purpose" can be discerned in them, except for asserting once more the truth of the Amrican maxim, in its accurate form, on which the whole principle of the government of the United States is based: "That the purpose of statesmanship is to deceive all the people all the time, at a reasonable remuneration to oneself." (Private Papers of President Bunkum of the United States, 1890-1943).

The meeting of foreign secretaries resulted in a statement which was remarkable for its omissions, Poland and France being not referred to, nor Japan. What is the supposed origin of the war? The pact between England and Poland (entered into without the authority of the British people in 1939) whereby Great Britain would assist Poland in the event of a Polish-German War. It was this fact which inspired the ultimatum from Britain to Germany in September, 1939, the rejection of which by Germany led to the European War, and finally to the world war. It is certainly odd that after the war has been proceeding for four years (during which the assistance to be rendered to Poland has not proved particularly successful) a conference of Allied Foreign Secretaries should have been held at which the word Poland is never breathed. The same observations have almost equal force in the case of France, which was dragged into the war by the British Government against the real will or desire of her own statesmen, which was the one fact which emerged at the Riom Trials. France, having been landed in an unholy mess as a result of British policy, is now treated as though her territories may be regarded as satrapies of Britain and the United States. Japan was not mentioned at this Conference to gloss over the awkward fact that all the blandishments of Messrs. Churchill and Roosevelt have so far failed to induce Russia to enter on any joint operations against Japan.

ON THE THRESHOLD, 1944

The next Conference was at Cairo between Messrs. Churchill, Roosevelt and Chiang Kai-Shek, where the absence of any Russian representative made it possible to discuss the dreadful topic of Japan. The announcement was duly made that Japan was to be stripped of all territories which "she has taken by violence and greed." Well, well! These moralists in international politics certainly all come from the stock of Uriah Heep. Did not the United States acquire the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, in the same period in which Japanese conduct is denounced, by 'violence and greed'? Was not the acquisition of the free and independent Boer Republics by Great Britain the result of a policy of "violence and greed"? A contest between strippers and stripped may be the next stage. The Conference produced a vast number of threats and a good quantity of humbug, but not much else. Certainly one may wonder as a humble taxpayer where the value for the money spent comes in, as it is the taxpayer who has to pay for these jaunts, at which the various meeting gentlemen (and ladies) contrive to do themselves well and their countries rather badly. These gentlemen are so sensitive of their value to their countries that, on this occasion, the correspondents recorded that they met "behind guns" and the ordinary business of the "locus in quo" was entirely suspended at their pleasure. It is a curious form of democratic activity. The facts rather remind one of the activities of Alexander, Tamerlane and Attila.

The next Conference was held at Teheran, the capital of Persia or Iran, a country which was driven into the war as a result of a conspiracy in which the Shah was forced from his throne by an Anglo-American occupation of the country. The only concrete result was a declaration that the independence of Iran was a matter upon which the governments of the United States, the U.S.S.R. and the United Kingdom were "at one." The cynic might ask, since when? Persia has been harassed by the Russian and British Governments steadily for thirty years to the writer's knowledge, while its most valuable economic asset, oil, has been entirely exploited for the benefit of everyone except the Persians. It was perhaps necessary to make this declaration in view of the fact that the invasion of Persia by Messrs. Churchill, Stalin and Roosevelt was accompanied by the following inconveniences to the Persian citizen: "Every frontier was closed; every plane was ordered to stay on the ground; all road transport, except that needed to carry food, was stopped." Considering the state of distress in Persia, under the Anglo-Russian occupation, perhaps one may wonder whether the exception did not prove the rule on this occasion! "The Daily Herald" account (December 7, 1943) proceeded: "Travelling on the railways was forbidden; no telegrams were allowed to be sent abroad; the radio station was off the air." It would seem that only the Persians were not "at home" in Teheran during that conference period. The declaration of concern for Persian independence was a little overdue from these three paragons of democratic principle. The general announcement at the end of the conference did not add any information on the two points on which the world was naturally curious: whether Russia was going to lend her aid in the struggle against Japan, or return to China the territories taken from that country in the past by "violence and greed." Otherwise, one is told that the Conference was "roses, roses, all the time." There are certain pieces of Persian wisdom (from Omar Khayyam) which seem more applicable to this Conference than any other kind of comment, but politeness forbids quotation of the apt passages.

The final Conference (till the next one) was held in Cairo at which the Churchill-Roosevelt spiders invited the Turkish fly into the Allied parlour. Whether the Turkish fly has escaped intact from the web in which it is apparently the wish of the United States and Britain to entangle it, only time can tell; but there are signs that something has gone wrong with this piece of artful dodgery. The Turks are in a rather unhappy position, surrounded as they are by states whose sole purpose for decades has been the "maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire," with the odd result that large parts of that Empire (perhaps as a consequence of the policy of "violence and greed," and perhaps not)—have fallen under the control of those so concerned with "upholding the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire." Certainly, situate between such well-known international philanthropists as Great Britain, Russia, Germany and the United States, a certain skill will be required by the Turks to retain for themselves such few portions of "Turkish delight" as their quondam friends have left them for their own enjoyment.

Amid all this conferring, Field Marshal Jan Smuts let slip some of the real policy behind the facade of international make-believe represented by the names, Atlantic Charter, Hot Springs, U.N.R.R.A., A.M.G.O.T. and the rest of the gibberish of the Allied and Associated nations. Field Marshal Smuts told the Empire Parliamentary Association that "France has gone; Italy has completely disappeared; Germany will disapnear." Their substitutes apparently will be Russia, Great Britain and the United States. Japan was not mentioned. Even the Field Marshal did not venture on prophecy there, having already compromised himself heavily in that regard in past utterances. It is well to recall that the Field Marshal was the gentleman who had the bright idea of proposing at the Versailles Conference in 1919 that Germany should pay by way of one item in indemnity and reparations the whole cost to the Allies of all the pensions for dependants of killed and for their wounded soldiers! He was also the gentleman who so mishandled the military operations in East Africa in the 1914-1918 war that he was recalled by General Botha who told him that "he was not a soldier, but a politician." He has indulged in numerous prophecies about the course of the war, and he is believed, with Mr. Churchill, to be the person responsible for getting the British armies bogged in the mountainous areas of Italy. One can well believe this as it is of a piece with the military incompetence he has exhibited throughout his life, even though he has become (like the late Lord Haig) a Field Marshal.

One word about another prophet, Marshal Stalin. He told the world in May 1942 that the Germans would be driven out of Russia by the end of the year. He repeated the same statement in May 1943. He authorised the issue of a statement on June 22nd, 1942, that the Germans had suffered ten million casualties in the first year of the Russo-German War. In June 1943, he authorised the issue of a statement that, in the two years of the Russo-German War, the German casualties amounted to 6,375,000, so that in a year the Germans had a net gain of three and a half million men! By the end of 1944 (when General Smuts asserts "Victory will be in the pocket") at this rate, the Germans will gain another three and a half million on 1942!

The end of this war is like the receding carrot before the unfortunate donkey's nose; it is always "next" Christmas. There are certain features about the war which remind one of the characters of "Alice in Wonderland." One might safely cast Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt for the parts of "Tweedledum and Tweedledee," Marshal Chiang Kai Shek for "The Mad Hatter," and Marshal Stalin for the double role of "The Walrus and the Carpenter." But heaven protect their unhappy subjects from their activities in the coming year. The only prophecy the writer has made about the war was that its length would exceed the length of the war of 1914-18, a prophecy now unhappily justified by the event. He can only add the words of the old song: "Christmas never comes," in relation to the end of this war, while under the control and conduct of the present Allied leaders, generals and admirals.

Perhaps the invocation of characters from "Alice in Wonderland" is too delicate for these sombre times. A truer parallel may be taken from "Sardonic Tales," by Villiers de Lisle Adam, who satirised the characters of European statesmen in his studies of Baron Bottom, the inventor of "The Glory Machine," in Professor Schneitzoeffer, the inventor of "The Apparatus for the Chemical Analysis of the Last Breath," and, more appropriately to these times, is his study of the sinister millionaire who perambulated Europe in the early days of the nineteenth century bribing executioners so that he might substitute them at their grim task and indulge in the sadistic pleasure of operating the guillotine in France. These modern statesmen, smiling at each other across well-loaded dinner tables, while their subjects so often starve, might reflect on the ruin they have already wrought on the peoples they are supposed to rule in faith and in equity, and might wonder whether it has been worth while expending so much energy to secure for certain a place, in Villiers de Lisle Adams' famously bitter phrase, among the "dilettanti" of Torture.

There is one final question which commonsense would put at this stage of the war when the phrase "the plebiscite of the democracy" is being so much bandied about. The peoples of Europe (the United States, Russia, China, Japan and India seem excluded from this boon) are offered after the war a free choice of government by plebiscite on a democratic basis. Suppose the inhabitants of Jugo-Slavia, Italy, France, Germany and Bulgaria vote for a return of the Fascist or Nazi system of government. What then? Is the free plebiscite to be set on one side. If so, that is an end of freedom of choice in the form of government desired. If the result of the plebiscite is accepted, then the whole purpose of the war, which is alleged to be the complete overthrow of Fascist and Nazi dictators (though Communist and Capitalist dictators are quite acceptable in Russia, the United States and China) will be nullified, and Europe will be back at the political state of 1939! It is an interesting dilemma on which the "democrats" have so far maintained a stony silence, though it is well to recollect that all the European plebiscites held after the war of 1919 went in favour of Germany.

Finally, as Japan is to be called upon to make reparation for the undoubted suffering inflicted on the Chinese people, may one ask whether Great Britain is also going to join in this orgy of repentance by making reparation for the undoubted suffering inflicted upon China during the infamous Opium Wars, during the Boxer Rising, through the seizure of Hong Kong and other Chinese ports and through her aid in suppressing the Communist movement in China in 1924 and onwards? If not, why choose Japan as the only occupant for the stool of the sinner? Merely another piece of humbug one may suppose, a commodity whose manufacture seems as extensive in this war as that of all the other munitions of war.

New Humanist Minister

Our comrade, the Rev. C. H. Cole, minister of the High Street Unitarian Chapel, Kingston Crescent, North End, Portsmouth, has been ordained a minister of the Humanist Society of Friends. Mr. Cole joins the ranks of the many Unitarian ministers who have become ministers of the Humanist Society without leaving the Unitarian Pulpit and so have served to bring Unitarianism into line with the radical and progressive concept advanced by W. J. Fox in England when he founded the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at South Place Chapel in London, and by Theodore Parker, when he established his own independent pulpit at West Roxbury, Mass., U.S.A. Fox's approach has proven more radical and more useful to humanity even than Parker's.

Readers will recall the biography of Mr. Cole that appeared in these columns for September, 1942. This illustrated record recounted Comrade Cole's experiences in the war of 1914-18 as a member of the N.Z. Expeditionary Force, and described his Socialist and Pacifist post-war activity in New Zealand. We reproduced his pulpit renunciation of war.

Next month we shall publish Mr. Cole's Humanist Confession of Faith, specially written for "The Word." This declaration will appear subsequently in United States Unitarian journals favourable to Humanism and the establishment of a Humanist Federation, embracing Unitarian and Ethicist Pulpits.

TO READERS.

During 1943 many comrades showed their appreciation of our work by financial sacrifices and support. We take this opportunity of expressing our gratitude. Our correspondence is heavy and it is not possible always to write to comrades. Our appreciation of the loyalty shown in these days of crisis is none the less sinfficere.

Many comrades grow impatient when their MSS. are not published. We are overset very much every month and sacrifice our own essays constantly. Please do not send MSS. unless you are willing to be patient and to run the risk of losing the copy sent. Take the risk and in time your MSS. will be published most likely. Our desire is to afford every comrade the opportunity of being heard. Since this office is a combined Public Assistance, Poor Man's Lawyer and Free Advice Bureau, as well as a publisher's office, we cannot give guarantees: and we do not want to make personal enemies of comrades should we happen to lose some MSS. That is all.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH

By the Rev.
F. H. AMPHLETT MICKLEWRIGHT, M.A.

There is always an exhilaration to be gained by watching a fight in which one of the combatants is a strong man struggling against heavy odds. The struggle becomes more intense when the strong man is one who has cultivated both his mind and the ways of the world; it is more vital when the cause is a challenge to the whole round of conventional opinion. At such a time, the conventions are struggling to maintain a hold which has weakened through the gradual failure of rational sanction; the attack will bring them finally to the ground. The long round of battles fought during the later Victorian days by Charles Bradlaugh were struggles of this type between a strong and determined man, possessing gifts far above the average and a somewhat shallow series of conventions in both religion and politics which had riveted themselves upon English life. The name of Bradlaugh has become but a shadow to-day; the number of people is becoming very small and very old who can remember him as he moved about the country or who were thrilled as they heard the voice of the great orator. Yet there was a time when Charles Bradlaugh possessed a voice which could lead the men of Lancashire and Yorkshire or the Durham pitmen to struggle for liberty against oppression. If, to the timid and conventional, his name once suggested something very akin to Antichrist himself, he was highly valued by those who understood his true worth and the work which he had done. Once a spurned outcast, Bradlaugh died as the respected Member of Parliament for Northampton; the day after his funeral, Mr. Gladstone himself paid high tribute in the House of Commons to the memory of a man whom he described as one of the most valued members of the assembly. The work which he did would have filled several normal lives; his activities ranged over many fields. Charles Bradlaugh was a remarkable man and one of whom any country might well be proud. He strove to give to his fellow-men liberty and justice. To this end, he sought to liberate minds from superstition and bodies from useless toil. If some of his views do seem out of date to-day, it is because they succeeded in making advances sufficient to render later progress possible. Bradlaugh was, for example, no Socialist; he remained a firm believer in individualism and in old-fashioned radicalism; he was opposed to unionism and co-operation. From one standpoint, this might suggest that his political and social approach has no value for to-day; it is all too easy to forget that contemporary approaches, designed to build up a living working-class movement which shall overthrow the remaining remnants of oppression, owe their present potency to the pioneer work of such men as Bradlaugh over sixty years ago.

Born on September 26th, 1833, Charles Bradlaugh had a hard boyhood. His home was at Hoxton in the sweltering wastes of bricks and mortar which make up East London; his father was a small lawyer's clerk whose income was never more than a pittance. The son left school at an early age and found work with the firm which also employed his father. On Sundays, he attended St. Peter's Church, Hackney Road, and he was reared in the strict tenets of the Church of England. It was this fact which was to alter the whole life of the youth. He was a Sunday School teacher and was being prepared for confirmation. The vicar, the Rev. Graham Packer, instructed him to fit himself by gaining a knowledge of the Gospels and their contents; the youth of sixteen was not the first to be struck by the inconsistencies and difficulties inherent in the narrative. He wrote a long and courteous letter to Mr. Packer and asked him to explain the many improbabilities which the orthodox view of religion contains. The reply of the vicar was characteristic of his class; he was suspended from the Sunday School; he denounced him to his father as possessing dangerous infidel tendencies illustrated by a leaning to teetotalism; he brought into being a petty persecution at home. Young Bradlaugh, cut off from his church associates, and unwilling to attend service during his suspension, drifted on Sundays to Bonner's Fields, then a popular forum, where he listened to the open-air speakers. He was soon to learn that the religious views of Mr. Packer would not stand a moment's examination in the light of knowledge, common-sense, or ascertained fact. His refusal to repent exasperated Mr. Packer; he consulted Bradlaugh's father, a fellow-fanatic, and together they made life so unbearable for the young man that he left home and employment for good. Bradlaugh's strong atheism, which remained with him for life, was in part the outcome of reflection and study but in part it was also the legacy of the treatment which he had received from his father and the vicar of St. Peter's, Hackney Road. The outcome of their work serves as a warning against a mistaking of ignorance, bigotry and folly for the will of God; the real foes of religion in every age are religious fanatics or mere conventional bigots.

Young Bradlaugh made an ineffective attempt to earn his living as a coal-merchant. He would have starved had he not been protected by the widow of an old freethinker, Richard Carlile. This remarkable man, whose life-work was to win for his countrymen the freedom of the press, left a determined fellow-warrior in Elizabeth Sharples Carlile. Poor though she was herself, she took pity on the friendless young man and allowed him to eat at her table. It saved him from the gutter to which the Rev. Graham Packer and his father sought to bring him although he was still unable to earn a living. His best customer for coals, a baker's wife, left him when she heard that he was an infidel; her excuse being that the bread might smell of brimstone! They were hard years but they had one effect; Bradlaugh learned to express himself freely and fluently. He took part in debates upon religion and politics, sharpening his viewpoints and his wit. But life was difficult; he could see no prospect of settling a trifling debt which he had incurred. As a result, he enlisted in order to obtain the money and was, for three years, a private in the Dragoon Guards.

His fellow-recruits started by ragging him; they ended by respecting his exact knowledge and stand for liberty. Bradlaugh had now started his life-struggle for the rights of man; it was this fight which maintained him through his army days. Drafted to Ireland, he strove against all that made for oppression. When the captain of the troopship tried to cheat the recruits of money for some work which he had got them to do, it was young Bradlaugh who stood up to him and got the money from him by dint of threatening to write to "The Times"! The incident was characteristic of later days, though then the threat would have been one of a writ or a summons. An impertinent army chaplain remarked that the soldiers would not understand his sermon; it was Bradlaugh who staged a demonstration which prevented the parson from making any further remark of this sort. In Ireland, Bradlaugh learned of the depressed nature of the Irish peasantry. He saw the extent to which the woes of the country were caused by absentee landlordism and repressive politics. His genuine sympathy for the Irish was never lost; years later, as an English Member of Parliament, he strove for home rule on behalf of the unhappy people. He also became a strong convert to the temperance movement, frequently breaking bounds to give teetotal lectures in a Dublin hall. The sight of an Irish eviction was written on his mind; many years after, he was to repeat the story in the House of Commons. When a small legacy from an aunt enabled him to purchase his discharge, Bradlaugh left the army and returned to England. It might be thought that his army years were wasted, yet it was not so. They meant a widening of experience and of knowledge which was soon to stand him in very good stead. Bradlaugh left the army as a convinced radical and republican; the last vestiges of a somewhat noisy and reactionary patriotism—the creed of Mr. Packer and his father—were dissipated from his mind.

Back in London, the young man obtained work as a lawyer's clerk. It was in this occupation that he gathered an exact and far-reaching knowledge of law. Although he never qualified, Bradlaugh was one of the best lay-lawyers of his day and a figure to be feared when the argument of a law-court had to be faced. He became well-known at this time as a public lecturer. When his own experiences are recalled, it is not to be expected that he would have much patience or sympathy with traditional Christianity. It had made Mr. Packer a bigot and his father a fanatic; it had ruined his boyhood; it imprisoned men's minds and drew off attention from social advance. Bradlaugh opened war upon religious superstition; he gave a forward impetus to the secularist movement which sought to build up the earth in the light of reason as a place where happiness might prevail. Becoming the President of the National Secular Society, he occupied the position for many years and he founded several papers to express his views. After one or two abortive journalistic efforts, he brought into being the "National Reformer" which, until his death, was to be the main medium for his propaganda. Atheistic, radical, republican, it represented the views of many English working men for over a generation. Bradlaugh wrote a number of pamphlets and books; they were designed to assist in overthrowing the colossal superstitions of mankind. It may be felt that he did not succeed; he is dead whilst the church has gone on. In part this is true but ecclesiasticism has gone on with wings clipped and claws pared. Its monstrous interference with social life and its stranglehold over education have alike been broken for good. Light has entered men's minds and ecclesiastical theology could not stand against it. Looking back over the years, it is not Bradlaugh who has failed in the intellectual contest. Many of the views on the Bible, on creeds or on dogmas, for which he strove almost a century ago, are commonplaces to-day. In the same spirit he took to politics. Bradlaugh realised that many people throughout the world were unhappy and that it was due to certain causes. Empire-building and imperialism could only lead to the exploitation of subject-peoples; large profit could only end in the general oppression of the working-classes; militarism could only bring war in its train. His voice was heard upon many a London platform; it was always on the side of justice and liberty. When the typical episcopal utterances of those days upon such subjects as war, unemployment, or imperialism are recalled, the voice of Bradlaugh stands in sharp contrast as one raised for the noblest ideals against the selfish spirit of grab and oppression which has always characterised reactionary political parties. When the battles of to-day come to be remembered, it will be possible to trace in the progressive efforts now being made something of the spirit which characterised the political work of Charles Bradlaugh eighty years ago.

Bradlaugh had his troubles and trials; the bigots never left him alone; they sought to entangle him in prosecutions for blasphemy and to ruin him by vexatious litigation. In spite of their efforts, Bradlaugh made several of their best-known leaders sadder and poorer men when they got to the law-courts! His wife, to whom he was devoted, became a drunkard; it was one of Bradlaugh's bitterest griefs which he hid for many years beneath a noble silence. There were days of poverty and struggle, misrepresentation and every conceivable attack was made at his expense. But he strove on and fought numerous battles; one of the bitterest fights taking place in 1877 when he struggled for the liberty of the press by himself issuing a pamphlet on the population question which the authorities were trying to ban. Bradlaugh might have been ruined by the litigation, but he won his battle. He had previously fought a great legal fight concerning the stamp-tax on newspapers and had placed the authorities in a position where they were forced to repeal an obsolete tax which prevented the free spread of knowledge among the working classes.

As the years went by, various warriors for freethought stood at Bradlaugh's side. Austin Holyoake, brother of a famous pioneer in the co-operative movement, died in 1874, but he had been enabled to assist Bradlaugh in numerous struggles. For many years Mrs. Annie Besant was a comrade-in-arms. The wife of a Church of England vicar in Lincolnshire, she had been driven to part from her husband owing to her unorthodox theological views. During a long period she assisted Bradlaugh by pen and speech. It was a bitter sorrow to her when her husband, assisted by the Bishop of Lincoln, brought a legal action which tore her two children from her care owing to professed theological unbelief. The suffering and misery thereby caused provided Christian England with an edifying and worthy spectacle! It is interesting that both children left the vicarage to return to their mother's roof as soon as they were free to do so. The later career of Mrs. Besant caused Bradlaugh some perplexity. He was unable to understand why she should desert radicalism for socialism; he was still more astounded by her later rejection of materialism and atheism in favour of the occultist cobwebs of the Theosophical Society. It is interesting, however, that Mrs. Besant, whose future career lay in very different fields, never ceased till her death in 1929 to speak in terms of respect and affection for her old chief of the days when the future theosophical leader was a propagandist for radicalism and freethought upon the platforms of Lancashire and Yorkshire.

The last fight was perhaps the bitterest of all. In 1880, Charles Bradlaugh was elected after several efforts as Member of Parliament for Northampton. Upon assuming his seat, he asked leave to affirm instead of taking an oath which implied belief in the existence of a Supreme Being. The right had been conceded to Quakers for a long while, but it was refused to Bradlaugh. He then asked to have the oath administered as a matter of form. This concession was also refused on account of his declared atheism. Bradlaugh joined issue, the more so because theological and political bigotry inflamed the partisanship. He was nobly supported by his fellow-member for Northampton, Mr. Labouchere, whilst he was warmly denounced by Lord Randolph Churchill who cited Bradlaugh's republican book, "The Impeachment of the House of Brunswick," as a reason for violating democratic principles by unseating a duly elected representative. Atheism was hotly debated in Parliament as an excuse for breaking down constitutional election, one pious member asserting that "we all believe in a sort of something somewhere" and becoming angry when Bradlaugh ridiculed this aspect of religious faith! Unseated and re-elected in subsequent bye-elections, Bradlaugh's battle went on till 1884. On one occasion, he appeared in the House of Commons and administered the oath to himself, being supported by John Bright and Tommy Burt, the Unitarian miner's labour member from Northumberland. Outside the House, Bradlaugh had the warm support and sympathy of, among others, a noted Unitarian divine, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. The two men had met in a public debate over religious questions at Nottingham in 1877. However much they differed concerning abstract theology, they then acquired a genuine and lasting respect for each other which later struggles did much to cement. When Bradlaugh died and orthodox religion, with usual charity, preserved a stony silence, words of heartening cheer were spoken by Mr. Armstrong in Hope Street Church, Liverpool. The brave Unitarian leader saw in the dead atheist a kindred spirit in the service of man and his true liberty.

The parliamentary battle was won in 1884 when a new Speaker insisted upon administering the oath in spite of Tory protest, whatever Bradlaugh's speculative religious views might be. A few reactionary members were bent upon making further trouble but they were prevented when an Affirmation Bill, supported by such notable Liberals as Gladstone and John Morley, was passed to regularise the situation. Bradlaugh had still six years of active labour but the battles had told upon him. His daughter, Hypatia, who did so much for her father's memory by carrying on his work, relates how he entered upon the parliamentary struggle as a man of middle age with vigour and strength. When it ended, he was old and weary. Bradlaugh did much useful work in Parliament. His attention was called to India and he undertook many issues of importance for the solution of its problems. He sought to forward his radical cause; freedom of thought and of speech always found in him a friend. He fought against the forbidding of public political meetings in Trafalgar Square to the Socialists with whom, in fact, he disagreed as he had once, long before, striven against the closing of Hyde Park to a public demonstration when he won a great victory. Bradlaugh still lectured publicly upon problems of politics and religion but those who heard him realised that their old leader was tired and that his battles had exhausted him. Living in modest circumstances in St. John's Wood, he still maintained his Hall of Science in Old Street as the centre of his propaganda. But the end was now very near. One illness followed upon another; ill-health was aggravated by the handling which he had received from the police when he was ejected from the House of Commons during the height of the parliamentary struggle. Gradually unconsciousness came on and Bradlaugh could never know his greatest victory. Various censures against him were recorded upon the minutes of the House of Commons as a part of the general record of the oath controversy. For some while, Bradlaugh had been moving to secure their revocation. When the news reached the House that Bradlaugh was dying, Dr. Hunter proposed that these votes should be expunged from the journals as a token of the high respect and esteem in which the member for Northampton was held. The old Tory orthodox and political bigotry raised its voice once more in the person of Sir Edward Clarke but he was swept aside in disgust by Mr. W. H. Smith as leader of the House. The vote was all but unanimous; it was a tragedy that Bradlaugh himself, now quite unconscious, could not know of it before he passed away at the early age of fifty-seven on January 30th, 1891. He was buried at Brookwood, at his own request no form of "service" marked the funeral. But great crowds came to pay a last tribute beside the open grave, and among the distinguished visitors was Mr. John Morley. On the next day, Mr. Gladstone, as a churchman, made high mention in the House of Commons of one for whom he had come to feel a genuine affection. Bradlaugh died in debt; it was not his fault but the work of those who had forced him to find large sums of money for legal expenses. The debts were defrayed by the sale of his extensive library.

There is much that may be learned still from Bradlaugh's life and work. If the spirit of God means the spirit of life welling up in nature and in man, God had no truer servant than Charles Bradlaugh, whatever his speculative opinions might have been. He was the stern disciple of truth, as much as any Hebrew prophet of old; it was this determination to serve the truth which led him to make such strong and unyielding attacks upon the intellectual untruthfulness and mental dishonesty which too often does service for religion. Bradlaugh believed in the spirit of man; his belief did not turn him into a sentimentalist but it moulded him into a strong politician and a determined radical. He did not believe in empire-building because it made for the degradation of the spirit of man among Afghans and Zulus. He did not believe in the blasphemy against the spirit of man which was implied by long hours and low wages. He did not believe that man was honoured and made free by the servitude and regimentation of the militaristic method. He did not believe that man is liberated if his mind still be in fetters to decayed creeds and dead dogmas. Bradlaugh strove for the liberty and freedom of man: those who believe in these things still owe him a great debt. It is interesting that many of his anti-religious battles were caused by the blatant manner in which the orthodox churches supported imperialism, war, exploitation, superstition, and all that makes for the degradation of mankind. However much they may have hated and scorned his name, Bradlaugh sought higher and nobler aims for man than have many of the churches. Perhaps the best tribute that can be paid to his memory is to continue his work. Reformers of to-day must strive for the freedom of man, for liberty of conscience, for the overthrow of superstition, for the exposure of religion when it is used as a cloak beneath which selfish exploitation or corrupt and reactionary politics carry out their sway. It was this fact which made Bradlaugh a bitter opponent both of the Church of England and the other orthodox churches; his tradition of battle for liberty must still be carried on though under different circumstances and in a different age to that which he knew.

GUY ALDRED AT OPEN FORUM

"THE CHURCH, WAR AND PEACE"

Guy Aldred was the speaker at an Open Forum meeting in Lesser Town Hall on Sunday evening. Mr. W. E. Currie presided over a good attendance and introduced the speaker, whom he had known for many years. Aldred, he said, despite much personal suffering and persecution as a result of his anti-militarist activities, still remained true to his principles. In opposing the present war he did so with the same courage and fearlessness as in the years 1914-18.

Mr. Aldred took as his subject "The Church, The War, and Peace," and compared the early Christian Church with the Church of to-day. The former, originally the church of the common people, had since passed through various stages until to-day it was merely a part of the capitalist system of society and dominated by vested interests. It was, therefore, no surprise to find the church supporting a war that was spreading death and destruction among the common people.

At Christmas, the time of "peace on earth, goodwill to all men," the usual sermons would be preached blessing the righteousness of our cause, while bearers of "glad tidings" in the shape of 1000 lb. bombs would carry the message of goodwill. And when it was all over and peace for the moment restored it would be said of the Church—"Well done, thou true and faithful servant."

Following Mr. Aldred's address questions were put and satisfactorily answered, and members of the audience contributed to the discussion.

On October 5, 1940, at the height of the air-raids on London, the Communist Party Central Committee published a resolution in the course of which it stated :—

The Labour Party, in which millions in the past placed their hope to lead to Socialism, has failed the people. The Labour Ministers in the Government, the Bevins, Attlees and Morrisons, are the main support of the rule of reaction, of the Churchills, Chamberlains and Andersons, of the Tory machine and the war profiteers. They are united with the Tories on every issue of policy.

Under their leadership the local machinery of the Labour Movement has been paralysed, put out of action or distorted to the service of capitalism and the war machine. The air war has exposed their complete abandonment of the interests of the people. They bear the responsibility for the refusal of the bomb-proof shelters which the Communist Party demanded, and which could have saved the lives of those now dead. . . .

Their path leads to Fascism, to the same type of regime as the Nazi regime in Germany. . . .

For months during this period the Communist Party were busy organising through the Daily Worker and in other ways the "People's Convention." John Strachey, at one time very closely connected with the Communist Party but later denounced by them, wrote of the Convention in the Tribune on January 10, 1941 :

For it is as certain as that the sun will rise tomorrow that the People's Convention is an Anti-War movement, and that its activities are expressly designed to interfere with our complete victory over Fascism.

The word "democracy" had a great deal of lip service paid to it but there was nothing democratic about the Convention. The names of the Standing Orders Committee were all moved from the platform, and all the speakers were selected by that Committee.

During this period the Communist Party did everything it could to sabotage what it now terms the war-effort against Fascism. Here are some typical headlines from the Daily Worker :

4,000 to Take Holidays in Aid of Aircraft Men.—August 17, 1940.

Sound Sirens or We Don't Work.—August 19, 1940.

Making Prisons of Our Factories. — January 3, 1941.

They Promise Us Greater Hardship in 1941.—January 4, 1941.

Strike in Reply to Attack on Convention.—January 6, 1941.

Hunger, Disease and Death.—January 7, 1941.

Another "Prison Diet" Week-end.—January 10, 1941.

4,000 Aircraft Men Win Big Gains in Strike.—January 17, 1941.

The technique was simple but effective. The paper was a mass of criticism and of grievances exploited to the full. Wherever possible, an anti-British anti-war twist was given. British losses and set-backs, military and political, were emphasised. Doubt was thrown on British claims, and Nazi claims were emphasised. Strong backing was given to policies or action which would slow down the British war output. No single piece of Nazi propaganda in Britain was so effective as the Daily Worker. This propaganda proceeded from no principle, no anti-militarist hatred of war, no sense of humanitarian horror. It was simply allegiance to the Soviet dictatorship and its Nazi alliance.

On January 21, 1941, the Daily Worker was suppressed. A debate followed in the House of Commons. On January 29, 1941, the Manchester Guardian, commenting on the debate, declared that the position of the Daily Worker was not "that of a sincere but roughly spoken critic of the Government." It added that the Daily Worker exploited the suffering of war, as in the "Communists" approach to the people of bombed cities, formented trouble in the Forces and the factories unrelated to any principles and so resorted to "forms of sabotage of the war effort" that justified "the use of urgent if sharp measures." The Guardian pointed out that it would have preferred a judicial process against the Communists and also against the interned Fascists.

We do not believe in either suppression or internment without trial, even in war-time. But we agree with the Manchester Guardian's comment on the policy and activity of the Communist Party.

As stated earlier in this article, Hitler extended his war to the East and launched a sudden attack upon the U.S.S.R. The same day Churchill pledged the British Government's support of the U.S.S.R. He declared that "any man or State who fights against Nazism will have our aid. Any man or State who marches with Hitler is our foe."

On June 23, 1914, the Communist Party issued its Manifesto on the new situation. It made no reference to Hitler's attacks upon Poland, Denmark, Norway, Belgium, Luxembourg, Greece, and Yugo-Slavia. All these invasions it had justiced, explained in the terms of war, or blamed on to the British Labour leaders, headed by Morrison and Bevin. But it isolated the attack on the Soviet Union from these other attacks and declared it to be a crime. It said nothing about the criminal Nazi-Soviet Moscow Pact which set the war going. It made no reference to the criminal Nazi-Soviet partition of Poland. Indeed, the Communist Party, in this statement, blamed the British Government and the Labour Ministers for the invasion of the Soviet Union. Here is the June 23, 1941, statement :—

"Hitler's attack against the Socialist Soviet Union is Fascism's supreme aggression against the people of the world.

The cause of the Soviet Union is the cause of the working people all over the world, of freedom, of Socialism.

Hitler's attack will be resisted and defeated by the common action of the working people in all countries in solidarity with the Red Army, Navy, and Air Force of the Soviet workers.

This attack is the sequel of the secret moves which have been taking place behind the curtain of the Hess mission. . . .

We can have no confidence in the present Government dominated by Tory friends of Fascism and Coalition Labour leaders, who have already shown their stand by their consistent anti-Soviet slander campaigns."

The Communists were not sure what they should say. They hadn't yet received instructions from Moscow. But they did execute another complete turn-coat act.

In May, 1942, the Churchill Government concluded the Anglo-Soviet Treaty of Alliance with the U.S.S.R. Stalin declared that it marked "an historic turning point in the relations between our country and Great Britain."

By July, 1942, the Communists had completely changed their position on two important issues. No longer did they call for the end of "Labour Party collaboration with the Government." On the contrary they insisted that Labour should remain in the Government.

If the Labour Party approves — as I believe it overwhelmingly does—the Government's main policy of alliance with the Soviet Union and the U.S.A. for the defeat of Hitler, then it cannot withdraw its members from the Government.

This extract is taken from the Communist Party Pamphlet "Labour's Way Forward," written by Emile Burns.

The emphatic view was expressed :

Nothing could more weaken Labour's position, more submerge its identity among the "independent" groups which represent everything from sheer muddled thinking to personal careerism and even defeatism, nothing could more silence its authoritative voice in the councils of the nation, than if it abandoned its direct share of responsibility in the government of the country at this supreme crisis.

But the Communist Party had changed its mind also on the question of the Electoral Truce. No longer did they demand an end to the truce—"the shameful alliance of Labour leaders with the leaders of capitalims." It had become all in favour of the truce and wanted candidates chosen by agreement between Tory, Liberal, Labour, Communist and non-Party organisations in constituencies.

The authority already argued that "for Labour to fight by-elections where the Government candidate is a Tory, is not the way forward."

The Labour man or woman who votes for a Government candidate who is a Tory is not voting for Toryism, any more than a Tory elector voting for a Government candidate who is Labour is voting for Socialism. This is not the issue before the electors. The votes are cast for the Government, for national unity in the Allied fight against Hitlerism.

Another example of the Communist Party's hypocritical inconsistency is furnished by their blatant switch of attitude towards the Colonial peoples.

In 1940, when the Communist Party was opposing the war, it said :—

"The Colonial peoples see in this crisis of Imperialism at war the downfall of the British Empire. . . . They see it with joy and confidence of liberation by their own unity and mass strength."

But in August, 1941, after Hitler had attacked Soviet Russia, the Communist Party issued this statement :—

"It is felt that if the Nazis won this war then it would mean the most brutal enslavement of all he Colonial peoples. We must see that nothing stands in the way of all parts of the Empire co-operating with Britain and Russia in defeating the common enemy."

The complete contradiction of these two statements is so obvious as hardly to need comment. First, defeat of Britain would mean liberation for the Colonial peoples; later, defeat of Britain would mean the "most brutal enslavement of all the Colonial peoples."

Never in the history of British politics has any organised group calling itself a national party been guilty of such a shameful record of interested, calculated, hypocritical inconsistency and insincerity. That record was built up by slavish obedience to an external superior authority (the Communist International) whose instructions were obligatory and whose instructions were obeyed.

If the "Communists" had been successful in their anti-war, pro-"peace," anti-Labour disunity activities between October, 1939, and June, 1941, the working class of Britain and of every other country in Europe, according to their present pro-war policy and argument, to-day would be enslaved in Hitler's "New Order."

The conclusion from these facts is inevitable. No section of the Labour or Socialist movement, reformist or revolutionary, Anarchist or Collectivist, reluctantly believing in Capitalist Militarist alliance for the armed destruction of Fascism or avowedly anti-militarist and believing in the revolutionary struggle against Fascism, should associate with or recognise the Communist Party. The Labour Party's 1943 continued refusal of affiliation should be applauded and endorsed, for the Communist Party merely wants to capture the machinery for its own party-power purposes, and anti-working class dictatorship activity. "Communists" have no principles. Nothing emphasises this fact better than the shameful and shameless War Record outlined in this article. Even as a war party, anxious for a Second Front, against every kind of strike, the Communist Party has no loyalty to the War Government it protends to support.

THIS MARCH OF HOMICIDE

And other studies in War Diplomacy, Politics and Economics

By Sir WALTER STRICKLAND, Bart, B.A.

Sir Walter Strickland, famous 9th Baronet, discarded his title because of his Republican views. Anticipating the World War, three years before his death in 1938 he endeavoured to evolve a plan to avert the sacrifice of youth to what he termed "This March of Homicide" or "The Extinction of Mankind." His last letter from the Dutch East Indies, where he settled and died, after living in almost every country in the world, is reproduced, and also some glimpses are given of the romance of his travels. Strickland was a great scholar and linguist. He translated from Russian, Czech, Chinese, Spanish, Italian, Marathi, etc. Read this interesting work of prose and verse, with the translations of Czech "Evening Songs."

WHY I AM AN ABSOLUTIST

The Bold Statement made before the Conscientious Objectors' Appeal Board, Wellington, on October 20, 1941,

By MICHAEL YOUNG

(Secretary, New Zealand Fellowship of Conscientious Objectors, and Executive Member, N.Z. P.P.U.)

[In our September issue there appeared a letter addressed to us from Papanui Prison, Canterbury, New Zealand, by our comrade, Michael Young. Many comrades have expressed a desire to read the statement made by our comrade before the Conscientious Objectors' Appeal Board at Wellington, on October 20, 1941.

At the conclusion of his remarks, Comrade Young refused to submit himself for medical examination and stated that he was not available for military service or any form of national service whatever, either under military or civil control.

His appeal was dismissed without consideration or discussion.—Ed.]

I am here to show the Board that I hold a genuine belief that it is wrong to engage in warfare in any circumstances. The Board, having regard to the length of the period of holding such views, and the extent of corroborated evidence, is to judge my sincerity, not the correctness of my views. If I say that I would use force in some circumstances or that I would defend myself if attacked or kill an assailant in order to protect my wife, that does not rule me out, as I am called to show that I would not engage in warfare—not to prove that I wouldn't use force in any circumstances. Again, the Board is not entitled to dismiss the appeal solely because I may prove inconsistent or illogical in some of my conclusions because, as I stated before, the sincerity with which I hold my beliefs is the test, not their correctness. If I succeeded or failed to answer all the questions put to me by the Crown Representative, to my own or the Board's satisfaction, it would not establish the sincerity or insincerity of my conscientious objection to war.

In support of this contention I would say that my views this week are not identical with those I held last week and my views have altered considerably since I first definitely felt war to be wrong and that I wouldn't support it. Naturally enough, my views five years hence will have changed—at least I hope so. If war could be proved to be a right and proper thing under all or some circumstances I should cease to be a pacifist. That is my attitude to all questions. Therefore my conclusions are reasoned ones, not unreasoned beliefs held because I was taught them as a child or read of them as being infallible truths and therefore not to be challenged by man's reasoning. If it were necessary for me to know everything in connection with the problem of war and to realise its full implications in order to prove my conscientious objection to war, then likewise it would hold good that any person who could not present a flawless case for support of this war should be prevented from taking part and murdering other human beings. I would go so far as to challenge any believer in this war to-day to make as few slips and admit so few inconsistencies as are being made by the great majority who are appearing before this Board. It will therefore be for this Board to try to decide by what I have to tell them if my beliefs or views (I can see no clear distinction between them) are conscientiously held and if I am likely to change them.

War, as a means of settling any dispute is futile, wasteful of human life and supremely impractical. It encourages those very things it seeks to overthrow and sows the seeds of future wars.

Means. I am one who believes that evil means produce evil ends, and war I hold is an evil means at any time. The means, in the case of war, are violence, deceit, immorality and bestiality, and they inevitably linger on and affect the ends. However lofty the original ideals may have been, the means employed make them impossible of achievement.

Politics and War. I think that war is an integral part of any economic system in which man exploits man. War, therefore, to my mind is an integral and essential part of the capitalist system. My process of reasoning in this direction commenced while I was very young owing to unfortunate home circumstances. I determined that, as far as it was in my power, other children should not be made to suffer as I did. I found that those who most sanctioned the conditions of working and living which made part of my child-life a misery were those who most heartily supported war preparations and war. Therefore I am an advocate of socialism. But support of a socialist system and an opposition to a capitalist one does not indicate, necessarily, a repudiation of all war. This brings me to the essential part of my political reasoning on war. I believe that under the nominal socialist state, as we see in Russia to-day—even if it were world wide—there would still be wars, and just as violent, if not more so, as the one raging at the present moment. I must add though, that personally I feel that the truly international socialist could not take up arms against his fellow workers, and this would rule out war altogether since in all wars, whether national or civil, it is always workers slaughtering workers.

The desire for power, not for wealth, is the driving force behind war. Money gives power, so does political position. The striving after power and the desperate attempts to maintain it lead inevitably to strife. So I do not believe that the changing from a capitalist to a socialist order will end war, and so if we wish to do away with this scourge of war, we must do some fresh thinking. For my part, this fresh thinking has led me to see that, however fine and desirable our goal appears to be, if we employ wrong methods to achieve it the consequences must inevitably be unforeseen and bad. From my study of history, both recent and modern, I am convinced that war has meant retrogression—that progress has not come, as our history books suggest, from constant warfare, which in reality has been but the strivings of the rulers and which has impoverished and divided people from people. Progress has come from political and industrial strivings and from scientific investigation. From all this I have concluded that any release from war can only come by the refusal to use those very methods (warfare) which have enslaved and hypnotised the people of the world to-day. And I am quite convinced that it must be an absolute repudiation of war, otherwise those who control the sources of propaganda will always find justification for war.

Finally modern war is won by the leaders of the side which can most successfully suppress the liberties and individuality of their people. Therefore the people of the winning side have in reality lost the most. The main justification for war is that it is said to be removing an evil. My observation here is that seldom are the real reasons for declaring war revealed, and secondly, can war remove the stated evil in any case? I don't think so, and I have history to back me up. The Great War is a classic example. The war to end war, the war to make the world safe for democracy, the war to end Prussian militarism, etc. These things it has failed to do, and instead it brought disease, poverty, misery, widespread totalitarianism and finally another war.

War decides but one thing—which is the stronger side militarily!

I could say a good deal about the base purposes for which this war is being fought but I feel it would be useless, as all wars have been fought with ulterior motives.

Wickedness of War. There are other considerations which have led me to oppose war. One is its essential wickedness. It is brought about by older people in positions of economic and/or political responsibility and is fought and paid for by the masses of the people, who are guiltless. It is the young men who have had nothing to do with the policies and intrigues that have brought war about, who have always had to fight the wars. War destroys the fittest and the innocent and all that which is best in a people. I agree with the Duke of Wellington who said that "no man with any scruples of conscience is fit to be a soldier.

Men and women have their finer feelings played upon to get them to support the greatest evil in the world. It is not a spontaneous reaction to evil that sets them to support war, otherwise the people of England would long ago have revolted against the wretched conditions in the slums and distressed areas while the King and others lived in luxury. They also would have revolted against the idea of the English Government maintaining a permanent aggression in India and other places. These things have opened my eyes to see that war is not an isolated fact but a symptom of other disorders—which must be remedied.

The Alternative to War. The method of war to make for better things appearing to be a failure, I turn to another method of struggle, the method of persuasion perfected in non-violent resistance and my belief in this complete way of life is based on these conclusions of mine:—

1. The bankruptcy of war.
2. The fundamental unity of man—therefore the taking of life, except as an act of mercy, is wrong and war, or rather mass murder, is a crime against humanity.
3. The inherent goodness of human nature.
4. The power of truth and the infectiousness of the spirit of goodwill.
5. An alternative to armed force to secure and preserve those things worthwhile.
6. The practicability of this method.

The three pre-essentials of this method are:

(a) non-resentment—overcome by friendliness.

(b) non-co-operation—resisting wrong.

(c) non-subjection—refusal to obey wrong laws and accept imposition.

Even in the extreme case where its users are killed non-violent resistance has a far higher probability of weakening the morale of the violent opponents and of promoting the aim sought after than violent resistance would have.

I believe that civilisation with all its treasures will not be maintained by force. There are other ways of resisting encroachment upon its standards without resort to arms, which are, in themselves, the most fatal attack upon them, and which destroys them in the very process of nominally defending them.

These are my views, opinions and beliefs. I will now relate how I came to hold them, and the Board can then judge whether I hold them sincerely. As I stated before, my views on social problems came into being at an early age. This, I suppose, led to an interest in international affairs, and at school, under progressive but non-pacifist teachers, I began to develop internationalist and anti-war views. At one time I was a Bible class leader and assistant secretary of a Bible class union, and in 1932, in my youthful enthusiasm for world peace and international brotherhood, I joined the Youth Peace Crusade and had its speakers to our Bible class. I was delegate from the Bible class union to the Federation Against War in about 1934, and after I left the church I still continued as a member of the federation until it disbanded about 1937 or 1938. It was partly my resentment against the prevailing wicked economic system and my intense desire to put the teachings of the New Testament into practice that led me to become a pacifist and perhaps led to my leaving the church eventually. My beliefs now are not based on any religious grounds. In the Boys' Brigade, of which I was an officer, I was known as a pacifist and to be opposed to the military drilling of the boys.

When about 19 or 20 I began stocktaking, and while not ceasing to be a pacifist for this period, I deliberated on all aspects of the problem for nearly a year and finally decided that war would not stand any examination, and what was more important, that there was an alternative to it, and that I was prepared for the implications and consequences of renouncing war for all time. I immediately threw myself heart and soul into pacifist propaganda work and formed a branch of the Peace Pledge Union in Wellington, the pledge of this body being "I renounce war and will never support or sanction another," and was its first chairman, later being secretary, organiser and literature secretary in turn. From then until the outbreak of war I was fully engaged in my spare time in pacifist work, and addressed public meetings in Palmerston North, New Plymouth, Napier, Cambridge and Masterton, and for six months prior to the outbreak of war I spoke at street meetings in Wellington every Friday night.

The outbreak of hostilities saw no lessening of activities. On the first day of war, in company with the Rev. O. E. Burton, and Mr. Neil Trail, I was arrested outside Parliament grounds when addressing a meeting. I was prosecuted and fined on several occasions for addressing street meetings here and in Auckland and served a sentence of three weeks in Mount Eden Jail. I left my job and went on a nine months' propaganda tour of New Zealand, addressing outdoor and indoor meetings throughout the country. During that time I did odd jobs of work to keep me going. After a period of study at University I was accepted as a student at the Wellington Teachers' Training College, but a day or two before I was due to commence training at the beginning of this year, I was dismissed by the Wellington Education Board. So much for the desire of those in authority to make use of its citizens in a constructive way.

To-day I am secretary of the Fellowship of Conscientious Objectors, a body of men who are determined to stand together and not be coerced by the majority into criminal acts of murder. That concludes my record of pacifist activity over the past few years.

Sir, I have in my hand a list of 50 names of people whom I could call as witnesses. This is apart from 500 members of the Peace Pledge Union and some members of the Christian Pacifist Society and the staff of the firm I was with prior to the war, and I have files of correspondence, circulars written by myself and clippings of letters to the papers and reports of public meetings. But I do not intend calling any witnesses or producing evidence of any sort or undergoing cross-examination. I may say that this does not automatically mean that my appeal is dismissed, because the regugations read that the Board may accept the evidence adduced by the appellant, whether it is corroborated or not, but I know it is the rule of this board that appellant's evidence must be substantiated, so by its own procedure the Board will be compelled to dismiss the appeal.

The reason for this step on my part is that I have no desire to obtain exemption (if I could in any case) from this Board when it has turned down so many obviously genuine pacifists—men equally as sincere as myself and in some cases known to me for many years and who hold the most downright beliefs about war. I have in my hand now a table giving the figures of appeals allowed and dismissed by the Christchurch Board and this Board, and the great disparity shows that injustices have been committed by this Board. In short, the proceedings all along have been farcical, and so I cannot take this appeal any further.

"18B" MOTION BY DUKE OF BEDFORD

In the House of Lords the Duke of Bedford proposes:

"To call attention to the continued detention under Defence Regulation 18B of persons arrested in May 1940 or later and to the unconstitutional nature of such imprisonment without charge or trial and the unnecessary hardship of the conditions of detention."

UNITY OR—?

By ANNESLEY GUY ALDRED

It is, as yet, still too early for any one to forecast when the end of the second World War is likely to be. But there are undoubted signs that the world is growing war-weary; and there has recently been at least a temporary depression in the value of certain armament shares owing to what the financial columns were pleased to call "the increased danger of peace."

In fact the situation is such that in spite of every official attempt to prevent it, an ever increasing number of people have begun to wonder just what sort of a world and just what sort of a Britain we are going to have when peace comes. And so embarrassing have some of the questions become that finally, in the sacred cause of parliamentary vote-catching, Lord Woolton has been shifted from the difficult task of convincing the people of Britain that reconstituted eggs are good for them, to the even more difficult one of convincing them what a wonderful place the post-war "reconstructed" Britain will be, notwithstanding the fact that it will continue, so it is hoped, under the same management.

In other words it has been decided that almost any sacrifice to working class demands will be justified so long as it ensures that the danger period immediately following the war is weathered without any serious weakening of the present system of private ownership and private exploitation.

From the working-class viewpoint one would like to believe that the threat to that iniquitous system was as real as the ruling class are afraid it might be, and that it was finally to be wiped off the face of the earth together with its ever attendant evils of war, famine and pestilence.

But, unfortunately, the first essentials for the achievement of this object, a fundamental understanding of each others' needs and a real sense of solidarity, are still but vain ideals; and the schisms and sects are yet too many.

It is difficult to understand this basic lack of unity, though it is easy to pick on many minor causes. Too many leaders, whether self-appointed or chosen by their comrades, get caught up in the vortex of political careerism; too often, such is the irony of life, those who remain true to their ideals are shunned and despised by those whom they seek to help, for their seeming failure to "succeed"; instead of being recognised for their sincerity and integrity, too much time is spent by those who know what they want in vigorous pursuit of minor differences, whilst often the real traitors are attacked, if at all, only with timidity; finally, when accord is sometimes reached by some small group they are apt to spend so much time in self-approbation and in feeling that their task is achieved that they have no time to help the struggling mass of their comrades who have not yet found enlightenment.

All these are, however, really only minor reasons and may, in fact, even be more symptomatic than causal. The plain, sad fact is that in spite of, or should one say because of, forty years of Labour and Trade Union representation in Parliament the overwhelming mass of the workers are still only groping vaguely for the cure to the many evils they know to exist.

They know that it is wrong when they hear, in peace-time, of shiploads of oranges or fish being thrown into the sea in order to keep prices up; what time the people of Jarrow are starving. They realise the fundamental rottenness of capitalistic economics, in war time, when a factory is allowed to continue to make shells for nine months after that particular type of shell has been scrapped as obsolete (ignoring for the moment the fact that it is one of the evils of the system that the manufacture of shells should be necessary). They will admit, if you can make them realise that it is so, that it is wrong for more than seven-eighths of the national budget to be spent, whether at peace or war, on past, present or future wars. But having admitted that all these things are wrong, at that point their understanding fails and they are unable to visualise a state of society in which these things need not be and would not be.

But it is when one commences the task of trying to enlighten them that one encounters the biggest shock of all. For all ones arguments are blocked by fixed concepts and ideas. If one talks of Communism it is impossible to dissociate the idea from the vacillations of the Communist Party; the mention of Anarchism at least raises a picture of chaos—where it does not, still, picture a man with a beard, a black cloak and a round bomb with smouldering fuse; whilst the vaguest hint of Socialism brings up a vision of millions of robots all wearing identical clothes, eating the same food, doing the same job and, horror of horrors, all robbed of that mystic quality called "initiative" or "enterprise" with which they are so richly endowed under capitalism!

It is, indeed, astonishing to find how greatly some individuals who are otherwise reasonably intelligent, are affected by this latter idea. They seem to visualise a complete cessation of all human endeavour, and the thought just appalls. It is of no avail to point out the number of inventors who have, literally, starved to death. Nor does it help to point out that, as far as one can see, by far the greatest endeavour, under capitalism, seems to be concentrated on the production of bigger and more "beautiful" bombs and their safe conveyance to that point from which, when released, they will wreak the maximum of destruction on the greatest number of workers.

Nevertheless, however difficult the task of achieving working-class understanding and working-class unity may be, it must be achieved and achieved quickly. For the plainest fact of all is that if the next war starts off where this one ends it can only result in slaughter of untold millions and, for the survivors, complete degradation and the destruction of everything that can make life worth living.

The logic of the position is clear and unanswerable. There must not be another war. Therefore the system which must inevitably, result in another war must be overthrown before it can do so. This can be done—of that there is no doubt. But it will be done only if there is a real closing of the ranks. Individual jealousies, academic differences, must be swept aside. Even more fundamental differences must somehow be composed if the main object is to be achieved.

It is no longer sufficient to bury one's head ostrich-like in the sands of "Party Lines." The fundamental understanding that the bombings of Guernica, Rotterdam, Warsaw, Coventry and Hamburg all spring from the same cause; the knowledge that the dole queues on the Clyde arise from the same cause as the famine in Bengal; these must be the spurs to action.

Comrades! there is nothing new in this article, nothing which has not been often expressed before. But that does not detract from the truth of the message nor make the need for unity less urgent.

Time presses. What are you going to do?

NOT BY MIGHT.

Last month we headed the review of the pamphlet by B. A. S. Brunskill "NOT BY NIGHT." Comrade Brunskill considers this an excellent title. It remains an error. The pamphlet is entitled "NOT BY MIGHT." The price is 6d., post-free 7d. It can be obtained from The Strickland Press, or direct from the author, B. A. S. BRUNSKILL, STEDHAM, MIDHURST, SUSSEX.

DUKE OF BEDFORD

By J. TAYLOR CALDWELL

II. Burnbank Meeting

About seven hundred people were present at the meeting in Burnbank. The opening speeches of both speakers were listened to without interruption, but at question and discussion time it became evident that a considerable number of the audience were members of the "Communist Party." In his desire to be fair the chairman allowed these critics more than a proportionate share of the meeting's time; and they made full use of the opportunity afforded them. No sooner did one of their number conclude his contribution to discussion than another rose to his feet and continued the attack. Whether deliberate or not this had the effect of suppressing those with more democratic views, and those whose criticism was original and not dictated by the exigencies of a Party. There were, however, a number of participants in discussion who spoke freely, stating their points of agreement and disagreement with the speakers.

The "Communist" Party spokesmen set out to be disagreeable and several dispensed with any pretence at reasoned argument, and were simply abusive. The least annoying of these people was probably the one most extravagant in his abuse. The Duke, he said, had bribed Aldred to speak on the same platform, because, continued this worthy dialection, in the advance of the glorious Red Army the Duke saw the handwriting on the wall and knew what would happen to all Dukes once the workers came to power.

If this individual had been more intelligent he would have known why the audience advised him loudly to "sit down." The Red Army's advance is comparatively recent, and the Duke's association with Aldred dates back some time. To the time when the Red Army was fraternising with its Nazi ally on the border they had cut for themselves across war-torn Poland. To the time when the Stalinists were busy persecuting the Jewish Socialists in Poland to please their Hitlerite friends; when Erlich and Alter were imprisoned—only to be assassinated later—for their violent anti-Nazi propaganda. When Fascism was not a world menace and Germany "the poor victim of British imperialism"; a poor victim helped by the "Communists" by their deliberate sabotage of the British war effort. Apart from that: if the Duke were clever enough to be the only Duke in the country to see the menace to dukes in Marshal Stalin's victories, why should he be foolish enough to associate himself with so unimportant a person as Aldred—especially as Aldred is also "doomed"? Why doesn't the Duke remain an ordinary orthodox duke and become a member of the Anglo-Soviet Unity Association like the near-fascist, Tory, Sir Thomas Moore?

Then he could have spoken—not with insignificant doomed Aldred—but with Willie Gallacher! Why not? Lady Glen-Coates can do it—why not the Duke of Bedford?

One woman "Communist" drew applause by rhetorical references to the swift advance of the victorious Red Army which would sweep Fascism from the face of the earth. Possibly she thought that a eulogy of the Russian soldiers was a good substitute for a logical, sensible criticism of the anti-militarist position. Certanly it was much easier. But with usual C.P. contempt for history she dragged James Connelly into her spirited peroration—quite heedless of the fact that Connelly was opposed to the 1914 war and would certainly have favoured his country's neutrality if he were still alive. Then with naive impertinence she quoted Connelly's reference to the lowly: "Love to the Lowly; hatred to the Great."

Can it be that this woman never reads (even the "Daily Worker") or listens to the wireless? Does she not know that Stalin has but recently dined with the great statesmen of the world's leading capitalist Powers? That he partook of a 26-course dinner in honour of these exalted ones? There is no suggestion that he missed any of the courses, or failed to raise his glass to any of the twenty toasts. In fact he proposed a few—to Churchill (who once called him "a bloody baboon"), and to Roosevelt. Stalin, representing the lowly, now wears jewels, according to "Comrade" second-front Beaverbrook!

If such a dinner had taken place in Britain the most pale-pink member of the Labour Party would have protested. How dare the government dine so sumptuously—he might ask—when the people are so carefully rationed? In Russia there were no protests. How dare the State-slaves criticise their masters!

What a mockery it is. In war-torn Russia with its wheatfields destroyed, its cities ruined, its people subsisting on the barest rations, death and mourning the lot of millions, the Grand-Master of Socialism, of Equality, of World Brotherhood, the Man of the Future sits down to dine—not on the food of Russia, and not with the lowly who alone can impel emancipation and who speak the language of the future, but with representatives of world reaction and vested interest. And what a vulgar display of gluttony! Like a Roman Tyrant of antiquity—a Ruler of slaves, expressing Power in ridiculous ceremony.

This brings us to the crux of the matter. This is why there were so many dissentient voices at the Burnbank meting. It was not a quarrel between Socialists with a common enemy and a common ideal, differing only in methods of consumating that ideal. It was not the century-old quarrel between reformers, gradualists and parliamentarians on one side and revolutionaries, direct actionists and anti-parliamentarians on the other. It was a conflict between two entirely different concepts—not only of the manner of pursuit of the struggle, but of its purpose—its object and very nature.

Socialism used to mean (and still means) a state of freedom and democracy with economic security. Lenin evolved the doctrine of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat because he thought it suited the needs of the Russian Revolution. He also established the dictatorship of a Party, which ultimately meant the dictatorship of the Party Leader. Then, once more to suit the peculiar needs of Russia, he introduced a restricted capitalism.

Neither he nor any other well-informed Socialist regarded these innovations as Socialistic. At best they were expedients to overcome certain difficulties. Some apologists contended that when conditions became more settled these reactionary measures and practices would be abolished and the Union of Soviets march forward to Socialism. The State would "wither away" and the "classless society of Communism" would evolve.

With the aid of the Third International these views were spread throughout the world, and Parties formed to further the Revolution in their own countries and to protect the newly established Soviet Republic on its way towards Socialism. It was not always easy to justify the actions of the new Republic, nor to see how the entrenchment of the Party Machine as the apparatus of government could lead to Socialism; and gradually it became obvious to all thinking people that the Revolution had ended—and it has stopped very far short of Socialism.

The Party consolidated its position by widening its powers, and suppressing all critical organisations, until it was the only Party, the only Organisation, and the only Power. State capitalism and wage differentiation were no longer temporary expedients; they became established institutions. The Executive became a Bureaucracy, the Party Secretary became the Party Leader, and the Party Leader became the Dictator of Russia.

It became convenient to forget that the country had only been on its way to Socialism, and that the State was intended to "wither away." Those who would not forget it were labelled traitors, or, to make it easier for the mass-mind, simply called Trotskyists, and destroyed. Ambassador Joe Davis speaks truthfully when he says that Stalin saved Russia from Communism. Not because he destroyed Trotskyists, but because he stamped out every breath of socialist utterance in the whole Soviet Union. And he did so to consolidate himself in power. It may have been in the interests of the Russian people, but it was with a cynical disregard for the interests of the common people in other parts of the world. For with the aid of hirelings and fools he foisted upon the world the idea that this was Socialism and Russia the Fatherland of Socialism and the hope of the world. That the machinery of State control in Russia was the machinery of Socialism in operation. The "withering State" has been forgotten The regret of Lenin at the reactionary measures forced upon Russia has been forgotten. The temporary nature of the Proletarian Dictatorship has been forgotten. The proletariat itself has been forgotten, and only the Dictatorship remains.

The proletariat has been forgotten. It is no longer the most important class in society. A new class has arisen; a class, rich, not only in power, but in money. Even Lenin would be appalled to hear of Marshal Stalin in his bejewelled uniform, the Patriarch in his costly pagan vestments—and Soviet millionaires!

A new generation has grown since the Revolution, and many of its members accept this amazing new concept of Socialism. They may be able to read the "Communist" pamphlet defending Soviet millionaires without either amusement or anger. But those who remember the propaganda of Socialists before the "Communists" corrupted it will not look to Russia for the emancipation of the people from political or economic slavery.

For Socialism means freedom, and all-power to the People; not to a Party, or a Party Leader. It means justice; not the maintenance of secret police to spy and lie and to spread mistrust; to arrest secretly and imprison and murder without even the pretence of justice. Where the Judiciary is the tool and servant of the State, a mere weapon of the ruling clique, justice is non-existent. Socialism means equality. There can be no equality where there are rich and poor; where there is an acute differentiation in wages, and where a junior officer is paid ten times more than the private soldier. Reginald Bishop in his pamphlet "Soviet Millionaires," admits that a private soldier is not likely to become a millionaire, but he neglects to remind us that Cadet Schools have been established in Russia for the training of army officers. Is it not likely that a millionaire's son will be sent to one of these and become an officer with a pay at least ten times greater than that of the common soldier? Whilst on this point we may perhaps express our astonishment that a common soldier's pay should be described as a mere pittance and millionaires excused in the ground that "they have put more into society than they have taken out." What person, speaking his own mind honestly, would dare assert that any man can give more than the soldier who gives his life, or asks less than the man who endures the privations of the front line?

Where are the ideals of democracy, freedom, justice, equality, which formed our concept of Socialism not so long ago? This "Communism" of the strike-breaker, the dungeon-keeper, the executioner and the hired apologist is not the Communism our fathers preached and suffered to propagate. It resembles more that other form of bastard socialism, born in similar circumstances in war-exhausted Germany—the creed of the Nazi. There are differences, but it is the great resemblance that alarms us. Mr. Churchill once referred to these two doctrines as "twin evils." He may have been correct when he spoke, but now one twin has grown pale and sickly and is near death's door; the other waxes fat and strong.

and is held up—with Mr. Churchill's aid—for the adulation of the world. We may live to regret our foolishness.

One speaker in the audience referred to Aldred and his supporters as "dreamers walking with their heads in the clouds." Who is the more bewildered: we who keep the object of our struggle clear in our minds and will not subvert it to the claims of passing circumstances, or they who have become so lost in the morass of compromise and expediency that they have forgotten where they intended to go or what they were trying to escape when they set out on their journey.

Those who attended the meeting should realise the real significance of the "Communist" Party antagonism. The quarrel was not between political factions but between two different creeds that eventually must split the country in two in a stern social conflict. Democracy and Socialism on the one side, as against Dictatorship and "Communism." The people of Lanarkshire have been asked to decide questions like this before—though not on so great a scale—and they have always supported Democracy. They should remember their traditions.

If the meeting stirred up independent thought it was of great value. And there is no doubt that it did. Certainly it nailed the lie that the Duke is pro-Nazi, or that Aldred has relinquished his socialist position to make room for the pacifist duke on the same platform.

It would be difficult to imagine two men able to face so mixed an audience more successfully. And surely it is an unique situation that has two men so contrasted in every respect speaking together under the common inspiration of human well-being. The Duke, head of a long-established noble household, with his austere and unhurried logic and his clear unimpassioned voice, constructing his argument so skilfully that every piece falls securely into its proper place, and the edifice stands complete and perfect; and Guy Aldred, anarchist of the city streets and tenements and the prison cell, with, to change the metaphor, his sledge-hammer blows, crushing his enemies and standing unaffected by the thousand badly-aimed poison darts with which they assail him.

Burnbank has had many meetings—dreary political meetings where would-be politicians came to solicit the support of the people; but at this meeting the speakers asked for nothing but that they should be heard, and their hearers exercise their own intelligence. It was not a meeting of ephemeral value but one which dealt with matters of historical importance.

JESUS AND THE TRIBUNAL

Jesus of Nazareth, Conscientious Objector, Appears Before the Tribunal.

REPORTED BY CHARLES A. EARL

MEMBERS OF TRIBUNAL—His Grace the Archbishop, a Roman Catholic Cardinal, Moderator of Free Churches, Chief Rabbi.

The Clerk to the Tribunal calls the conscientious objector, "Jesus of Nazareth" ! ! !

HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP—"Jesus of Nazareth, I understand that you claim to have a conscientious objection to military service. Upon what grounds is your objection based?"

JESUS—"Upon the two great commandments: To love God with all my heart, with all my soul and with all my mind, and to love my neighbour as myself. I must do unto others as I would they should do unto me."

THE CARDINAL—"But surely if you love your neighbour as yourself, you would be willing to help in overcoming brutal aggression!"

JESUS—"Who are the brutal aggressors? Those who attacked Poland and Finland? Those who attacked the Scandinavian countries? Those who keep India and other coloured peoples in subjection?"

THE CHIEF RABBI—"The aggressors are the oppressors of the Jews, the French, and all the inhabitants of the Nazi and Fascist occupied countries. You know of this oppression and the violent perverting of justice and judgment in these territories. Will you not help to end this oppression?"

JESUS—"By destroying the oppressors?"

THE MODERATOR OF THE FREE CHURCHES—"Yes, by bombing their homes, workshops, factories, schools, hospitals and churches, and totally destroying them."

JESUS (after a few moments silence)—"Will that end oppression?" "Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, but I say unto you that ye resist not evil. The Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives but to save them. Evil cannot be overcome by evil."

HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP—"Young man, you seem very sure of yourself. From whom do you get your authority?"

JESUS—"From my Father who is in heaven, for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust. Therefore I say we must love our enemies, bless them that curse us, do good to them that hate us, and pray for them which despitefully use us and prosecute us."

THE CARDINAL—"Do you seriously suggest that the sort of behaviour you describe, should be adopted by everyone?"

JESUS—"Certainly, for if you forgive men their trespasses, our heavenly Father will forgive us. Non-violence means the largest love. It is the supreme law. By it alone can mankind be saved. He who believes in non-violence believes in a living God. Non-violence cannot be taught by word of mouth. It is kindled in our heart by the grace of God in answer to earnest prayer. It requires true humility for it is reliance not on self but on God alone. Non-violence is the most active force in the world. It is the weapon not of the weak, but of the strongest and bravest. The true man of God has the strength to use the sword, but not use it, knowing that every man is the image of God. All humanity is one undivided and indivisible family, and each one of us is, in some measure, responsible for the misdeeds of others. Human nature is in its essence one, and therefore the aggressor unfailingly responds (that is, in the end) to the advances of love. Dictators are not beyond redemption. No power on earth can stand before the march of peaceful, determined and God-fearing people. Non-violence is more powerful than all the armaments in the world. It is mightier than the mightiest weapon of destruction devised by the ingenuity of man."

HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP—"That is nonsense. It has long been decided by the Church that it may be lawful for a Christian to take part in war, and the only answer that can be given to the German menace is a massing of might on the side of right. If we attempted to follow your teaching we should soon be involved in tremendous suffering and death."

JESUS—"That may be so, but war most certainly involves millions in suffering and death. I have an implicit faith, a faith that to-day burns brighter than war, that mankind can only be saved through non-violence, which is the central teaching of the Bible, as I have understood the Bible. God has chosen me as one of His instruments for presenting non-violence to the world for dealing with its many ills. I am quite sure that non-violence properly applied would prevent bloodshed everywhere. For peace will not come out of a clash of arms, but out of justice, lived and done by unarmed nations in the face of odds."

THE MODERATOR OF THE FREE CHURCHES—"But if we adopt this extraordinary method of yours, Hitler and his armies will assuredly destroy us all."

JESUS—"You say you believe in an almighy God. Well, if you do truly believe that God is almighty, why not put your whole heart in Him? You sing in your churches: 'Sufficient is thine arm alone, and our defence is sure,' but it is quite obvious that you do not really believe that to be the case, you would sooner rely on bombing aeroplanes, battleships and guns. You say that you believe God to be the Father of all Mankind, and that all men are brothers, yet you support the killing of your German, Italian and Japanese brothers. There seems to be little chance of any one nation taking a lead in this matter and risking something for its faith in God. For there is not a single great nation which really believes in God as their protector of national life. If there were it would be interesting to speculate what would happen in the world's life, when a great people took the way of a suffering servant of God and dispensed with the other forms of protection in which the majority of people so vehemently believe. I wish there was some chance of the Church putting God to the test in the practical affairs of life. Here is a distracted and disturbed world clamouring for securities and guarantees and the Church has no lead to give. For the most part the Church in every land just meekly follows the prevalent national policy, and when you think of the faith in God which the Church professes, the situation is rather a pathetic one."

HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP (after consulting with his colleagues)—"You give the impression that you understand these matters better than we do. You are an impractical, obstinate visionary, and the decision of the Tribunal is that you be removed from the register of conscientious objectors, and put on the military register."

AFTER THE WAR—WORK FOR ALL?

By THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Mr. Henry Wallace, Vice-President of the U.S.A., is reported to have said recently that more than ten million workers would be unemployed after the war unless the U.S. could produce forty per cent. more peace-time goods than it did before. It would take more ingenuity to prevent general unemployment than it required to overthrow Hitler.

This is a characteristic example of political stupidity on the question of unemployment, but Mr. Wallace is not alone in his folly. In this country, apart from Social Creditors and a very small percentage of other monetary reformers, all the political leaders—and agitators—are promising work for all; or trying to devise a plan to provide work for all; or accusing the other fellow because his plan will not, in their opinion, provide work for all. The people, too, are either hoping for work for all, or feeling despondent because they doubt whether there will be work for all!

Well, there can't be paid work for all, especially in highly industrialised countries like Britain where the position is different from what it is in Russia where the process of industrialisation and mechanised development is of recent origin and by no means yet completed. At the present time in Britain our essential needs are, after a fashion, being met with only about half the population usefully employed, the other half being engaged, in one way or another, in the work of destruction.

The man who pretends that paid work for all is a lasting possibility in Britain or America is either a fool or a rogue. This may sound rather a sweping statement in view of the enormous number of individuals who do think that paid work for all can be secured if we have the right social and industrial organisation. Seeing, however, the number of people throughout the world at present busily engaged in killing, or helping to kill, their fellow mortals; and seeing that a fraction of the courage and endurance they are displaying in the effort to destroy those against whom they have no personal grievance would produce far greater comfort and happiness if it were directed into channels of wise resistance to their rulers who drive them to war, is it not obvious that there must be a considerable number of fools and rogues about somewhere?

The following figures may help to show why paid work for all is not an attainable, and therefore not a sensible, objective.

One craftsman takes 5½ days to make one pair of boots. Modern plant in a boot-making factory can turn out 595,000 pairs of boots in 5½ days, the total number of employees sustained being 7,200.

In Rummelburg is a power plant capable of producing 240,000 kilowatts; 200 workmen and 50 clerks can keep it going. It displaces previous plant which gave employment to 3000 workmen and 700 clerks to produce the same power.

Before the power age, 450 bricks per day per man was the average. To-day a brick plant will produce 400,000 per man per day.

In Milwaukee, U.S.A., one power plant can turn out 10,000 chassis frames per day, and 34 miles of pipe line, employing only 208 persons.

A few years ago a plant turning out 600 cigarettes a minute was displaced by one which now turns out 2,600 a minute. Each machine employs three operators and disemployed 697 men.

A plant for making incandescent lamps was built in 6 weeks by 37 men a year or two ago. It enables one man to do in a single hour what would have taken him 9,000 hours in 1914.

73,000 electric light bulbs can be produced in 24 hours by a machine which by so doing disemploys 2000 hand-workers.

The Boston Railroad Company uses a freight car handling device which takes charge of 1,000,000 cars per year. One man directs the whole operation and saves the labour costs of 400 men.

The "New Leader" quotes: "A new multiple automatic drilling machine with 8 men is estimated to do the work of 2000 men each operating a single drilling machine." (January 6th, 1933).

A man-less plough has been tried in the U.S.A. After the first furrow, this machine guides and turns itself without a conductor. It is calculated that by modern machine methods a man can produce 1300 per cent. more than by the methods of the past. Plough outfits working with a width of 60 feet are being used in place of the old two-horse single-furrow plough, the increased efficiency in ploughing being 5900 per cent. and, in spite of huge extensions in farming, disemployed 2½ million men from 1918 to 1927.

At the Stratford printing works of the L. & N.E. Railway, 100,000 tickets can be cut and printed in one hour by a machine attended by one operator. Roughly 100,000,000 tickets, weighing 120 tons, are printed yearly thereby.

3,600 socks per day can be produced by one man tending 25 machines.

The Wade Mechanical Woodman enables one operator to do the work of 30 men.

A machine can strip currants off a bush, disemploying 40 women, and does the work in less than half the time. These currants, when machines have made them into jam, are put into cans, 1000 of which can be produced in a day by one man.

When a crane armed with an electric magnet is put to work, 128 men out of 130 lose their jobs.

At St. Louis, Australia, where sewerage work was being carried out, 33 machine operators, assisted by 37 labourers, were doing the work of 7000 pick and shovel men.

Mr. Caulwell, a farmer of Weston, sprayed his potatoes against disease by aeroplane, with complete success. The field of 40 acres, which by ordinary methods took 2 days to disinfect, was sprayed in 25 minutes.

Until 1922, the U.S.A. fought the dreaded boll-weevil (a pest which used to destroy half the cotton crop of the world) with a mule-drawn drenching machine which did 30 acres a day. Aeroplanes now drench 300 acres in one hour.

Feeble efforts are sometimes made to refute the obvious conclusion to which these figures point. It is said that new inventions create new employment. Of course they do, but the labour-destruction due to labour-saving inventions and discoveries far outweighs, in its total effect, the increase in employment due to new inventions.

It is said that employment can be "spread" by shortening hours and taking on more workpeople; also that holidays can be lengthened and the age for retirement on a pension reduced. Of course employment can be "spread" as suggested—under a sensible money system—and hours of work ought to be reduced perhaps to four or even to two hours a day in some of the more exhausting and unhealthy industries. But whatever the right and reasonable reduction of hours may be, a point is inevitably reached when still further reduction must involve inconvenience and absurdity. Two hours a day may be right and proper; two minutes could only be ridiculous!

Some people feel that mechanisation is in itself an evil; that it can, and should, be forbidden by law; and that we should return to the age of handicrafts. Such individuals are social and economic King Canutes, trying to hold back the advance of the tide of scientific progress. Society as a whole will never listen to them. There is nothing wrong with mechanisation and labour-saving inventions, which could free mankind from a life of toil for a life of creative leisure. What is wrong is the bad judgment, due to folly and bad character, which puts mechanisation to evil uses; the callousness which does not regard the welfare of those who tend machines; and the stupidity which does not allow adequate incomes to those whom the machines, or new scientific discoveries, have put out of employment.

If work for all is a fool's aim, what post-war aim might be regarded as both attainable and sensible? Well, in the first place, work under proper conditions and for proper hours for all whose labour is still required in producing desirable goods and services, the necessary materials for which exist in the country or can be imported from abroad. In the second place, for those for whom paid work does not exist, money-incomes sufficient to enable them to claim their fair share of the country's goods and services. In a "fair" share of the country's goods and services must be included a share in the equipment needed for unpaid creative work—arts, crafts, hobbies, research, etc.—in which those who are technically unemployed can profitably occupy their leisure hours and find in them happiness and opportunity instead of the misery and boredom of "unendowed" unemployment under the old system.

The question might be asked: "Upon what factors would a 'fair' share of the country's wealth depend?" The two most important would be the number of the population and the total output and import of goods and services. The greater this latter total, the greater would be the share available for each individual citizen, whether unemployed or engaged in paid work.

A big country like America with immense internal resources could provide a high and steadily rising standard of living for all her people without the slightest difficulty and with little or no delay.

For reasons to which I have alluded in another article, the position in a small and thickly-populated country like Britain may not be so good, especially if we persist in wasting our resources and losing still more of our foreign trade by further prolongation of the war. This point is well worth consideration by those selfish and short-sighted idiots who, just because their war jobs give them temporary prosperity, are content to allow the struggle to continue with no thought for the future and no heart for those to whom the war is bringing death, wounds, misery and despair.

Although it would be wrong to ignore the possibility of grave post-war economic problems, there is, however, no reason to be unduly gloomy about our future if only we reform our money system so that we are able to buy all that we desire of what we can produce or import. The productive resources of modern civilisation are enormous and ever-increasing, and even if one could not honestly promise every war-worker that his money-income might not have to suffer some temporary reduction, taking one thing with another, there is no reason why life in general should be less pleasant for him. After a possible first readjustment of his income in the wrong direction, he could, morever, look forward with reasonable certainty to a steady improvement in his financial position as new inventions and discoveries increased man's power throughout the world to exploit the vast resources of Nature and Britain secured her share of the general increase in real wealth.

Two things, however, would be necessary. There must be a complete breakaway from the error of Mr. Henry Wallace who, like thousands of other people, cannot yet begin to envisage any source of income but the wage or salary. As already indicated, a direct relation must be established between the country's total output and import of goods and the "National Dividend," paid as a right and not as a dole involving a Means Test inquisition, either to every citizen, or to every citizen in need of it. There must also be a politically-conscious and politically-active electorate ready to force M.P.s, if they refuse to do it of their own free will, either to liquidate, or to impose effective control over, all cartels and monopolies which seek to limit output or sabotage new inventions which appear to threaten their particular interests.

In conclusion I should perhaps add one qualification to my original statement that there cannot be paid work for all in peace-time. If, directly this war ends, we start preparing for the next war by developing gigantic armed forces for what militarists call "defence" and for holding down our former enemies, then there may still be work for all. This, however, would not alter the truth of the assertion that work for all is an objective of fools or rogues. On the contrary it would confirm that truth!

The Trade Cycle and the Socialist Note

A Reply to the Duke of Bedford

By J. I. CRAIG

Firstly I wish to make it clear that this criticism of the Duke of Bedford's plans for monetary reform and of his answer to my article on Socialism and Money in the October issue of the "Word," is qualified by my clear recognition of the Duke's sincere desire to come to grips with the problem of poverty amid potential plenty and my appreciation of the high ideal of social service by which he is moved. If the majority of the working people had a similar outlook, commonweal would be within our grasp. Disagreement on facts and theories in economics or divergence of aim, do not affect complete agreement on the major issues of peace and liberty for the individual.

The Trade Cycle

The Duke states that "Slumps and booms are certainly caused by the deliberate action of the banks in conjunction with a foolish money system which makes no systematic provision for making up the shortage of consumer purchasing power indirectly due to investment."

Saving and investment constitute a single process and saving is a voluntary cut in consumption. If investment reduces purchasing power, we are assuming that the money invested, when expended as capital on buildings, plant, raw materials and labour, is not completely redistributed to consumers in the form of wages, etc., or we are assuming that, when new goods are produced, the purchasing power distributed in the process is not sufficient to cover all the industrial costs incurred. The reverse is the case. If the volume of consumption goods increased without a reduction in prices, or if credit (and therefore the volume of money in circulation) did not expand when production is expanding, it might be true that investment reduces overall purchasing power. The assertion under discussion is one of the main planks in the theories of Major C. H. Douglas, the author of Social Credit. If the Duke were to conduct a campaign to discourage saving and advocate the continuous spending of the whole of one's income, I would support him. This would mean, of course, the collapse of banking and insurance and the arrestment of all new projects. New savings are perpetually being transmuted into invested capital. How does this result in periodic crises?

Trade cycle theories fall roughly into four categories. The fundamental division of opinion is between causes that are—

(a) Inherent in the economic system; or

(b) Arbitrary interferences not part of the normal mechanism of the system.

My original criticism of the Duke's position was that the causes must be inherent in the system and not due to "the deliberate action of the banks." This is proved by the fact that the alternation of prosperity and depression takes place continuously, and regularly, like the swing of a pendulum. Incidentally, the period of "swing" is shortening and the amplitude is increasing. The Duke has not attempted to answer the argument. No juggling with the two meanings of the word "natural" will help. Are we to believe that the cunning bankers work to the calendar, just to provide themselves with an alibi?

The secondary division of opinion is between

(a) Monetary theories, and

(b) Non-monetary theories.

The Marxian explanation is non-monetary, but there is no reason why the monetary and non-monetary causes should not be complementary. This is my own view. The economic system is self-regulating. The motive force is profit, and the direction of production is controlled by the expectation of profit as indicated by ruling prices. The price mechanism in turn exactly equates supply and demand at all stages of manufacture between raw material and finished article. Where then is the factor which upsets the proportion between the production of capital (intermediate) and consumption goods and thus causes the trade cycle? The factor is the volume of money in circulation. Only the supply and demand for money are not self-equating. The immediate cause of the trade cycle is variation in the rate of interest (price of money) away from the equilibrium rate, that is, the rate at which the demand for credit would equal the supply of new savings. This causes swings in the amount of money in use, upsets the price mechanism and causes misdirection of production.

In a period of expansion, the volume of loans granted exceeds the amount of new savings, not by design, but through the normal technique of banking, and the several commercial banks are not themselves aware of the cumulative effect. Banks retain a certain proportion between loans and deposits. When a loan is granted, the amount is deposited with the same bank. This does not upset the proportion. But the use of this credit to finance production gives rise to new deposits in other banks and enables them to further increase their loans. In this way the demand for credit can be satisfied to an extent not justified by the level of new savings.

Marx's analysis of capitalism is perfectly reconcilable with the latest developments in monetary theory as expounded by Dr. F. A. Hayek of Vienna. I suggest that Marx's thesis that there is a general tendency for the average rate of profit to fall, provides the explanation of the further disturbing factor from the demand side in the loan market. It is the effort to defeat the falling average rate of profit which causes this extraordinary demand for capital and leads to over-capitalisation. Over-investment means a shift in demand from consumers' goods to producers' goods. Non-specific goods, for example, unskilled labour, move to the higher stages, such as the manufacture of machinery, and more roundabout methods of production develop which eventually become unprofitable.

Profits are made by the employer appropriating surplus labour value. New inventions and technological progress generally, reduce the proportion of capital expenditure on labour, and only an increase in capital can prevent a fall in the amount of profit. I therefore advance, tentatively, the theory that the underlying cause of the trade cycle is the basic fact of the exploitation of labour, coupled with the continual introduction of new labour-saving methods, and that this cause operates as an extraordinary demand for capital during upward swings in the cycle. The banks comply with this demand and do not raise the rate of interest, due to the good prospects of profit which exist at that phase of the cycle. Competition between the banks for business also prevents a rise in the rate of interest. They would have to raise it together if at all.

The return of the interest rate to the equilibrium rate will only take place when the increased cash requirements of business due to increased prices of consumption goods and increased wages, deplete the cash reserves of the banks, and they are compelled to raise the interest to protect these reserves. Prior to this stage being reached, the rate of credit expansion will have grealy out-run the rate of saving. The banks will now stop granting new credits and may have to reduce existing loans. This will aggravate the crisis but is not necessary to bring it about. It is sufficient that the banks should cease to increase the volume of credit. Only when the volume of money is increasing, can the money rate of interest be kept below the equilibrium rate. The longer this check is in coming, the greater will be the misdirection of activity to the manufacture of producers' goods at the expense of goods for immediate consumption, and the greater the resulting disorganisation of industry. The higher the peak, the deeper the trough.

The Duke implies that no check should be applied to credit expansion at boom periods. In actual fact, if the check could be applied sooner, the worst effects of the slump would be mitigated. It is the fact that entrepreneurs see great prospects of profit at the prices ruling at the peak periods, and are checked by the refusal of credit which, I suspect, gives rise to the Duke's belief that industrialists would support credit reform. The more important industrialists are too inextricably linked with financial interests to have leanings in this direction. The Duke writes: "In the ensuing slump the money-creating money-lender reasserts himself, when at length he again decides to bestow his favours on his subdued and disciplined clients." This may be effective dramatisation of the process, but it does not assist accurate factual analysis.

"Mr. Craig makes the common mistake of the orthodox economist (strange company, surely, for a Socialist reformer?) . . ." The Socialist is not a reformer, and it is precisely for this reason that he will find himself agreeing with the orthodox economist on questions of fact and diagnosis. It is when we come to remedy that they will part company. The honest economist will admit that the system cannot be radically reformed. The Socialist agrees but seeks to supplant the existing system, root and branch, and build a new economy, having as its motive, production for use, not profit. This can only be achieved through the common ownership of the means of production and distribution.

Money Reform

The Duke proposes that money should be created and issued to consumers on the Social Credit National Dividend plan and that the unemployed should be paid a living wage. Why should some work that others, either rich or poor, may live in idleness? Why should all not work a shorter day? What would be the effect of the second proposal on the labour market, an essential part of capitalism?

The injection of new money in the form of credits to consumers, would mean that it would be more profitable to produce goods for immediate consumption than to produce capital goods. The price of consumers' goods would rise and there would be an alteration in the price margins and expectation of profit in favour of those stages of production nearer the consumption level. The structure of industry would therefore contract. Employees in the basic industries would be thrown out of work, many enterprises would come to a standstill and a crisis would ensue. The effect of the measure proposed, would therefore be the reverse of what was intended.

The overthrow of the power of the financiers would require an assertion and enforcement of the will of the people. If this was achieved, why retain capitalism?

I regret that my proposed solution of the problem of distribution in a socialist economy should have become linked with the problem of the Trade Cycle, because the former is as simple as the latter is involved. The Duke states that the Socialist Note (a general purpose ration coupon bearing a fixed expiry date) would be a form of money with new qualifications. I disagree. Money is defined as the medium of exchange and has a secondary or derived use as the measure of value. The Socialist Note would perform neither of these functions. The only function it would have in common with money would be that of distribution, and money only performs that function incidentally, by accident, we might even say. Instead of the rationing of war-time scarcity, we must have the rationing of peace-time plenty, a plenty which is socially produced and should therefore be socially owned.

The further development of this proposal must await another occasion, but the writer would welcome criticism of the Socialist Note as elaborated in "The Word" for October.

The forces of education and religion which the Duke believes will eliminate corruption and its kindred evils will not, it seems to me, achieve much direct success, so long as the present economic basis remains. In a society where the worth of any activity is judged by whether it yields a profit, what could be more natural than that services, ethical and otherwise, should be recompensed in cash? The attitude expressed in the saying "business is business" has so permeated our life that it paralyses our powers of discrimination. A reduction in the power of the currency alone would not eliminate these evils, but it would have its effect. We say that "money talks." We could reduce it to a whisper.

The profit motive means, in mining, the waste of natural resources; in farming, it means impoverishment of the soil; in housing, it means jerry building; in the countryside, it means slag heaps and neglect of the amenities; in the literature and entertainment world, it means the appeal to the lowest common factor. It means the struggle for export markets and it means war.

We need to substitute for the motive of private profit, the motive of utility, and service to the common good, that is, we need socialism.

"COMMUNISM"

We extract the following paragraphs from "The Hairdressers' Weekly Journal," London, for Saturday, November 13, 1943:—

GEORGE ROSE SAYS: When Teddy Kendall accused me of political ignorance with regard to Russia, I felt he had placed me in a very unenviable position, because, partly from considerations of space, but chiefly because I felt that the Journal was hardly the place to indulge in a long discussion on the question, I could offer no effective reply.

Since then a new book has been published which deals with the subject extensively, and provides a very full justification for everything I said. The book is called "Communism: The Story of the Communist Party," by Guy A. Aldred. Aldred is a great truth-lover, and probably the finest exponent of Communist philosophy in these islands. I would urge all members who would be up to date in the history of man being enacted under our noses to read this book. It is obtainable from the Strickland Press, 104 George Street, Glasgow, C.1, for 1s. 9d. post free. I recommend this particularly to all those members who wrote to me on the subject. It puts the working-class movements the world over into a new light and is in every way most illuminating.

RHYS DAVIES, M.P.

Some of our readers in the N.U.D.A.W. write to state that our comrade, Rhys Davies, M.P., has been nominated by several large Branches of the Union for election to the Presidency of that organisation. Branches will be voting on the list of candidates during the early part of 1944.

Comrade Davies has been a permanent official of that Union for 37 years and retired on the age limit recently. He established the National Health Insurance Society for the organisation with 26,000 members when the Lloyd George Scheme was introduced in 1912. When he retired the membership was over 80,000.

He was the first M.P. for the Union and has retained his seat in Parliament without a break since 1921. His courage in advocating the principles of Socialism and Peace, and opposing the aims and folly of war is known to every Socialist working man and woman in the country.

For those readers to whom N.U.D.A.W. sound somewhat confusing, let us state that these marvellous and mysterious initials, for such they have seemed to be always to us, stand for National Union of Distributive and Allied Workers.

Welsh Anti-War Literature

In spite of the censorship and shortage of paper several small volumes have been published in the Welsh language against the War since 1939, and some journals printed in Welsh have been equally outspoken. Indeed, it is gathered that one such weekly has increased its circulation considerably merely because of its stand against the ghastly slaughter that is now proceeding all over the world.

The biggest attempt yet made, however, in that direction is the forthcoming publication of a substantial Welsh volume entitled "Gair y Cymod" (Word of Reconciliation); published by Lewis, Gwasg Gomer, Llandyssul, Carmarthenshire; 5/- per copy post free.

It will contain twenty articles by a similar number of the leading literary men of the Principality and twenty poems composed by another twenty of the most famous Welsh poets.

It is hoped to review the book in "The Word" in due course. It is understood that orders are well in hand already to secure the success of the venture; it will be on sale just before Christmas.

CARLILE AND THE SURGEONS

Dr. Brook's book on "Carlile and The Surgeons" has been reviewed widely in the press. Many of the reviews have appeared in these columns.

"The Lancet," in its issue for July 10, 1943 published the following notice:—

CARLILE AND THE SURGEONS

Richard Carlile died a hundred years ago, but is still remembered for his struggle to secure the freedom of the press. He spent a good many years of his life in prison because he consistently refused to pay any of the numerous fines inflicted on him for his efforts to secure liberty of opinion at a period when the politicians of the day were seriously disturbed by the spread of republican and atheistical doctrines. In the course of his lifelong efforts to secure free expression of his opinions he became associated in a curious fashion with the distinguished surgeon who was later known as Sir William Lawrence. Dr. Brook has recalled this episode, and what it led to as his contribution to the memory of Richard Carlile. Lawrence had at one time, as professor of anatomy at the Royal College of Surgeons, published a lecture which was considered by some of the seniors of the profession to be of an atheistical tendency; and though it is difficult now to see why his position and eventually withdrew the offending there should have been an outcry, he was deprived of lecture. A few years later Carlile saw fit to republish the lecture in spite of Lawrence's efforts to prevent it. There is evidence that at one time Lawrence and Carlile were closely associated in literary publications, and when in 1824 Wakley founded "The Lancet" and attacked the College of Surgeons Lawrence was his ardent assistant, and Carlile also took a large share in the conflict. In after years Lawrence took an opposite view of these activities, and even entered into violent proceedings against Wakley and the reforming party. In exploring the available records of this quarrel, in which much is still obscure, Dr. Brook throws some sidelight on Wakley, Joseph Hume, Robert Taylor and Abernethy; but Carlile remains his principal figure and his connection with the medical reformers of the time is interesting.

"St. Thomas's Hospital Gazette," for December, 1943, says:—

Richard Carlile, the centenary of whose death falls this year, was one of the most prominent members of the Reform movement at the beginning of last century, for his pains serving several long periods of imprisonment. In this interesting little pamphlet Dr. Brook has traced Carlile's association with sir William Lawrence, the distinguished surgeon from St. Bartholomew's Hospital, who ultimately became President of his College, Sergeant-Surgeon to Queen Victoria, and a baronet. In 1819 Lawrence published a work entitled Lectures on Physiology, Zoology and the Natural History of Man which he was subsequently persuaded to withdraw from circulation on account of his rather unorthodox views. Four years later Carlile republished the book under a new title, without Lawrence's permission. Such is the basis of the interesting piece of history which is recounted in this pamphlet. St. Thomas's, however, has more than passing interest in this nineteenth century agitator and friend of Thomas Wakley, founder of the Lancet. Carlile bequeathed his body to Lawrence for dissection, but Lawrence refused to have anything to do with it. Apparently largely on the instigation of Richard Dugard Grainger, F.R.S., just appointed "Lecturer on Anatomy and Physiology" to the Hospital, the body was handed over to St. Thomas's for dissection. A description of the post-mortem examination was published inthe Lancet, according to which "a numerous assemblage of the friends of the deceased and members of the medical profession" attended "in the anatomical theatre to witness his post-mortem examination." It was proposed that Carlile's skeleton should be placed in our Museum, but to this his family would not consent.

Dr. Brook's booklet can be obtained from this office, post-free, for 2s. 3d. It should be read and circulated widely in conjunction with the editor's "Richard Carlile," post-free, 1 9d., and Carlile's "Jail Journal," 2s. 3d.

Vol. V. No. 7 FEBRUARY 1944 Price: TWOPENCE

TWO CONFERENCES

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Among the diseases common in war, mental and moral paralysis of the temporarily insane seems one of the commonest and most infectious.

The pronouncement following the meeting of President Roosevelt, Mr. Churchill and President Chiang Kai-Shek has provided one of the worst examples of this ailment in a very acute form.

Japan, it is announced, is to be deprived of all the territory she has "stolen" since 1895. (Nothing, it will be noted, is said about the restoration of territory "stolen" from weaker peoples by the U.S.A. and Britain since 1895, or before that year. Victorious Powers, of course, are never guilty of aggression; aggression is a sin that can only be brought home to the vanquished).

If the Japanese have a sense of humour, they must be highly entertained by the time and circumstances which were selected for the publication of these formidable threats, especially if their claim recently to have inflicted further losses on the American Navy should be founded on fact.

Had President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill possessed any diplomatic skill, coupled with any desire to reduce the casualties suffered by their Forces to the unavoidable minimum, they would, in dealing with a proud and warlike people, have been careful to keep their intention of inflicting a humiliating and economically disastrous peace settlement carefully hidden until after they had won their war. To announce their intentions now is the best possible way of keeping the Japanese fighting—and killing British and Americans—to the very last.

I have spoken of a peace settlement "economically disastrous" for Japan, because it is clear that less than nothing is to be done to deal with the root cause of Japan's aggressiveness, i.e., the fact that her small and barren islands are greatly over-populated and her people have not been allowed access to a fair share of the world's economic resources, nor permitted to emigrate without more or less insuperable barriers being put in their way.

The U.S.A., by the Monroe doctrine, virtually declared that the American Continent was her private trading preserve from which the Japanese were very largely excluded. The Japanese, by the same argument, considered that eastern Asia should be their trading preserve—quite a logical argument if any Great Power is to be considered to have a monopoly of the trading and colonising rights in one large area of the world. This, however, did not suit the U.S.A. who, in addition to Monroe privileges, wanted trading rights in China as well. These trading rights Japan interfered with. The U.S.A. replied by economic war. Japan replied by a shooting war and that was that!

Certainly the behaviour of many Japanese towards the native inhabitants of some of the territories they have occupied in China has been anything but good and if Britain and the U.S.A. had not had quite so much glass in their own houses, they might reasonably have offered some strong criticisms and laid down certain conditions as essential to a just peace. Such criticism and such conditions (even leaving the present military situation out of account), would, however, be quite futile if not accompanied by a reasonable plan for the satisfaction of Japan's legitimate economic needs.

There is a very interesting passage in an article which appeared recently in "Reality," which refers to another article by Harry Paxton Howard in the September number of the American publication "Common Sense." In reply to the question "Is Japan Winning?" Mr. Howard argues in the affirmative, bringing forward many facts and figures in support of his contentions. He says there is no such thing as a united China fighting for the Atlantic Powers. There are now two Chinas, one of which is fighting for Japan. Again, there is no such thing as a Japan with her industrial strength concentrated in a couple of islands off the mainland, but a Japan in the process of transplanting her industries to the mainland and dispersing them throughout the territories under her occupational domination; nor does the occupation contain a greater element of repressive coercion than is the case with the Atlantic Powers' relations with the so-called "Free Nations" in South America and Europe. On the contrary, Japan is using Roosevelt's "good neighbour" strategy with conspicuous success. The slogan "Asia for the Asiatics" really works, despite the derisive attitude of Atlantic propagandists towards it. The so-called puppet governments concerned take it as serjously as those in the Western hemisphere do the Monroe Doctrine, which means "America for the Americans." If it be said that "Asiatics" is camouflage for Japan, what is "Americans" but camouflage for the United States? Mr. Howard's arguments recall a remark of Macaulay's that if there is long delay in liberating conquered nations, they are likely to turn on their liberators!

To the first announcement following the Cairo meeting, the second following the Teheran meeting has proved a worthy(?) successor; it is so cocky, so gushing, and so extremely vague! It is vague, save in one respect only, that it warns the Germans that an attack is to be delivered from East, West and South. Of course, this may be a cunning device to mislead the enemy, but, if otherwise, one would have thought that it would be better military tactics to have left the Germans guessing about the quarter, or quarters, from which the attack was to come and therefore to have left them; to some extent, unprepared. However, I suppose the sacrifice of several extra thousands of men meeting a forewarned opponent is not thought to matter at this stage of the war, every day of the prolongation of which makes the political leaders more accustomed to regard Service men, not as sentient human beings, but as mere pieces on a chessboard.

THE FIGHTING SCOT

Specially drawn for "The Word" by "Gowrie."

"The Scot is the finest fighter in the worr-ld."—David Kirkwood, M.P., at Glasgow, December, 1943.

It is nice to know that Marshal Stalin, President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill mean to "seek the co-operation and the active participation of all nations, large and small, whose peoples in heart and mind are dedicated, as are their own peoples, to the elimination of tyranny and slavery, oppression and intolerance"; also to know that "they will welcome them, as they may choose to come into a world-family of democratic nations."

It would have been reassuring, however, if we could have been supplied with some clearer proof that the Allied leopards have really changed their spots. Information from Stalin as to the exact date on which he began to set a high value on "democracy" as found in Britain and America would have been interesting; while a promise from him that, after the war, the whole of Poland, Finland, Latvia, Esthonia, Lithuania and Bessarabia were to be entirely free from Soviet domination, together with a similar undertaking from Mr. Churchill in respect of India, would have been thought-provoking and arresting, if also somewhat provocative of Dominie Sampson's interjection "Prodigious"!

I suppose I am a very cynical and uncharitable person, but for me the invitation to the freedom-loving peoples has about it just the suspicion of a hint of "Will you walk into my parlour?" said the spider to the fly. Axis Governments are not the only Governments who break pledges. I remember the fate of our own war-time pledges to Montenegro and Italy after victory had been secured. I would, therefore, rather base my hopes of a better world on a negotiated peace in which there are no victors and no vanquished, but in which all agree to withdraw from the territory of peoples who desire freedom to run their own affairs. Neither side would then be tempted to forget war-time promises of liberal conduct by the dangerous power that absolute victory bestows; but each side would, as it were, be kept up to the mark by the searching and wholesome scrutiny of former opponents and by the danger of unpleasantness if undertakings were not properly observed.

CONCHIE COMMENT

Press-cuttings relating to conscientious objectors have accumulated on our desk for over a year. Reports and comments make interesting reading.

Many tribunals stump objectors by asking them if they believe in the police force. But Thomas Milestone (42), 175 Summergangs-road, Hull, received conditional exemption at the North of England Appeal Tribunal at York, on September 22, 1943, precisely because he insisted on his belief in the police force. Milestone is an ex-policeman. After being rejected by the tribunals he refused medical examination and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. On his third appeal he said that he resigned from the Hull City Police Force, after 16 years, "under pressure." He was a policeman at heart and detested crime and criminals. War, to him, was a crime, and ought to be outlawed. Statesmen and military leaders were criminals. As a policeman he detested them and their work.

The Tribunal recognised him as a conscientious objector and made the condition land-work.

On May 15, 1942, Margaret Elizabeth Backhouse (20), shop assistant, of High Street, Kippax, near Leeds, was refused exemption. Her mother, Mrs. Backhouse, made the following protest to the Tribunal in support of her daughter's claim:—

I object to my daughter doing any war work whatever. My son is a prisoner of war in Germany. He volunteered to fight for his King and country, but not for another king and country. He was sent to Norway, and was captured by the Germans, who looked after him and nursed him back to health.

All Germans are not wrong. All the British are not right. My husband was left lying on the road after a motor accident, and I had to beg for Public Assistance, and was looked upon as a criminal. What are all you people? Why are you not doing war work? What are you women doing up there? Why are you not on hospital os some other work?

The Tribunal to whom these remarks were addressed consisted of Judge Stewart, Professor McCandlish (Leeds), Mr. Walter Dodgson (Sheffield), Miss Beatrice Kitson (Leeds) and Miss Amy Wild (Bradford).

The Chairman (Judge Stewart) said:

You seem to have taken this opportunity of making a statement on matters which are of no interest to the court at aall.

This rebuke was correct. Still, Judge Stewart, at the same Tribunal, has taken the opportunity of commenting on many matters that were not the concern of the Court. Mrs. Backhouse spoke a great deal of good commonsense even though she may have chosen the wrong place. Still, it was her only opportunity of being heard. Is it not sound legal approach to be over-ruled and to have the Court object but to leave your impression on the public?

Judge Stewart's rebuke to Mrs. Backhouse would be supported enthusiastically by Sir Albert Ball, Lord of the Manors of Lynby, Bunny and Bradmore; Mayor of Nottingham, 1909-10, 1920; and Lord Mayor, 1935-36. He is father of the V.C. airman.

On August 6, 1943, Sir Albert presided over the Court at Nottingham and sentenced Victor Paul Hewitt, an 18-years-old conscientious objector, who refused medical examination.

Said the pompous Sir Albert:—

You are a good-for-nothing coward; go to prison for three months, with hard labour.

This opinion was as irrelevant as the remarks of Mrs. Backhouse and less to the point. Even the father of a V.C. has no right to utter such opinions from the bench. It is an offence against every canon of justice. Such simple elemental truth will be beyond the understanding of this stupid fire-eating power-loving lay magistrate?

Sir Albert Ball could have passed the sentence required by law and have held his peace as to his private prejudice. He should have taken a lesson from the behaviour of the Kingston Borough Magistrates on Tuesday, May 11, 1943.

Bruce Stuart Beaugard, 16 Oliver Road, New Malden, was sentenced to £5 or one month's imprisonment for committing the same offence as the Nottingham objector, Hewitt.

Beaugard told the court that he refused to go for medical examination because he believed that this was a war between capitalist countries to maintain their fields of exploitation.

"I am a pacifist and an anarchist," he added.

The chairman of the Bench said that he could not discuss Beaugard's opinions in that court and must conviet on the fact of his failure to undergo medical examination.

This statement was dignified and correct.

On Wednesday, February 24, 1943, at a meeting of the Wiltshire County Council, Lt.-Col. William Cory Heward Bell, D.S.O., 67-year-old retired professional soldier, magistrate, county councillor and ex-M.P., had a field day planning to penalise conscientious objectors. He embodied his methods in a resolution, that was passed by the Council by 31 votes to 14. The resolution read:—

That in every case where employees of the Wiltshire County Council succeed in evading military service or service in the Home Guard on conscientious grounds, the committee concerned shall take every means in its power to ensure that such individuals spend in their spare time as many hours in some work of national importance as they would have been obliged to spend in Home Guard duties had they been conscripted for that force;

And for no greater remuneration than they would have received for such Home Guard duties.

This is an absolutely illegal resolution.

Colonel Bell was M.P. for Devizes, 1918-1923. In other words he won the seat on the Khaki election.

The Colonel said that he moved the resolution because the headmaster of an elementary school at Pewsey, Wiltshire, who was granted exemption from military service as a conscientious objector, refused to do Home Guard duties. This refusal was causing great indignation among members of the Pewsey Home Guard. Colonel Bell added:.

"Some people object to sending their children to that school, which is under the auspices of a man who, in their opinion, holds unpatriotic, disloyal and abominable opinions."

Colonel Fuller is 77, a bachelor and an ex-M.F.H.

Councillor F. J. King, of Swindon, rightly challenged the legality of the resolution.

He averred that he was a conscientious objector in the last war. He had two sons who had been granted exemption on conscientious grounds in this war.

The resolution was illegal. The spirit behind it was the spirit of Goebbels and Corporal Adolf Hitler.

This Wiltshire resolution is a kind of bad date sandwish between a decision of the Appellate Tribunal in Edinburgh, given on January 28, 1943, and an address to the Birmingham N.F.S. made by Divisional Officer Walters of Central Birmingham on March 3, 1943.

The Edinburgh Appellate Tribunal modified, to suit the wishes of the appellant, the conditional exemption granted by the local Tribunal to an honours graduate of Glasgow University, John M. Aitenhead, Kilquharisty House, Castle Douglas, founder of an "unorthodox" non-punishment, children-responsibility school. The local tribunal made the condition full-time work in agriculture or forestry. The Appellate Tribunal agreed that he should carry on his present educational work, and part-time agricultural work—as he had been doing.

Conscientious objectors in the N.F.S. have done extremely good work, said Divisional Officer Walters, of Central Birmingham Division, at a meeting, in Birmingham, on March 3, 1943, of members of the former Birmingham Fire Brigade, who were instructors to thousands of Auxiliary Fire Service men.

They have pulled their weight with the rest and are interested and capable in actual fire work.

Ann S. Chalkley, an actress, appeared before a London Tribunal, on March 2, 1943.

She had been playing in Shakespeare for a considerable time, and acted throughout the raids. She was a strict vegetarian and believed that no one had the right to take human life.

The Chairman (Judge Hargreaves) said the tribunal thought applicant had a sincere conscientious objection and directed her to continue her work in serious drama. If the work ended, she must do either hospital, Civil Defence, or land work.

On June 23, 1943, the South-East Conscientious Objector's Tribunal in Edinburgh registered Dr. Philippa M. Ludlam, Tyne Lodge, Grange Loan, Edinburgh, as a conscientious objector on condition that she remained in her work in the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary Maternity Pavilion.

Dr. Ludlam is 26 years of age. She qualified when she was 24.

Questioned about work in the R.A.M.C., she replied:

If I joined that Corps I would be an accessory to what I feel to be wrong—namely, taking part in an Army organisation.

The Duke of Bedford made a splendid factual speech on the position of C.O.s in the House of Lords on January 18. An excellent summary of the Duke's speech and Lord Croft's reply appears in the C.B.C.O. Bulletin for January 1944. Obtainable from this office. The Duke's speech is being produced in pamphlet form and will be on sale this month. Post Free, price 3d.

On July 29, 1943, Douglas Frank Springhall (62), described as an organiser, who had been committed from Bow Street, London, earlier in the month, was sentenced at the Old Bailey to seven years penal servitude after a trial in camera.

The Daily Worker published the following report of this case:—

Douglas Frank Springhall, 42, was sentenced at the Old Bailey yesterday to seven years' penal servitude after a trial in camera.

The Charge against him was of obtaining from Olive Sheehan, an Air Ministry employee, information in respect to munitions of war; and obtaining from her for a purpose prejudicial to the interests and safety of the State information calculated to be useful to the enemy.

Passing sentence in public, Mr. Justice Oliver said that on the basis of Springhall's record it was not likely that his purpose to communicate these things to Germany.

The capitalist press gave the judge's address, when passing sentence, in great detail. We quote from the Glasgow Evening Citizen:—

Mr. Justice Oliver, passing sentence in public, said:

"The jury has convicted you on the most detestable offence of worming vital secrets for the protection of our own fighting men from a Government department by means of a little woman clerk.

"I do not think on your record that it is likely that your purpose was to communicate these things to Germany, but to communicate them to some one I have no doubt whatever was your purpose."

But if the information was not to be communicated to the Nazi Government or the Axis Powers to whom was it to be communicated? And what was Springhall's record?

Mr. Frankel (Labour) raised the question in the House of Commons on Thursday, August 5, when he referred to "the sentence of seven years' imprisonment on a national organiser of the Communist Party for espionage."

In his reply, Herbert Morrison stated:—

At the time of his arrest at the Communist Party headquarters in London Mr. D. F. Springhall was national organiser of the Communist Party. He had been a member of the Central Committee since 1932 and of the Political Bureau since 1930. He was therefore prominently associated with the leadership of the party. . . .

Pressed to state whether he accepted Harry Pollitt's statement that the Communist Party had no knowledge of Springhall's activities, Herbert Morrison replied correctly that the Communist Party would not admit complicity in any case. This caused Gallacher to denounce Frankel as "the disreputable stooge" and to refer to Morrison's "own mouldy character." All of which was irrelevant abuse, a manifestation of mental unquiet, and no reply to the accurate commentary made on this case by the Home Secretary.

Shinwell asked if the Home Secretary had evidence to justify the suggestion that the Communist Party was responsible officially for acts of espionage, Morrison replied that the facts spoke for themselves. This brought Gallacher to life again with the statement that the case was tried in camera, and that, if tried in public, the sentence could not have been passed.

Gallacher said: "They would never have got away with the sentence. It is a dirty bit of business."

It is obvious for whom the information was wanted. The "dirty bit of business" describes, not the trial in camera, and the sentence in public, but the entire career, history, and present activity of the Communist Party. By boycott and contempt, the workers should destroy this nefarious and disgraceful subsidised criminal conspiracy against the liberties of mankind and the decencies of the social struggle—the Communist Party. It s Pollitts and Gallachers, these kind defenders of the criminal Moscow trials, these apologists for the assassination of Socialists and Anarchists, should be swept into oblivion.

This was the obvious deduction from the Springhall trial in July 1943. Emphasis was given to this conclusion on Monday, November 8, 1943, when the daily press published the following official report of the sequel to the Springhall trial and conviction:—

CAPTAIN JAILED FOR SEVEN YEARS

TOLD SECRETS "TO SHOW FAITH"

For betraying secrets to the former national organiser of the Communist Party in Britain, Lieut. (temporary Captain) Ormond Leyton Uren has been cashiered by sentence of a general court-martial and sent to seven years' penal servitude.

The War Office, announcing this last night, said that the court-martial was held secretly on October 21.

Captain Uren betrayed the secrets to Springhall. The charge against Uren was that:—

Between April 9 and September 24, 1942, for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interest of the State, he communicated to Springhall information of a highly secret character which he had acquired in the course of his official duties, and which was calculated to be or might be directly or indirectly useful to an enemy.

Uren joined the army in November, 1939, and was commissioned in May 1940. He served in an infantry unit until May, 1942, when he was posted to special duties.

At his trial Uren described how he was attracted by the activities of the Communist Party. He told a friend how he regretted being isolated from the opportunity of co-operating or doing anything practical to give concrete expression to his sympathy with the party's aims. This friend introduced him to Springhall who was national organiser of the Communist Party of Britain.

Uren had several meetings with Springhall who asked him to prepare a written report of his life history, education and political and social background. This Uren did.

During these meetings Springhall questioned Uren about his work, and asked him to produce a written description of the lay-out of the establishment in which he was working.

Uren gave Springhall a typewritten document containing this and other highly-secret information.

Springhall questioned Uren about his work and also about future military operations. Uren was unable to give him information about operations.

At his trial, replying to the defending officer Uren said:

I disclosed the information to Springhall to show him I had complete faith in him and that he could have complete trust in me as a sincere believer in Communism.

A meeting between Uren and Springhall was to have taken place on the evening of June 17, 1943. Springhall did not keep that appointment because he was arrested on the morning of that day and charged under the Official Secrets Act of 1911 with obtaining information from Olive Sheenan, as stated above.

On the same day, November 8, 1943, as it published the report of Captain Uren's conviction and sentence, the "Scottish Daily Express" published the following paragraph concerning Stalin:—

STALIN NOW WEARS JEWELS.

MOSCOW, Sunday.—A half-page photograph of Marshal Stalin, published in the anniversary number of Pravda, shows him wearing two stars.

One is the gold encrusted with diamonds and other jewels. The other is silver.

He has shoulder stripes and a collar embroidered with gold.

This is probably the first time he has worn jewels.—B.U.P.

All of which the Communist Party admires and defends.

On Monday, December 20, 1943, an official Soviet Government Broadcast from Moscow stated:—

The Council of People's Commissars has decided that the present words do not reflect the basic changes that have taken place in our country as the result of the victories of the Soviet system, and do not express the Socialist content of the Soviet State.

Accordingly, the council has decided on a new text which corresponds to the spirit and content of the Soviet system.

A translation of the International substitute was published in Comrade Beaverbrook's organ on Tuesday, December 21, 1943. It read:—

ANTHEM OF THE SOVIET UNION.

An indestructible union of free republics,
Russia the great has forged forever;
Long live the Soviet Union, indivisible and powerful,
Created by the will of its peoples.

REFRAIN

Glory to our Free Fatherland,
The trusty bulwark of the People's Banner,
Will lead us on from victory to victory.
The sun of liberty shone upon us;

The great Lenin lit up our way.
Stalin has brought us up in faithfulness to the people,
And has inspired us for work and great deeds.

We have brought up an army in battles,
We will sweep the treacherous invaders from our path
We decide in battles the fate of generations,
We will lead our country on to glory.

The music for this Soviet State anthem is by Alexandrov and the words are by Sargi Mikhalkov and I. Registan. This anthem is to come into general use on March 15. It is merely a bad parody of the British—or is it only English?—"Land of Hope and Glory." The words of this refrain may be patriotic stupidity, but at least the music has a swing and it has rhythm.

On that day, musing on the studied betrayal of the working class struggle alike in capitalist peace-time and capitalist war-time, the consciously libertarian workers of the world will rejoice to have "The International" freed from the contamination that has belonged to it during the years of Soviet counter-revolution and dictatorial reaction that it has been deemed the Russian National Anthem. Once more it will become the hymn of revolutionary Socialism and proletarian challenge and world liberation. Once more at our Socialist meetings we may sing, in Britain and America and all English speaking countries, our translation of the bold words written in 1874 by Eugene Pothier, who fought in the Paris Commune, and set to brave music by Pierre Degeyter, the blacksmith of Lille:—

Arise ye starvelings from your slumbers,
Arise, ye criminals of want,
For reason in revolt now thunders,
And at last ends the age of cant.

Then away will all superstitions,
Servile masses arise, arise;
We'll change forthwith the old conditions,
And spurn the dust to win the prize.

REFRAIN

Then comrades, come rally
And the last fight let us face,
The Internationale unites the human race.

To do this is to oppose Socialism and proletarian struggle against the graft and corruption of National "Communism," and dictatorial careerist opportunism. "Communism," as represented by the Communist Party, is but the cowardly irresponsible self-seeking exploitation of the energies and wrongs of the proletariat seeking emancipation from the sorrow, anguish, starvation and sudden deaths of class society. "Communism" is Socialism transformed into a social iniquity one degree lower than normal capitalist superstition, hypocrisy profit-mongering and blood-letting. It is the devil fascinated by a mockery of revolution into a charlatanism of majesty and a realism of human sacrifice. It is the world's night of sadist delight. And it must be opposed by every Socialist libertarian and every true citizen of the world, every humanist wishing to redeem mankind from war and error and corruption.

WHAT I BELIEVE

By Rev. CHARLES H. COLE

(Minister, High Street Unitarian Christian Church, Portsmouth; Chairman, Portsmouth P.P.U.; Minister, Humanist Society of Friends.)

I would like to preface this article by acknowledging the courtesy of the Editor in permitting me to express myself in this way in "The Word," and his kindness in introducing me to the American Humanist Society of Friends; and to the latter for adding my name to its ministerial list—a recognition which is greatly appreciated.

It seemed fitting to me, and the Editor readily agreed, that I should take this opportunity to present an outline of my present beliefs to my friends here and overseas, and I can only hope that this account of my philosophy of Life will be of some interest to those who may read it, and help in promoting a friendly understanding between us.

It is not claimed that there is anything very original in what follows—"There is no new thing under the sun." It summarises simply the conclusions arrived at about Religion and Life in general after some thirty years of reading and reflection. Need I add that these beliefs are not stated as final Dogmas, but as to-day's tentative, though sincerely held convictions. In this respect I hope I shall be always willing to try to follow Emerson's dictum in speech and writing: "Say to-day what you now think in hard words, and to-morrow speak about what to-morrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict everything you say to-day." In this spirit, then, I offer the following account of what I believe:

I believe in Life: My conviction is that the most important discovery we can make about ourselves is—that we are alive, so that we can say with Longfellow:

"Through every nerve, through every vein,
Through every fibre of my brain
I feel the electric thrill—the Touch of LIFE."

and with Bergson:

"I feel myself to be one of the million centres of energy in that one vast stream of energy—LIFE."

I believe in Life—that Life in which I live and move and have my being and which lives and moves in me; that Power which, throughout the centuries has enabled man to grow and develop "in co-operation with the spirit of evolutionary progress."

The world it seems, was made for one purpose—for Life. Maybe it often appears to be laden with evil and sorrow; none the less it sustains also, all that is best in the world—human brotherhood, Love and Hope.

And I believe that this vital energy, Life, is the only creative power in the Universe. I know of no other Power which has made me and which sustains me. As H. G. Wells has written:

"Age by age, through gulfs of time at which imagination reels, Life has been growing from a mere striving in the intertidal slime towards freedom, power and consciousness."

Of the origin of Life I know nothing—nor do I believe I can know anything. But of this I am convinced; that Life does not appear to have happened suddenly upon earth. What records there are, and what we now know, shows that "Life grew and—grows." And myself and all the children of men, and all that lives, are the product of this ceaseless, creative, vital energy—life.

From which it follows:—

I believe in the universality of Life: The essential Oneness of all mankind—the Brotherhood of all living things. The sharers of this Life are—One. Next to the importance of the discovery that we are alive is the conviction that we are a part of the Universal Life; which conviction compels us to accept the obligation of co-operating with all that Lives. I belong to the Fellowship of Life. And Life, in its upward surging, is compelling men to replace an evil individualism with this communal ethic. The forces stirring within man, which are the elemental forces of Life itself, arising from the very depths of his cosmic nature are forever urging him on to reach "Life's final star—Brotherhood."

I believe in the evolutionary conception of Life: We came hither, trailing not clouds of glory from Heaven, but from the lowest orders of Life. We are the result of an orderly evolution; and I believe that in the evolutionary process we will progress, continue to change and grow until we become quite literally—a new creation. I have said I know nothing about the origin of Life; neither do I know anything about its ending—if indeed there will be an end at all. I know simply that Life evolves and I believe its one increasing purpose is to change Life's Winter into Spring. But as A. H. Clough has aptly put it:

"Where lies the land to which the ships would go?
Far, far ahead, is all her seamen know.
And where the land she travels from? Away,
Far, far behind, is all that they can say."

All we can do is to observe, and to find and play our part in the evolutionary process, and watch "the foaming wake far widening as we go."

I believe in the immortality of Life: Beyond stating the belief I do not care to venture. Life appears to me to be eternal—"a never ebbing sea." And so belief in immortality is therefore a reasonable belief; but I do not think it wise for us to spend too much time in guessing about what happens to us after death. Said Spinoza: "The proper study of the wise man is not how to die, but how to live"; and my Religion is a religion of Life and for Life. I hope neither for the traditional Heaven nor fear the traditional hell; and yet I believe "that Life is ever lord of death," and I have a conviction that will not be denied, which affirms:

"If my bark sink, 'tis to another sea."

I believe in God: But not in a personal God possessing human attributes. I have said I believe in Life, that Life is the one compellingly, creative, co-operative, eternal Power of which I know anything; and that Life is evolutionary in its working and progressive in its purpose; and for me, that Life is God—"God's Life," which is working in and through the universe for the development of an ever-broadening channel bringing a more abundant Life to all. For me, that is enough—Life—the Universe— God if you will allow me—"some call it Evolution and others call it God"—is with me and for me and means well by me. That beneficial Life-force I choose to call God and my faith and service is centred in that "Power—not ourselves—that makes for Righteousness.

I believe that Jesus was one of the greatest Religious leaders who has ever lived; and that his message is still a Gospel of good news for those who have ears to hear and minds to understand. So far as his teaching is concerned I know how difficult it is to separate the wheat from the chaff; I know as has been well said that "there were Christs before him and Christs after him"; I know that he was altogether a human being; I know we shall have to rescue him from his friends in whose households he has been sadly wounded; and yet I believe, so far at least as our Western world is concerned which is steeped in the Christian tradition, that if we could but "find him, understand him and follow him," we would discover a way of life that would transform our society. I am not interested in Christianity as a theological system, but I do believe that if we had more of the spirit of the Great Galilean in our hearts, we would vastly improve conditions in the affairs of our National and International life.

I believe that the individual reason and conscience are the most reliable authorities for human conduct; and that their authority provides a better guide and a truer sanction than any Church or Creed—any Bible or Priest—any external authority at all. Which is not to say that these lesser authorities are rejected out of hand and entirely disregarded. "I seek the Truth by which no man was ever injured." But I find no external infallibility. The Church has often been wrong, the world's Bible are of human origin, and although their writings contain much that is wise and true, they contain also a great deal that is foolish and false; traditional creeds are often found to be untenable in the light of modern knowledge; and Priests and Parsons are not always reliable guides. We do not say anything against the proper use and enjoyment of the deposit of goodness and truth that is to be found in all these agencies—but we do say that that only has final authority for a man in the sphere of morals which is certified by his own mind as being reasonable and true and approved by his conscience as being right and good. As Sir R. P. Paranjpye has said: "The realisation of our highest ideals will be brought nearer if more and more citizens allow themselves the free use of their reason, unfettered by dogmas, prescription or the fiats of priests or ministers of religion and follow the dictates of their rational faculty in action." I would only add that if their reasoned decisions are endorsed by conscience, they have all the justification they need for their behaviour. When reason allows and conscience affirms human conduct a man can afford to declare of all lesser authorities—"They say; what do they say? Let them say!"

I believe in Democracy—and by Democracy I mean a political and social order wherein men, by real co-operation with one another are enabled to attain to the fullest and freest development possible of their various capacities and powers for the good life—so that a full, free and happy life is made possible for each and all. The political and economic machinery necessary for the building of a Democracy will be devised when the inward will of individual men and women desires it shall, when the inward urge of the Democratic spirit and temper has created a sufficient number of free and humane persons to demand it. Such men and women will devise the methods required for the attainment of the Democratic Ideal, and the forms in which to embody and express it. Broadly speaking, the choice before men to-day is Democracy or Despotism—Fellowship or Death. My choice is for Democracy, and I believe that Life, as has already been said, in its upward striving is compelling us to make that same decision.

I believe in World Peace through World War Resistance; and the maintenance of World Peace by the removal of the causes of war, and the re-organisation of the world's social economy as the basis of justice, goodwill and co-operation. The determination of the people of the world to refuse to fight, and their equal determination to establish a new World Order will finally vanquish the greatest of all evils—war.

I believe in freedom of speech, writing and assembly: with Wendell Phillips I assert that

"the community which does not protect its worst and most hated member in the free utterance of his opinions, no matter how false or hateful, is only a gang of slaves."

This freedom is essential to human progress, for only by free discussion do we arrive at the truth upon which progress is built. Besides, no man is wise enough or good enough to exercise the power of censorship over another, and to say what another shall see or hear or think. All censorship laws, and all regulations which are designed to limit a man in the free expression of his opinions, should be repealed—or we confess ourselves to be a nation of slaves.

Well, these are some of the beliefs I hold. I have not always held them and I may yet be compelled to exchange them for others. You may agree with all of them, with some of them or with none of them. But that does not matter—I am content to have told you about some of those convictions which move and control me in my life to-day and shall be encouraged if this recital of them urges you to make an inventory of your beliefs and to clarify the ideas by which you live.

So, like Professor T. V. Smith:

"I lapse again into silence leaving you alone, pondering, if it be so the major moral of the best wise men—the moral that in the conduct of life there is no guide like oneself."

Which, as you will have observed from all I have written, is what I believe.

CATHOLICS AND THE WAR

CATHOLIC PEACE SOCIETY.

Provisional Suggestions.
(Official title of Society is under consideration)

The increasing savagery of this war and in particular the brutality of the air war, has convinced many Catholics of the need for a Catholic Peace Society. It is hoped that such a society may shortly be formed with objects broadly as indicated below:—

1. To work for a peace founded on justice, reconciliation and charity such as has so often been urged by Pope Pius XII and to try to prevent the outbreak of another war after this one has ended.
2. Because it is particularly evil that Catholics, who are all members of Christ's Body the Church, should make war against each other as they are unhappily doing at present, the Society would hope eventually to co-operate with Catholic Peace Societies abroad.
3. To co-operate as far as possible with other Peace Societies at home without, however, binding the Society to any specific political party or social movement.
4. Arrangements would be made for group meetings to discuss the teaching of Catholic theologians on peace and war, for the interchange of speakers and for the circulation of newsletters and pamphlets.
5. Membership would be open to practising Catholics over the age of 15 of any nationality. Members would be encouraged to be true to their religion and to practise it devoutly. They would be reminded of the power of prayer and of the inestimable value of frequent communion. Members would be exhorted to seek peace in their daily lives, to strive to heal all quarrels and readily to forgive personal injuries.

Further suggestions will be appreciated.

To Mr. Henry Coldham, 30 St. Margaret's Street, Bradford-on-Avon, Wilts.

I am interested in the proposal for the formation of a Catholic Peace Society and shall ge glad if you will keep me informed regarding this.

CATHOLIC YOUTH AND WAR

The young Catholics distinguish between just and unjust war, though they are not very clear as to where the difference lies. They differ from many non-Catholic young objectors in their motive power. No young man should consider himself superior to his companion, who obeys the call to arms. Yes, he may be very much his inferior for there is a poor, feeble, unmanly Pacifism from bodily weakness or sham Pacifism from cowardice. Such are contemptible and it gives one food for thought that one of the young men of the other camp, Max Boudy, says "I have never found a Pacifist whose Pacifism inspired him with such inner beauty as I have found in several men for whom war, under any circumstances was a reasonable, justifiable, if tragic necessity." Such remarks must be taken seriously. They impose inner and outer obligations. If it is not to be a bloodless intellectualism or a weak, cowardly quietism, or a luxurious epicureanism, Pacifism must lay very great stress on bodily discipline, on culture, on bodily and mental development.

More than all, he who opposes war must be inwardly clean. His passion for justice must not be tainted by hidden uncleanness As long as Pacifists are in the minority let them begin with a steady fight against all that is evil in themselves.

So we see that the Catholic associations of the young against war are based on religious and moral motives.

The spirit of the Gospel is their moving power and it demands a strong spirit of sacrifice. From the negative side it is the conviction that modern warfare, based as it is, on hatred, revenge and greed, is criminal with its brutal methods and terrible results. Its formula in normal theology is the doubtfulness of the cause justa and the intentio recta—that good is furthered and evil hindered—the absence of the debitus modus—of the four conditions stipulated by Suarez and Bellarmin for the justification of war, "that it should be conducted within the limits of justice and love."

This conviction as to war has not been learnt by Catholic youth from ecclesiastical lore, or even from books of moral theology They have learnt it from nature, from their hearts, and from the Sacred Heart itself. But being convinced that both nature and Christ are opposed to modern warfare they seek with their whole soul for the Church's support for their position. "We hope that war will be overcome through the Church and even if, after two thousand years, this hope is unfulfilled we still hope and go on knocking at the door like the importunate man in the Gospel." This knocking at the door of their Church from Love of Peace and love of their fellow man and love of Christ, has something stirring in it. Just as faithful Catholics wait with pious impatience for the definition of dogma, which has long belonged to the "Faith-Consciousness" of the Church, so and more fervently innumerable Catholics are waiting for a moral definition about war, for a decisive word as to its immorality."

WELSH BOOK REVIEW.

A book in Welsh on Peace, "Ffordd Tangnefedd" (The Path of Peace). Edited by Simon B. Jones and E. Lewis Evans; published by the Peace Society of Welsh Congregationalists and printed by J. D. Lewis & Sons, Llandyssul, Garmarthenshire, with a foreword by Professor John Morgan Jones (Bangor). 5/- post free, from the printers.

To those who read Welsh this volume is an inspiration; and to those who, in addition, base their antagonism to War on Christian principles it is one of the most daring, uncompromising and comforting books on Peace published in the vernacular for a decade.

It is arranged in twenty chapters each from the pen of a similar number of divines, preachers and literatteurs who occupy an exalted place in the life of the Welsh people. In addition, it contains more than twenty appropriate efforts in rhyme by the leading Welsh poets, including the present Arch-druid and the ex-Archdruid. One of the chapters, by an authority on the subject, probes into the economic, commercial, financial and territorial causes of modern wars, including the present catastrophe. Each chapter is in the form of a Sermon.

But whatever the argument or method of approach to Peace the background of each of these eminent writers is the same; it is the challenge of the Christian faith. They repel vigorously on every page the use of Force as a weapon to settle either domestic or international quarrels; they cry aloud for ending this War at once by negotiation and compromise.

This, of course, is in the best tradition of the Welsh pulpit; and those who are conversant with the history of this imaginative race feel when reading this publication the agony of War smiting the prophets of the New Evangel and the anguish that comes to them by witnessing some of their own brethren in the battledress of the Old.

There have ben many booklets and pamphlets published on Peace in Welsh during this War, but this is the largest effort and probably the most devastating attack on militarism, jingoism and, indeed, imperialism yet made in that language.

Let it be noted that this is Volume ONE; this would seem to indicate that the publishers intend pursuing the good work on to further Volumes.

Some of the contributors are drawn from other denominations as well; leaders of the Welsh Baptists, Calvinistic Methodists, Wesleyans and Unitarians all find a niche in these pages.

Finally, this is an emphatic declaration for the majesty of Conscience; it is Christianity triumphant!

THE LABOUR PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP

Dear Comrade,

We the undersigned members of the Executive Committee of the Labour Pacifist Fellowship are desirous of forming a regional group of the Fellowship in the North of England. It is intended that this group shall meet at an agreed place which is central and convenient for all members. Also we hope local groups of the L.P. F. will be established in the big cities at least, and in other districts where possible.

We are anxious to contact all pacifists active in the Labour Movement, and those who have dropped out because of difference with the party policy on the war. Also we wish to get in touch with politically unattached Pacifist Socialists who are willing to join the L.P.F. Pacifist members of the Co-operative Party, Fabian Society, and Trade Unions affiliated to the Labour Party are eligible for full membership, and we hope they will join our ranks and work for the cause of Socialism and Peace.

In days like the present it is desirable and essential that all Pacifist Socialists should be meeting and working together to advance the ideals of Socialist Internationalism throughout the land and to advance the principles of Pacifism inside the Labour Movement.

The Labour Pacifist Fellowship exists to carry out this important work.

JOIN US NOW and help in the march towards democratic Socialism and International Peace.

"Then comrades come rally
The last fight let us face
The International unites the human race."

Yours fraternally,

ARCHER STIRK,

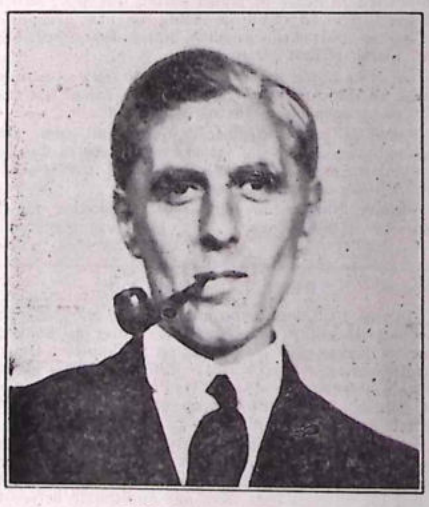
October 15, 1943.

My dear Friend Aldred,

It is indeed a genuine delight to receive your letter of September 9th relative to the Unitarian, Humanist, and Pacifist activity at Portsmouth of our good ministerial friend, Rev. Charles H. Cole. It begins to look as if the Humanist Society of Friends had come into being "for such a time as this," to paraphrase an old Hebrew expression regarding Queen Esther in the Old Testament.

Brother Cole's training, experience and general background, marks him as exactly the type of man we Humanists welcome as our Ministers. We are proud of the excellent work you are doing. Please accept our most hearty congratulations. More power to you! This makes three Ordained Humanist Friends Ministers in the British Isles. I am enclosing the Official Ordination Certificate for Rev. C. H. Cole.

You will be interested to know that we have just appointed Hon. A. Hall Skelton, of Auckland, New Zealand, as Superintendent of New Zealand. He is proceeding to legally establish our Society in his beautiful country.



CHARLES H. COLE

Unitarian Minister and Pacifist Propagandist.

We note from his letters, and your account of him in "The Word," that the Rev. W. Bottomley, now of Melbourne, Australia, is Humanistically inclined. He belongs to the ranks of the Unitarian Ministers who signed the American Humanist Manifesto in 1933 and work to-day both as Humanist and Unitarian Ministers, identifying Unitarianism with Humanism. Which is rational, logical, and inevitable. Unitarism must redefine itself as Humanism or collapse as an irrational concept of Theism, too closely governed by the traditions of the Trinitarian Churches. The Humanist Society of Friends proposes to contact Mr. Bottomley, with a view to his ordination as a Humanist Minister. Perhaps Brother Bottomley, with his great and consistent activity, his radio services to Humanism and Unitarianism, his repudiation by the more orthodox and narrow war-minded Unitarian body in England responsible for "The Inquirer" and its Anti-Christian war tone and commentary, would be the natural and logical person to invite to act as Superintendent for Australia.

In Britain, we feel that the Society ought to recognise the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., now of Coventry, and formerly of your city. Richard Lee has contributed powerful essays to the Humanist magazines in the United States and we have read with appreciation his splendid essays in your paper. We have noted some of his social work as a pacifist, his tireless loyalty to the conscientious objectors' cause, and his uncompromising loyalty to Socialist ideals. He is a very great man indeed. We sympathise with him deeply in his bereavements.

I am glad to know that you have received the corrected copy of my "Conscription of Conscience" and that you have the publication of this work in hand.

Will close now, with every good wish and sicerest regards to you and yours, and to the Duke of Bedford in his magnificent stand for peace and justice and human well-being throughout the world.

Sincerely and fraternally,

LOWELL H. COATE
(Supt. Humanist Society of Friends.)

In becoming a Minister of the Humanist Society of Friends, the Rev. Charles H. Cole joined a distinguished company of Unitarian Ministers and scholars, beginning with William Johnson Fox, M.P.

Comrade Cole has maintained boldly the cause of Pacifism in Portsmouth since early in 1939. He offers the direct contrast to the over-age conscientious objectors who occupy political positions of distinction as directors of warfare in the councils of Government alike in Britain and New Zealand to-day. He served in the last war and from experience in France and Egypt developed a strong opposition to war.

Charles H. Cole's pacifist activities in Britain since the declaration of the present war, has included speaking tours in many parts of England for the Peace Pledge Union. He is now Chairman of the Portsmouth Group (P.P.U.), Secretary of the local Advisory Bureau for C.O.s; and Chairman of the Hampshire District Committee of the Southern Regional Board for C.O.s.

In this issue, for the benefit of new readers, we republish from our columns for September, 1942, a picture of comrade Cole in uniform, taken in Cairo in 1916, whilst "on active service" with the New Zeland Expeditionary Force.

In 1935, comrade Cole was the unsuccessful L.L.P. candidate for the City Council, at Christchurch, and polled nearly 5000 votes. One local paper summarised his career at the time of his canditature as follows:—

C. H. COLE: Mr. Cole, the eldest of the four nominees, is a returned soldier, having seen service both in Egypt and France. He was educated for the ministry, but after serving four years as minister of the Baptist Church in St. Albans, he resigned to take up the position of secretary to the "No More War Movement" in Christchurch. Mr. Cole is President of the Canterbury International Relations Club, secretary to the Free Religious Movement, and also the secretary to the Canterbury Unemployment Workers' Association.

Another Christchurch paper described the work attempted and achieved by comrade Cole on behalf of the relief workers in Christchurch. It related an incident when he led a deputation of relief workers and their wives to the City Hall. The Rev. J. K. Archer, then Deputy Mayor of Christchurch, left the building without seeing the deputation, and excused himself by declaring: "Mr. Cole is an irresponsible person.".

In March, 1929, Mr. H. Ormrod, Secretary of the New Zealand Baptist Young Men's Bible Class Union, put the seal on Mr. Cole's work as a Baptist pastor in a letter that expressed the hearty thanks of the Union to "Pastor C. H. Cole, St. Albans Christchurch."

In February, 1938, as a passport of introduction to Pacifist and Socialist comrades in Britain, comrade Cole received a letter of introduction "To Whom It May Concern" from Mr. N. M. Bell, M.A., B.D., Chairman of the No More War Movement of New Zealand and editor of Cosmos, the N.Z. Pacifist Quarterly.

Mr. Bell stated:—

The bearer of this letter is Mr. C. H. Cole, who is a member of the No More War Movement of New Zealand and of the Free Religious Movement of Christchurch. Mr. Cole held the office of secretary in N.M.W.M. and was closely associated with myself in carrying on the F.R.M. Previously he was a Baptist minister. He has had various experience, being at one period closely associated with the unemployed workers' movement in this city. . . . Mr. Cole . . . during the last 15 years . . . has travelled all over New Zeleand on peace work and is fully acquainted with the conditions of the peace movement in the Dominion.

In its issue for March, 1936, Cosmos published a full account of the work of the Christchurch Socialist Guild of Youth, founded in May, 1932, of which comrade Cole was the leader. This Guild used the British Socialist Sunday School Hymn Book.

In London, comrade Cole spoke in Lindsey Hall, The Mall, Notting Hill Gate, under the auspices of the Free Religious Movement. The leader of the Movement at that time was the Rev. William Hayes, now Minister of the Unitarian Church at Maidstone. In its calendar for September to December, 1938, the Free Religious Movement welcomed Mr. Cole in the following note:—

Our visiting speaker, Mr. C. H. Cole, will give addresses on October 9th, November 13th and December 11th. For ten years Mr. Cole has been associated with Mr. N. M. Bell, M.A., B.D., in the Leadership of the Free Religious Movement in New Zealand. And Mr. Bell started with direct inspiration from Dr. Walsh. The teaching of the F.R.M. has girdled the globe!

Dr. Walsh, then well known as Minister of the Free Religious Movement in Dundee, succeeded our friend and one-time Theistic teacher, the late Rev. Charles Voysey, B.A., as Minister of the Theistic Church, London. Voysey's Theism and its traditions were impossible to Walter Walsh and actually he ought never to have agreed to succeed him in the pulpit. Voysey's Theism was wholly alien to Walsh's cast of mind. Anyway, Walsh broke with Theistic traditions and established the Free Religious Movement. The Theistic Church, shrunk to complacent dullness with the passing of the years, and the absence of Voysey's dynamic personality, carries on with a kind of timid Unitarian approach Voysey despised. This does not mean to say that we applaud Voysey's Theism. On the contrary, we approve of Unitarian Humanism as being sound philisophy and true Unitarianism.

In the Programme of Subjects of the Free Religious Movement comrade Cole's approach was indicated as follows:—

October 9—SOME PERSONAL CONVICTIONS.

Mr. C. H. Cole, joint Leader of Christchurch (N.Z.) F.R.M., will give an outline of some conclusions about Religion and Life.

November 13—THE REAL REVOLUTION.

Mr. C. H. Cole will show that there is only one Revolution. That Revolution signifies a change of mind. To what?

December 11—THE DIVINE NEED OF THE REBEL.

Mr. C. H. Cole will tell what happens when a devoted soul with high moral purpose allows the currents of the Universal Being to flow through him.

The motto for the Free Religious Movement at this period was taken from the Buddhist Scripture:—

"As a mother so long as she lives watches over her only child, so among all beings let boundless goodwill, unmixed with enmity, prevail throughout the world."

When comrade Cole left New Zealand in 1938, he intended to return in 1940. Instead he passed to the charge, as a lay minister, of the Portsmouth Unitarian Church, early in 1939. With the consent of his congregation, he continues his work as an ordained Humanist Minister.

Comrade Cole's ordination is the direct consequence of the wide circulation in the United States of our Humanist pamphlet, Why Jesus Wept, and the growing American interest in The Word.

On the outbreak of the present war, on Sunday, September 3 1939, comrade Cole made a personal confession of pacifist faith from the pulpit of this church, in which he quoted at length from Dick Sheppard's pamphlet, The Christian Attitude to War. He quoted verses from Canon Stuart Morris denouncing "Conscripting Christianity" and the "old unfaiths."

Stuart Morris's very clear statement on individual Christian testimony and a great part of comrade Cole's pulpit confession, I Renounce War appeared in these columns for September, 1942. We make a small excerpt from that address since it bears repetition:—

I had hoped that never again would I have to face a similar issue to that which I faced in 1914; but now, twenty-five years later, the necessity to do is forced upon me and upon us all.

When I definitely became a pacifist, I mentally resolved, that if another war should come and I found myself then in a position of leadership and responsibility, particularly as the minister of a Church and the leader of a congregation, I would immediately make clear my own attitude and position. That resolution I must now honour, as a duty I feel I owe both to myself and to you. . . .

I shall not enter now into the pros and cons of the War. In any case, it is extremely doubtful whether we know enough of the true facts concerning what has led us into it, which would enable us to properly understand and estimate the real situation. Probably, as in the last Great War, the truth will not emerge until long afterwards:—just now we remember Lord Ponsonby's dictum, that "the first casualty in wartime is Truth."

I am one of those who believe that all war, for whatever purpose, is wrong—a crime against humanity and a denial of all true Religion which is based on belief in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

And I declare I shall not support, nor participate in this or indeed in any war, in any way whatsoever.

My pacifism is based primarily upon my Christian beliefs. . . .

If individual Christians would everywhere make that confession, the churches would be compelled and would have the power, to make it impossible for their Governments to continue to wage war.

In his Armistice Day Address, 1940, comrade Cole again analysed the cause and futility of war, and repeated his Pacifist declaration of faith.

On Sunday, November 9, 1941, Armistice Sunday, the Portsmouth Unitarian Church was crowded out for a United Service of Pacifist Witness which was conducted by comrade Charles Cole, supported by a member of the P.P.U. and of the F.O.R. In the congregation were members of these bodies and of Baptist, Methodist, Congregational and Anglican Churches and the Society of Friends. It was a great demonstration of Religious Unity, as well as an encouraging witness to Pacifist conviction in this "Army and Navy" city.

During 1943, as Chairman of the Portsmouth Group, Peace Pledge Union, comrade Cole addressed the following strong letter of protest against the corruption of education by war propaganda of various kinds to the President of the Board of Education, Members of the Portsmouth Education Committee, Members of the National Union of Teachers, etc:—

We beg to submit our protest as follows against the invasion of our schools by the various campaigns for War Savings which are held from time to time.

In marked contrast with the custom in Germany and Russia, we in Great Britain have always been proud to claim that we would not allow propaganda into our schools. We claimed that our children were given an unbiased education and were encouraged to think out freely their attitude to religion, politics, economics, and international affairs, so that they would become true individuals rather than mass-produced robots.

It must be granted that children are innocent of the crime of causing the present war, but it seems that we are doing our best to let the war injure them in every possible way. Not only do they suffer from air raids, the absence of their fathers, and often of their mothers as well, but also they are being injured psychologically and spiritually by the cruelty and hatred which is produced in them by present-day films and B.B.C. programmes.

Surely, seeing that so much of their life is being ruined by the effects of war and propaganda, we should see to it that at least their school time is free from war propaganda and given entirely to the acquiring of a liberal education? This is the basis of the best civilisation, which can be achieved only if the children are taught to be merciful, sympathetic, understanding, and ready to co-operate with others for the good of mankind as a whole.

To-day, however, we find that our children are being encouraged in our schools to concern themselves with training for war, to hate other nations and rejoice in their destruction, and to give their odd coppers for the purpose of purchasing bombers to mutilate and kill the parents and children of other lands.

The children themselves will have to pay in future years sufficient taxes to raise the interest which is now so glibly offered them — in other words, by refusing to pay for the war by taxes, and relying on loans by the Wings for Victory method, we are ensuring that the adults of to-morrow, the children of to-day, and those as yet unborn, will have to pay for the war for which the adults of to-day are responsible.

By implanting hatred in the minds of our children, we ensure that the future adults will again be subjected to the horrors of war, when we, who encouraged the suspicion and hatred which led to war, have passed out of this life, and away from the consequences of our actions.

Since so much of our children's life is made unpleasant by war let us see that at least their school-life and time is given entirely to education, not to propaganda. The children are not responsible for the war and should be kept as free from its evils as possible. Let taxation cover the whole cost of the war so that the burden may be kept off the backs of our children in the future, and let us prevent hatred and cruelty from perverting our children's minds and creating future insecurity between the nations.

The Portsmouth Unitarian, News-Letter of the Portsmouth Unitarian Church, edited by comrade Cole, for Christmas, 1943, contained an open letter from the editor to his friends concerning Christmas.

Declaring that Christmas is a time of melody and mirth, and avowing that he feels justified in wishing his friends a Christmas made happy by hope—because of the light that once shone and that shines still in the darkness. Except for this hope, Christmas celebrations are a mockery. Powerfully, he indicts war-time Christmas conventional celebration in these words of sorrowing anger:—

"Christians awake! Salute the happy morn." Yes, but a happy morn for whom? Will December 25th, 1943, bring a happy morn to the fighting men opposing one another in the various war fronts facing the grim possibility of annihilation or mutilation at one another's hands? Or to the millions of oppressed, weary and hungry peoples in the occupied countries of Europe and of India? Or to the hundreds of thousands of men and women in Allied and Enemy cities, towns and villages who, because of "enemy" action may have no home in which to celebrate the anniversary? Or to the millions of mourners bereaved through the insatiable demands which Mars —that merciless destroyer—makes upon human life?

Surely no one will expect any of these people to salute the dawning of this year's Christmas day with melody and mirth! And to suggest to them that they should do so would probably strike them as brutal mockery and cynical jeering.

SOUTH PLACE

In the Encyclopaedia Britannica, the article on Unitarianism does not mention South Place Chapel, nor Fox; yet it was in South Place that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was founded. Fox was its first Foreign Secretary. The Unitarians first congregation was organised (1774) in Essex Street, London, by Rev. Theophilus Lindsey. Several small associations developed in the course of the next fifty years and there was established the Unitarian Fund for helping weak Societies. When Fox became minister of South Place Society, he established an Auxiliary Fund, June 29, 1817; and between that date and 1830 South Place assisted about fifty small Unitarian congregations. This was in addition to paying £400 per annum to its own minister, and building South Place Chapel, at a cost of £4146, to which the Unitarian Association contributed only £200.

It was on Wednesday, May 25, 1825, that the Unitarians, gathered from their various Association, discussed in South Place, where they usually met, the project submitted by Fox for union "on a more comprehensive basis." It was agreed to, not without some misgivings, and on the following day, at London Tavern, was organised the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The basis, as we shall see, was Humanist and Comprehensive. The idea was a world religion. Fox defined Christianity as an expression of Unitarianism whereas too many Christians consider Unitarianism but a Christian sect. Fox was right and pioneered the radical progressive Unitarianism.

Only a few Unitarians appreciate the historical significance and honour of the title chosen by Fox. Adoption of the word "Foreign," omission of the word "Christian," denoted a departure in Unitarianism, due not to English but to Indian influences. In the United States this departure is appreciated, not so in Britain. Fox's suggestion had an interesting history. While Fox and others were in agonies of revolution against British idolatry, a Hindu, a really great man, Rammohun Roy, was trying to deliver his countrymen from idolatry. Then he helped to liberate his Christian friends. He inspired the organisation and the title of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Rammohun Roy's movement was of purely Indian origin. A scholar of ancient and high family, and a man of means, he sought knowledge and education, and had studied oriental lore. He had mastered the Persian language and literature; learned Sanskrit, and translated select passages from the Vedas; he had lived among the Moslems and learned Arabic. From study of Oriental religions, he became a pure Theist. For this he suffered persecution, and left Calcutta for Benares. In 1803 he began to teach his new views, and established the society which developed into the Brahmo-Somaj. Eight years later he started the agitation against widow-burning, which, mainly by his efforts, was abolished eighteen years later. He studied Hebrew and Greek in order to read the Bible intelligently, and in 1820 published his Precepts of Jesus.

In that year, when he was instructing his Brahmos in Calcutta, a Baptist missionary, who was teaching him Greek—Mr. Adam—tried to convert him to Trinitarianism, but was himself converted to Unitarianism. Some of Rammohun Roy's adherents had started a society in Madras, and it was this Society which put itself in communication with the Society afterwards known as South Place.

On September 30, 1820, the Parliament Court Society sent five guineas to the native Unitarians of Madras; and soon after South Place Chapel was opened it sent (September 12, 1824) twenty pounds to help to build the Anglo-Indian Unitarian Chapel in Calcutta. In this way Association was established and Fox was persuaded to read the Hindu religious poetry translated by Rammohun Roy into English. This awakened the Englishman to a recognition of a unity larger than Christian Unitarianism. He realised that Unitarianism was the whole and Christianity was only a part. This was a complete revolution of his former concepts and definitions. But it was true Unitarianism, a magnificient liberation. He startled many prejudices, and had to conquer prejudices about "heathenism," before he could obtain an association large enough to include Rammohun Roy. Yet he was standing for a sound philosophical and historical concept. The Hindu teacher had a nobler Unitarian understanding than the Western Unitarians. Indeed, there were then in all the religious world few peers of Rammohun Roy. With him began the reaction of Oriental upon Western thought. Fox learned from the Hindu teacher the need, for truth's case, to enlarge his conception of Unitarianism until it inevitably became to him a universal and human religion. He gave power to the Christian revelation and delevoped Humanism.

Unitarians rejected the best fruit of the "foreign" seed imported in 1825, but rejoiced in its flower. That flower bloomed in South Place Chapel on May 25, 1831, when the sixth anniversary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held. The Rajah Rammohun Roy himself, now called the "Apostle of the East," had been sent by the Emperor of Delhi as an ambassador to the British Government, and arrived (May 8) just in time to be present at South Place on that great occasion. It was a memorable day in the history of Liberalism. The Rev. Hugh Hutton of Birmingham preached an animated sermon in the morning from the text found in Mark XII. 29-31. In the evening came the great meeting. The chapel was thronged with eminent men and women. Among those present were the President of Harvard University, Dr. Kirkland, and deputations from France and Transylvania. The Rev. Robert Aspland presided; Dr. Carpenter, Sir John Bowring, Dr. Kirkland, Dr. Rees, and others made speeches. The Rajah spoke impressively of the opposition he had met in India from Christians when he stood for living vital world-wide Unitarianism.

They always lay a stress on mystery and mystical points, which serve to elude their followers; and the consequence is that we meet with such opposition in India that our progress is very slight.

Fox made a very great speech. He pleaded for the establishment of unsectarian Domestic Missions in England to improve "the temporal and spiritual condition" of the people, and "illustrate their religion by deeds of love and mercy." The testimony and presence of their Hindu colleagues seemed to show that English foreign missionaries might well be recalled for home work. They were useless abroad. In the conclusion Fox greeted the visitors—Frenchmen, Transylvanians, and the Americans successively; then, turning to the Rajah, he recalled the latter's indignation at a painting of Jesus, giving him a pale European countenance and forgetting that Jesus was an oriental. Fox held that this criticism was just. In the same way, the theologian had robbed Christianity of its rich oriental colouring of fancy and feeling with which the Scriptures glow, and by which they possess themselves, not only of the mind, but the heart and soul of man.

It will be seen that, had Unitarianism embraced Fox's concept, it would have developed a rich humanism of understanding and have retained and expanded vitally all the poetry that is Christianity, instead of the theology that has destroyed the Christian message. A living Jesus would have replaced the image of a dead Christ. Service would have meant the redemption of humanity, not hypocritical and senseless rites in the name of God—a God who favoured conventionalism and was conceived in the image of the world of mammon. Unitarianism would have become a world religion instead of being the dull pretension of a narrow Christian sect. Fox was right. He refined Unitarianism. Those who do not understand the urgency of his definition and so reject it as Humanism are betrayers of the Unitarian message—a most vital and important message, offering a live religion to all mankind. Fox stood for service. His theological critics stood for servitude.

THE TRADE CYCLE

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Mr. J. I. Craig, like many other people with whom I have discussed this question, still completely fails to grasp how and why money saved and invested in new production, indirectly creates a shortage of consumer purchasing power. This shortage has nothing whatever to do with the complete redistribution of the money when it is expended as capital on buildings, plant, raw materials and labour. Let us assume that the redistribution is absolutely complete and that all the money is spent. The trouble does not occur at that stage at all. It only begins when the new industrial plant, resulting from the expenditure of the invested money, is completed and starts putting on the market new goods, additional to all the other goods being put on the market by the rest of industry. If at that moment new money is not created and put into consumers' pockets, it will be impossible for the goods from the new industry to be bought at a fair price and also the whole output of goods from the rest of industry to be bought at an unreduced price.

It is most undesirable that the increased production of goods due to the invested money should force a reduction in prices, since such reduction in prices cause every kind of industrial and economic difficulty. What is needed is an increase in the volume of consumption goods which can all be bought without a reduction in prices.

It is certainly true that if an increase in production due to investment happens to coincide with the creation of more money by a bank loan for still more production, the new money created by the bank loan may help to provide the extra money needed to finance the consumption of goods from the new industry without robbing other industries of consumer purchasing power for their goods. This is, however, a clumsy and uncertain way of making up the shortage of purchasing power due to investment, and is nothing like so satisfactory as a creation of new non-debt money put straight into the consumers' pockets by way of payment for work done or as a grant apart from work performed. For one thing, the amount of new money created by the bank loan may not equal the amount of money invested or the price of the goods which are the result of the investment. For another, it means that new consumer goods, the result of an increase in capital goods, cannot be bought unless new money is created by a bank loan to finance the production of still more capital goods, quite regardless of whether the consumer goods resulting from this last increase in capital goods, are really desired or required. Sooner or later a point must be reached when those goods are not desired or required, and then, through failure to finance the consumer direct in a sensible way, you find yourself in a nice mess!

I myself would be opposed to the discouragement of investment, not because I agree with much of the eulogy of saving, but because I do not wish to bring about "the arrestment of all new projects," to quote Mr. Craig's words.

Trade cycles are certainly "inherent" in the present economic system, but only because they are rendered inevitable by those financial rules and customs which the men in control of the world's Central Banks insist upon.

The periodicity of slumps and booms in the trade cycle is no proof that it is not deliberately caused by the policy of the Big Financiers who control the commercial banks by regulating their cash reserves. (Cash reserves are the coin and notes in a commercial bank, and any cheques it may have which are drawn on the Central Bank. According to banking practice, commercial banks should not create for lending, or for buying Securities, more than nine or ten times the amount of their cash reserves.) For a time, as I explained in a former article, the men in control of the central Banks allow the commercial banks to make a profit by interest on loans made to industry, and to encourage these loans and provide the basis for them, they increase the amount of cash reserves. After a time, they decide that this process has continued long enough. Industrialists are growing too prosperous and independent and are not so ready to come to the banks in order to borrow. Moreover, the top-heavy system just alluded to which does not permit consumer goods resulting from new capital goods to be bought unless new money is created for the erection of still more capital goods, may be causing them some possibly well-founded nervousness as to whether the new goods from the last lot of capital goods, will really be desired and prove a sound commercial proposition. They therefore decide to reverse the process and cause a slump by cutting down the amount of cash reserves. When the commercial banks' cash reserves are reduced, they are not able to lend so freely and, to discourage borrowing from industrialists, they may put up their rates of interest, and soon the slump is well under way, not because the people's desire for goods has decreased, or because the desire of the industrialists for higher rates of profit has increased, but simply and solely by reason of bad and selfish financial policy, not so much on the part of the commercial banks as on the part of the big men who are entrenched at the very hub of the financial system.

It is not true that when a loan is granted the amount is necessarily deposited in the same bank. When a person to whom a bank loan of new money has been granted draws that money out by cheque in favour of someone else, it will very likely be paid into the latter's account at a different bank and increase the deposits there. It is also an error to state that when a loan does indirectly create a deposit in a bank other than the one which makes the loan, it enables the bank in which the deposit has been made itself to increase its lending. Banks do not lend their deposits, and it is not their deposits of cheque money but their cash reserves which determine their ability to create new money for lending. Only in the rather rare cases when a deposit is made in the form of notes or a cheque drawn on the Bank of England, is the money-creating and lending power of the bank receiving the deposit increased. If one commercial bank receives a deposit as the indirect result of a loan by another commercial bank, its liabilities are increased (for a deposit is a bank's liability), but not its lending power.

Mr. Craig says that Marx contends that there is a general tendency for the average rate of profit to fall, with various disturbing consequences, including over-investment and over-capitalization, but why should the average rate of profit tend to fall? Unless (which is unlikely) people no longer desire the goods produced, the only reason for the fall in the average rate of profit is lack of an adequate money-supply in the pockets of consumers.

There is not the slightest reason why new inventions and technological progress generally, should cause a fall in the amount of profit, if consumers, including persons put out of work by the technological progress, are kept adequately supplied with money. If they are starved of purchasing power because they are unemployed, or if other people are increasingly burdened for the purpose of supporting them and have their own consuming power reduced, then of course you will get into difficulties and vendors of goods will be unable to make the same amount of profit as before.

If the Social Credit principle of the National Dividend is adopted and people receive incomes not always related to paid toil, then not only does the exploitation of labour become impossible to the extent which has been known in the past, but unemployment does not spoil the market for producers of goods and they are not tempted to make things still worse by cutting down their employees' wages in order to reduce costs and prices.

The increased cash requirements of business do not reduce cash reserves to any appreciable degree, because people receiving wages in paper money do not normally hoard their notes in stockings, and the paper money passes from one bank to another. It is only the Central Banks which actually reduce cash reserves by reducing the amount of paper money in circulation by physically destroying it, and also by restricting credit to their governments and thereby reducing the number of cheques drawn upon them which will be presented to the commercial banks.

People only invest money in the construction of capital goods if they think there is a reasonable likelihood of such capital goods producing consumer goods that people will want. They do not invest in capital goods just for fun. If the consumer goods from the new capital goods are desired, then there is no reason to grumble at the investment of money in the capital goods; all you have got to bother about is to see that consumers have enough money to buy the goods and any other goods as well. People stupid enough to invest money in the production of goods which nobody wants, even though they have the money to buy them, are taught such a quick and unpleasant lesson that they are never numerous enough to create an economic problem of any magnitude.

Mr. Craig says that if a check on credit expansion is applied before the peak of the boom is reached, the worst effects of the slump would be mitigated. He does not explain, however, why, under a sensible financial system there need ever be a slump; or why credit expansion should ever be checked unless it is obvious that the rather surprising point has been reached at which everybody has all he wants of everything and no further production of any kind is either desirable or desired.

I used the term "reformer" to include anyone who desires a better order of things brought about either by gradual changes or by methods as radical or rapid as those which Mr. Craig would favour. Even if you had production for use and common-ownership of the means of production and distribution, I still maintain that you would require all the essentials of the reformed money system which I advocate, unless you were prepared to do away with the use of money altogether, which I cannot feel is practical politics by reason of its convenience as a mechanism and the extent to which people have grown accustomed to its use.

Mr. Craig asks why some should work while others live in idleness and why all should not work a shorter day? By all means let all work a shorter day, but, as I have often pointed out, in an age of labour-destroying inventions and discoveries, reduction in hours must inevitably reach a point where a continuation of the process would involve inconvenience and absurdity. Therefore, since it is not right that people unemployed through no fault of their own should suffer hardship, some must work while others are technically idle, unless you are going to scrap, or forbid, labour-saving inventions which, like the abolition of the use of money is, I am convinced, not practical politics.

Mr. Craig says that the injection of new money in the form of credits to consumers would make it more profitable to produce goods for immediate consumption than to produce capital goods, with the result that the price of consumer goods would rise and the expectation of profit would be greater in those stages of production nearer the consumption level. Mr. Craig also thinks that the structure of industry would therefore contract, employees in the basic industries would be thrown out of work and many enterprises come to a standstill. I must say that I profoundly disagree with him in this analysis of what would be likely to take place, which seems to me to be contrary both to reason and experience. The purpose of production is consumption, so why should it be an evil to have an increased demand for consumer goods? How could the output of consumer goods be increased beyond a certain point at times when there is a strong demand for them if there is not also an increased demand for capital goods? Has a really good all-round demand for consumer goods ever been known to have a generally bad effect on the fortunes of industries producing capital goods? Is there not the closest connection between the prosperity of industries selling consumer goods and their ability to pay their debts punctually to industries making capital goods and to place new orders with them to assist them in the expansion of their own businesses?

Under a sensible money system, which no longer relates incomes solely to employment, would it matter if some employees making capital goods were thrown out of work, provided that the output of consumer goods did not decrease? Persons who are engaged, or who have been engaged, in making buildings and machinery satisfy their physical needs with food, clothing, etc., and not by gnawing blocks of concrete or bars of steel!

Certainly the overthrow of the power of the financiers would require an assertion and enforcement of the will of the people. If Mr. Craig wishes to kill two birds with one stone and overthrow the Capitalists as well, there is nothing in any of my monetary reform proposals to prevent him going ahead.

I do not much like Mr. Craig's definition of money as a medium of exchange and a measure of value. I would prefer to define money as a medium of exchange and a claim on goods and services and Mr. Craig's Socialist Note would certainly be the latter. Mr. Arthur Kitson, the pioneer of monetary reform, used to say that it was absurd to speak of a measure of an abstract thing like value and I think there is something to be said for his point of view.

I agree with Mr. Craig that the pursuit of profit has been productive of much evil. Two things, however, should not be lost sight of when we are considering this question. The first is that one can easily discover innumerable cases where profit has been made without exploitation either of employee or customer and where, for all practical purposes, it is indistinguishable from a reasonable remuneration for the vendor's work and service: the second is that there is no special and unique poison associated with the pursuit of profit, so that its mere removal will of itself give us an orderly and brotherly society. The pursuit of profit is merely the primitive acquisitive instinct inherited by all normal human beings from their animal ancestors coupled with that most common and far-reaching of human weaknesses —selfishness. If you really get rid of selfishness and thereby keep the acquisitive instinct within proper bounds, you will automatically get rid of every evil feature of profit-seeking; but if you merely set up an economic system which makes the acquisition of money-profit illegal men will speedily find other outlets just as harmful to society and "profit" may continue to be acquired albeit in a different way and under another name.

In conclusion I should like to express my appreciation of the kindly spirit expressed by Mr. Craig at the beginning of his article and to say that I hope that readers of The Word will not find our exchange of views too technical. The consideration of our friendly tussle will, at any rate, be good practice for those who desire to get beyond the more elementary stages in the study of the monetary problem and if I have failed to make myself clear to any interested reader, I hope he will write to me that I may try and give him a fuller explanation. I am sure that Mr. Craig would be both able and willing to do the same.

THIS MARCH OF HOMICIDE

And other studies in War Diplomacy, Politics and Economics

By Sir WALTER STRICKLAND, Bart, B.A.

Sir Walter Strickland, famous 9th Baronet, discarded his title because of his Republican views. Anticipating the World War, three years before his death in 1938 he endeavoured to evolve a plan to avert the sacrifice of youth to what he termed "This March of Homicide" or "The Extinction of Mankind." His last letter from the Dutch East Indies, where he settled and died, after living in almost every country in the world, is reproduced, and also some glimpses are given of the romance of his travels. Strickland was a great scholar and linguist. He translated from Russian, Czech, Chinese, Spanish, Italian, Marathi, etc. Read this interesting work of prose and verse, with the translations of Czech "Evening Songs."

NEW YEAR "HONOURS"

The New Year Honours List for 1944 makes interesting reading for those who would know the worth of Labour Parliamentarism.

The Glasgow Herald for January 1, 1944, stated:—

Among the new barons is Mr. William Westwood, a native of Dundee, who has worked hard in the interests of the shipbuilding workers in Britain for many years. Mr. C. G. Ammon, Labour M.P. for North Camberwell, also becomes a baron, thus causing a by-election.

Below this announcement the paper publishes the following biographies of the new barons:—

Charles George Ammon, Esq., J.P., D.L., M.P., member of Parliament for North Camberwell, February, 1922, to October, 1931, and since November, 1935; Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, 1924, and 1929-1931.—For political and public services.

Westwood's biography is of no immediate moment and is merely a study in Trade Union careerist advancement.

From half-time to the House of Lords may be hardly working-class emancipation.

What studies in parliamentarism and trade unionism the careers and the final elevation to the capitalist peerage of these two men afford us! Both progress to the House of Lords, rendering services to reactionary Capitalism en route, through the Socialist and Trades Union Movements.

Ammon's career is dealt with very fully in Socialism and Parliament, Part II., appendix VI., devoted to "Potted Biography," pages 51-52. Comrades should study Socialism and Parliament, Pts. I. and II. These will be sent post-free for 1s. 3d. At the present moment of attempted revival of interest in parliamentarism, these complete exposures of Parliamentary Socialism should be circulated and read widely by the workers. Although we believe in non-sectarian association and solidarity, and although we do not believe in the dictatorial imposition of our views on the workers' movement, and give credit to every useful remark uttered by M.P's., our opposition to parliamentarism has not ceased. We remain a convinced anti-parliamentarian.

Ammon was a member of the I.L.P., and the U.D.C., that respectable Socialist Pacifist organisation that produced one honest man in the much-abused E. D. Morel and evolved so many traitors to position of trust: Some who to-day believe in 18B internments and learned nothing from the imprisonment and persecution of Morel.

Ammon took an active part in the Leeds Conference of 1917. At one time he was a leader of the Labour Party on the L.C.C., and he was one of 36 signatories who sent a letter to Sir John Simon in January, 1916, expressing "wholehearted appreciation" of Simon's opposition to Conscription, and promising support of themselves and organisations they represented in any further opposition. When the Labour Government arrived, Ammon became Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty!

Facts like these are detailed in Socialism and Parliament. We conclude:

A nice study in the economics of navalism and the evolution of an anti-militarist through parliamentary contacts and elevation.

And now Ammon has reached the House of Lords! Labour humbugs, who once hated us for our uncompromising Socialist Anti-Militarism of the streets, and now hate us yet more for our uncompromising Anti-Militarist association with the Duke of Bedford, applaud Ammon's elevation to the House of Lords. He will go there to support his friend, the conscriptionist Lord Chancellor, Simon, whose Anti-Conscriptionist tendencies he applauded in 1916! What a game! Ammon is elevated to the House of Lords and the workers remain in the breadline!

Ammon is mentioned also in our booklet, At Grips With War. This was published in 1929. A second edition appeared in 1932. We propose to issue a third edition this year.

Chapter VIII. of this work, headed "Socialism Checking War," summarises the debate that took place in the House of Commons on March 17, 1924, on the question of abolishing the standing army. In this debate Ernest Thurtle stood for the abolition of the standing army, whilst Kedward, a Liberal Member, denounced both Ammon and the ex-conscientious objector, Leach, for defending and serving militarism.

Concerning Ammon we add (p. 75, 1932 edition):—

He voted for the death penalty on soldiers; against a soldier's right to appeal from death sentence by Court-Martial to the Court of Criminal Appeal; against the right of a soldier to refuse to take duty in connection with trade disputes; against a soldier's right to refuse to attend church parades.

During the Great War of 1914-18, Ammon was exempt from Conscription as organising secretary of the Union of Post Office Workers. But he identified himself with the No Conscription Fellowship and boasted of his opposition to the war.

On pages 76-77 we reproduced the interesting ballot paper issued by the N.C.F. in March, 1920, for the election of two Committees, eight members to be elected to each Committee, the Committees being:

(1) Anti-Conscription; (2) Pacifist.

E. E. Hunter, who debated with us in 1912 in Walthamstow that Parliamentary Socialism meant no careerism and working-class emancipation—was secretary of the N.C.F. He was elected to No. 1 Committee with ourself, as was C. E. Ammon. We were 4th, Hunter was 7th, and Ammon was 8th. Clifford Allen, also later Militarist, apologist for the National Government and its ramp, and peer for his "political services," was first. He was first also on the Pacifist Committee.

It should be pointed out that we were never invited to one meeting of the Committee and that we were the only member deliberately uninvited.

Westwood we have not criticised. His O.B.E., etc., characterises the worth of Trades Unionism. Readers should note these facts in connection with our Studies in Communism, which can be obtained post-free for 8d. This consists of 5 pamphlets written and published by us between 1910 and 1938. One pamphlet (1911) is entitled Trade Unionism and The Class War. Consider this pamphlet and its reasoning in relation to the career of William Westwood and his life. How can trade unionism emancipate the workers—except one at a time, and then only at the expense of the perpetuated enslavement of the rank and file.

The views we have urged since 1906, when we left the Social Democratic Federation were right. The persons with whom we have came in conflict down the years since then have succeeded in establishing the truth of our contentions by their cynical careerism and advancement under the Capitalist system, in servitude to that system. They have gained the world—and demonstrated their want of soul. Without a soul, without integrity, a human being is dead!

"PAYING FOR THE WAR."

Just as there are pro-war and anti-war Socialists, so there are pro-war and anti-war monetary reformers. Mr. Wilfred Townend, as a member of John Hargrave's Social Credit Party, is a pro-war monetary reformer, for which reason some of the more militarist sentiments expressed in his threepenny pamphlet "Paying for the War" (Obtainable from the Social Credit Party, 2 Fitzroy Street, London, W.1.) will not appeal to anti-militarist readers of "The Word." In the main, however, the pamphlet is a well-written criticism of our defective monetary system and contains the practical and constructive proposals for financial reform which are commonly put forward by Social Credit writers.

There is only one technical criticism I would offer of Mr. Townend's work. On page 11 he suggests that banks lend part of their deposits, keeping a tenth of the latter as a reserve. It would be more accurate to say that banks do not lend their deposits at all. They create NEW money for lending up to about nine times the amount of their "cash reserves," the latter consisting of coin and notes and cheques drawn on the Bank of England.

GOD'S MINISTERS AND WAR

BY COUNCILLOR CHARLES A. EARL

"Thou Shalt Not Kill."—Jesus.

"It is lawful for Christian men at the commandment of the magistrate to wear weapons and serve in the wars."—37th Article of Religion: Book of Common Prayer.

In the October issue of "The Word" the article "God and War" tried to show in a simple and direct manner, the horrors of war and of bombing in particular, and how many ministers of religion delude themselves and the people generally, that God is on their side and is helping them in the murderous work of destroying His own children. These ministers either lack imagination or refuse to exercise it, and will not picture the "RECEIVING" END OF A BOMB. They speak of the bravery of the airmen, but is it the highest form of bravery to drop murderous destruction on defenceless, helpless and in many cases innocent people, particularly children? The very large majority of men and women are only doing this sort of work because they have been conscripted to do so. The freedom to choose between good and evil, which God's ministers say is given to each one of us, can only be exercised if one is prepared to suffer imprisonment if one chooses the "good." Most of these men and women have had their minds poisoned by propaganda, and even now it is very doubtful whether they really understand what it is all about. Ministers of religion have a large share of the responsibility for all this, as, with few brave exceptions, they have supported their Governments in this crime against God—and humanity. They prefer a pronouncement viz., the 37th Article of Religion, quoted above, and made in the time of Queen Elizabeth in the year 1571, to the simple but quite explicit statement by Jesus, "THOU SHALT NOT KILL." The Bishop of Birmingham, in speaking of this 37th Article, says, "Military service when commanded by the state is obviously lawful. It is not for a Christian lawful AND RIGHT." It is very apparent that ministers lack the courage to "STAND UP FOR JESUS," because they know full well that Governments have a way of suppressing people who resist their decrees. The few brave ministers who have stood up for Jesus have been imprisoned and it is significant that the ordinary lay men and women have in far greater numbers than God's ministers, insisted that Jesus was right and have paid the penalty for their resistance to war. During the last war men were imprisoned for distributing leaflets on which were printed the "SERMON ON THE MOUNT." Another important fact that needs to be emphasised is that the Government quite obviously realises that war is contrary to the Will of God and the Teaching of Jesus because it does not compel ministers of religion to become fighting men, and the ministers are quick to take advantage of this concession, and in return work hard as recruiting agents, persuading the members of their churches that it is a Christian's duty to kill for King and Country, and not to concern themselves with what Jesus said, until after the war. "Theirs not to reason why, theirs but to do and die." Governments and Religious authorities discourage thinking. They want people to act like SHEEP, because if the people began to think it might dawn on them that Jesus did mean "THOU SHALT NOT KILL." Is there a single instance in our history when God's ministers in a united body refused to support the Government in the bloody business of war? No! and yet after events have shown very conclusively that righteousness was no part of the Government's plan. Ask any minister of religion, why, if our Government was so concerned about the rights of small nations, it helped Japan against China? Why it intrigued with Italy against Abyssinia and refused to go to war with Italy when that country wantonly attacked Abyssinia? Why it was among the first of the nations to acknowledge the King of Italy as Emperor of Ethiopia? Why it has allowed weapons of war to be supplied from this country to every nation in the world including Germany and Italy? Why when Finland was attacked by Russia in the early days of the war, the Government and God's ministers could not find expressions strong enough to express their horror and contempt of the Russians and the "poor little martyr," Finland, was prayed for in every church in the land. A few months later, although Finland was STILL STRUGGLING AGAINST THE SAME AGGRESSOR, she now becomes the villain of the piece and Russia the "poor little martyr." No more must we pray for Finland; godless Russia is now our ally, so we must ask God to SWITCH OVER. The men, women and children of Finland can now be consigned to THE DEVIL, and the help we now give to Russia will quickly send them there. What a blatant case of expediency, and blessed by God's ministers!!! On October 22nd, 1943 a statement calling attention to the dangers of promiscuity and venereal disease, was issued by the two Archbishops and they seemed quite unable to understand that the war which they are supporting and for which they thank God for His support, is the chief cause of these evils; and that is not the whole of it: the UNWANTED BABY is a still GREATER TRAGEDY, and these Archbishops and ministers of religion generally cannot shift the responsibility for these tragedies on to other shoulders: the blame is theirs. They support the war and immorality and prostitution, increase in drunkenness, increase in juvenile crime, and the breaking up of home life, is the result.

Now let us see what individual ministers of religion have to say about war. THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER: "Modern war is a demon that not only kills human lives, but by its awful unreason, its perfection in the technique of mass murder, turns the individual from a person into an unmeaning thing." Yet God's ministers support war and dare to thank God for His assistance in perfecting THE TECHNIQUE OF MASS MURDER.

The Rev. RICHARD LEE of COVENTRY (one of the terribly bombed sites): "The spirit of Christ is utterly opposed to casting out evil by means of doing evil. Paul summed up the whole attitude of Christ's life and death in the words: 'Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.' The Sermon on the Mount is a dead letter, if we are permitted to destroy our enemies by mangling little children and defenceless old men and women."

The Rev. WM. BOTTOMLEY, of MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA: "No disciple of Jesus is entitled to employ the sword. This idea of Christians, whether they speak German or English, bombing cities, raining death and destruction on men, women and children alike. It may be daring. It may be war. It may demonstrate a fearless recklessness, a disregard for one's own life as well as for one's neighbours. It may be audacity. But it is not courage. It is neither Christianity nor humanity."

JOHN WESLEY: "Men in general can never be allowed to be reasonable creatures till they know not war any more, so long as this monster stalks uncontrolled; where is reason, virtue, humanity? They are utterly excluded; they have no place; they are a name and nothing more."

Compare these statements with statements by members of the Government and other prominent people.

The PRIME MINISTER ("Daily Telegraph," 23/10/43): "I have enjoyed the shooting very much." After a visit to a gun site during an attack on London. One wonders whether those who were hurt or bereaved "enjoyed the shooting very much"? This is the head of the Government which God's ministers loyally support, and they thank God for him.

LORD LONDONDERRY (House of Lords, 22/5/35): "In 1932 the Disarmament Conference assembled and almost its earliest discussions centred round the possibility of the total abolition of air forces. I had the utmost difficulty amid the popular outcry IN PRESERVING THE USE OF THE BOMBING AEROPLANE, even on the frontiers of the Middle East and India." London, Coventry, Clydeside, Canterbury, etc., etc., have paid dearly and bitterly for this exhibition of Christian statesmanship and still our ministers thank God that He has blessed our arms.

MAJOR GENERAL TEMPERLEY, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., commenting on Lord Londonderry's statement: "We were actually attaching more importance to preserving the amenities of being bombed for a few Pathan and Iraqui villages and to keeping control of civil aviation in our own hands, than to joining the rest of the civilised world in a practical attempt to remove the menace of the bombing aeroplane."

Sir ROBERT HADFIELD ("New York Times," 1/5/34), referring to his new armour piercing shell and prospects of increased business: "We are indeed devoutly thankful for present mercies, but may I add for what we are about to receive may the Lord make us truly thankful."

AND NOW THIS: "A thanksgiving service in connection with the Spitfire Fund is to be held on Sunday. The service will be conducted by the Rev. David Dick, St. Ninian's Old Parish Church." ("Scotsman," 2/10/41).

"PRAISE GOD FROM WHOM ALL SPITFIRES FLOW." !!!

Have I said enough to show how very evil all this business is? Have I said enough to open the eyes of the ordinary decent men and women to the wicked barbarity of war? Have I said enough to show that there is no redeeming feature in the whole ghastly business? Finally have I said enough to show how great is the responsibility of God's ministers, because there cannot be the slightest doubt that if ministers of religion refused to uphold war, and taught all Christians that when Jesus said "THOU SHALT NOT KILL" He meant just that, without any provisos, there WOULD BE NO WAR. It will need courage and self-sacrifice as great if not greater than that displayed by the fighting forces, but the rewards will be infinitely greater and permanent. Then indeed may we thank God with all our hearts that He has blessed our endeavours, for it will be apparent that the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the Spirit of Divine Sonship and human brotherhood, is at last being established among all peoples of the world.

THE DUKE AND THE CHANCELLOR

The Duke of Bedford made his sixth speech in the House of Lords on Tuesday, January 25. He neatly turned on the Lord Chancellor the phrase of irresponsible abuse employed against him by Viscount Simon in the House of Lords on Tuesday, November 18, 1941, before the Duke had taken his seat in the gilded chamber. Simon can hand it out but cannot take it. His reply was bitter, absurd, and unworthy of a corner boy politician. A full account of this discussion will appear in our next issue and the Duke's speech will be published in pamphlet form.

U.S.M. MEETING

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Friend,—According to the "West London Observer," for July 30, 1943, Sir Gervais Rentoul, in sentencing a Jehovah Witness to three months' imprisonment for failing to obey a Ministry of Labour instruction to take up nursing or civil defence work, rebuked the lady, calling her "arrogant" and "impertinent." In another case on the same day, in sentencing a lady to six weeks' imprisonment for failing to take up hospital work he said:

"However illogical their attitude may appear to many people there can be no doubt that this prisoner and others are sincere."

It is possible for a person to be at the same time sincere, arrogant and impertinent; and is it really necessary for magistrates to deliver homilies to these victims of conscription?

Yours sincerely,
CHARLES MORLEY.

London, S.W.6.

Dear Comrade,—My husband, Michael Young, who is at present serving a two-year sentence for subversion, is anxious to read "The Word" and would like you to send as many back numbers as you can.

I notice that your paper mentions N.Z. C.O.s. There are 700 of them now in Defaulters Detention Camps —where conditions are in some ways worse than in prison. Here in N.Z. there is no Appellate Tribunal—so that the findings of the Appeal Boards are final and these vary a great deal in different centres. The percentage of allowed "sincere C.O.s" is, for example, very much greater here in Christ Church than it is in Wellington.

Yours sincerely,
WINIFRED M. YOUNG.

Christchurch, New Zealand.

[Michael Young's inspiring letter from prison was published in those columns for August.]

Dear Guy Aldred,—I would like to air my views on the "Beveridge Plan." Whilst to my mind at any rate, the plan is an admirable step forward in the right direction if made law, it still leaves much to be desired. The system that makes for poverty and social injustice would be untouched. It isn't effects against which we must fight but causes.

I believe the British working people are determined to fight this war to a bitter end because Hitler, if victorious would put the clock back a thousand years. But at the same time I think that they are equally determined to put an end to the reactionary anti-social policies of Tory and "Liberal" Capitalists. However, the time hasn't yet come to deal with the latter enemies of social justice. The debate on the plan in the House of Commons should have opened the eyes of those "working-class" conservatives who up to now have been politically and socially asleep. Let us hope that at the first opportunity the British Democracy will show in no uncertain way, its bitter contempt for Carlton Club politics and also for those who betrayed the socialist cause, in the name of "national" unity. Despite my misgivings though I sincerely hope that the Plan becomes law, at last it would be one victory for the common people over vested interests.

Yours fraternally,
WILFRED H. HARBIGE.

Manchester 11.

Dear Guy Aldred,—I wonder whether you remember me. It is about five or six years ago I had an honour of meeting you at Comrade Sidney Kay's house. Since then I have passed through real stormy time, such as arrest under 18B Defence Regulations, detention for six months under civil and military control. Then I had to face Conscription Act after release. Anyway I have been exempted unconditionaly from conscription.

If you are interested I will write you in detail about my experiences. Being an Indian under Defence Regulation was more interesting experience.

I met one of your great admirers here, Comrade Dan Mullen, formerly of Blantyre, who died last year.

Yours fraternally,
M. LALL.

Welwyn Garden City.

Dear Comrade Guy Aldred,—One fact struck me as I perused pages of the September "Word" and that was that one has to read the "Word" to get a message of Christianity.

What an indictment against the churches and their periodicals that Guy Aldred, an avowed atheist, should lead the way in the publication of articles dealing with the real Christian message, i.e., the real purpose of life, the brotherhood of man.

I can't imagine any other paper publishing Mr. Bowyer's anti-bombing sermon except, of course, the contemporary local paper from which the sermon was culled.

I am sick of churches and sermons but that is only because one never hears a real message of love and compassion such as is contained in that sermon and I am more than grateful to you for your kindly understanding of the needs of people that prompts you to make your paper a forum for truth and human inspiration.

A schoolboy of 17, a member of an agricultural camp near here, came in the other evening and in the course of his conversation remarked that he clapped his hands with delight every time he heard our bombers going over to Germany: here is a boy, intelligent and alert, training to be a teacher of other boys with a mentality like that. I found, on questioning him, that he claims a Christian home, parents who are making great sacrifices to send him to a university and tutors of honourable repute and yet this is the mind which is being formed under their influence.

I talked to him of the brotherhood of man and of his own responsibility in helping to form character in the boys he would eventually have in his care but what could I do in a few minutes to undo the evil of years of wrong teaching and thinking.

And in all this welter of hate and murder one looks to the churches for a challenging message to the tortured peoples of every land and, one looks in vain.

So thank you, dear atheist and true lover of mankind for the stand you are making and for all that it means to your readers.

Yours fraternally,
MABEL HOWARD.

Boston, Lincs.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I've read all the booklets you sent. I must say that to me they are very expressive besides proving that your reading and study are both deep and extensive; moreover, I am interested by a great deal of what you have written because, years ago, I followed similar research and still possess many of the books which you mention as evidences. I was interested in your "Dogmas Discarded" because I was born in Clerkenwell and lived many years near Goswell Road.

After a strenuous educational career in order to gain professional certificates, I read rare literature, mostly antique, and much of it being of a severely critical type, proved that a very vast amount of scholarship, such as what is styled "modern learning" is not only misleading but untrue; consequently, I had to un-learn much, particularly, statements regarding religion and sociology.

I stress my remarks against the Ministry of Education's scheme for school-teaching after the war, and the Church's endeavour to-day, to make religion compulsory as a subject for teachers and pupils; all of which, if successful, will retard national commonweal.

With kind regards and sincere wishes.

Yours truly,
W. A. VAUGHAN.

Camberley, Surrey.

Dear Guy Aldred,—The article on p. 36 of the October "Word," by H. W. Henderson, and with sub-title, "Should Criticism be Suppressed," itself calls for the severest possible criticism—criticism alike of you as Editor, for allowing such wretched maudlin nonsense to besmirch our paper; and of Henderson for begging-the-question and insulting your readers by speciously essaying to put it across as criticism.

Pritt did not ask the War Minister to take action against an expression of opinion with which he (Pritt) disagreed. He desired to know whether the War Minister would put a stop to a certain specified sort of malicious, irresponsible and tendentious allegations!

The composition of H. W. Henderson's effort ranks in low-down unscrupulousness with that of the Warner Brothers' film, "Mission to Moscow," so ably exposed in the same issue of the "Word."

I'm not a Communist; and Pritt is well able to defend himself. I am concerned only to uphold the reputation of our paper for honesty of purpose.

CHAS. W. D. NEWMAN.

Stroud, 25/10/43.

Dear Sir,—Every time I read in "The Word" reports of Roman Catholic C.O.s, I feel that they are to be admired more than other C.O.s, because of the attitude adopted towards conscience by the Catholic Church. Not only has the Catholic C.O. to contend with the State. He must oppose also his Church. The members of Pax must have a lot to withstand from priestly fire-eaters.

Replying to a correspondent, in its issue for 16/2/1840, "The Universe" says:—

"We know of no 'Catholic Parifist Society,' and sincerely hope that no such society exists. No Catholic can be an out-and-out pacifist. He is bound to hold that there can be such a thing as a just and lawful war."

The same journal, for June 14, 1940, reported a most objectionable speech made by a priest named Ingram at Burnley, in which he said:—

"No Tom, Dick or Harry who imagines himself a little cleverer than those about him has any right to decide that he is Pope over his own conscience."

The miscalled Catholic Truth Society publishes a pamphlet from the pen of a Jesuit named Henry Davis, in which he denies the assumed Pacifist claim that a conscientious objector has as much right to exemption as a cleric. His pamphlet is a complete denial of all true Christian teaching. Davis says on page 16 of this precious pamphlet:—

He [i.e., the pacifist or conscientious objector] is forgetting that the Church is an independent society and can legislate for itself, a power which the conscientious pacifist has not, and that the clerical state and its obligations are incompatible with the military profession and obligations. Consequently, the State can oblige the conscientious pacifist to take up arms in a war of self-defence. It is not obliged to pay any attention to his conscience.

The more one delves into the war-mongering views of the Catholic Church, the more is the truth forced upon one that war is the statesman's game, the priests' delight.

Yours faithfully,
WILLIAM SPEIRS.

Anerum, Roxburghshire.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I have been reading your splendid "Word" for some years now. Would you grant me a few lines for the following protest.

Everybody knows there is a big strike at Hillington but the action of all these strikers is similar. "Carry on the war so long as we get better wages. As a Socialist I suggest the time is opportune for these dubbs to strike against a continuation of the War, followed by another strike against their "sell out" Trade Union Officials, such heroic behaviour will then merit the sympathy and support of intelligent men.

—Yours fraternally,
D. DUNCAN.

Oral Answers

DEFENCE REGULATION 18B (PUBLICATION, GLASGOW)

Mr. DONALD SCOTT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention had been drawn to the publication printed and published by the Strickland Press of Glasgow, called "It might have Happened to You," which contains serious allegations against the police and others concerned with the arrest and detention of persons detained under Regulation 18B; and what action he intends to take against the authors and printers of this publication.

Mr. H. MORRISON: Yes, Sir, I have seen his publication. It is a hotch-potch of complaints against Defence Regulation 18B and its administration which professes to be factual in its criticism but is in fact a polemic made up of contributions by anonymous persons who have been, or are still, detained under this Regulation. I have neither the wish nor the power to suppress criticism, however misleading or malicious, which is not a danger to this country or its cause, and no action appears to be called for on my part.

Mr. N. MACLEAN: Do the Home Secretary's powers allow him to take action in Scotland or does that come within the purview of the Scottish law officers?

Mr. MORRISON: Under Defence Regulation 18B I am generally responsible for the whole of Great Britain, although the Secretary of State for Scotland does sometimes act.

Major MANNINGHAM-BULLER: Has the right hon. Gentleman drawn the attention of the Paper Controller to the enormous quantity of paper used in the publication of this pamphlet?

Mr. MORRISON: That is a Question which should be addressed to the Minister of Supply.

Mr. McGOVERN: Can the right hon. Gentleman state that in this document, which I have read, there are any lies? Is it not true that people who have been imprisoned or interned are much better able to judge the truth of the allegations than is the Home Secretary?

THE LORDS AND 18B.

(From Our Parliamentary Representative.)

Went to the House on the 25th. It was revolting to sit behind Londonderry and hear him making scathing remarks during the Duke's speech. This man, who has written eulogies of Hitler and enjoyed Goering's hospitality, might have at least have stood up for civil justice for those who have suffered years of imprisonment without trial, either because men like Londonderry deceived them into sympathy with Fascism, or hoped to avert war by pursuing some policy of peace by negotiation.

After I left the House I re-read the Penguin Special, Ourselves and Germany, published in 1938. This work was published in Germany in 1938 by the Essener Verlaganstalt under the title England blikt auf Deutschland — authorised translation by Dr. F. W. Pick.

I also looked up the Anglo-German Review for February, 1939. This issue carried a portrait of the Marquess of Londonderry in full state uniform and an article from his pen defending Hitler and Nazi Germany and complaining of the want of understanding shown towards Italy and Germany in Britain.

The Londonderry family have a place in Ireland a few miles from my home. His mother and mine were great friends. I have followed the history of his family and have noted references to it in Aldred's various Richard Carlile studies. As with the Stewart, first marquess of Londonderry, so with the present Vane-Tempest-Stewart, seventh marquess of Londonderry, his economic interests are more important to him than being in the right with two or three. How different is the record of the Stewart family from that of the Russell family, which has given us the martyred Lord William Russell; Francis, 5th Duke of Bedford, the statesman and agriculturist, defender of civil liberty and opponent of the war on revolutionary France, standing almost alone in a reactionary House of Lords; his brother John Russell, sixth Duke of Bedford, opponent of the suspension of Habeas Corpus and persecution of the labourers; John Russell, third son of the sixth Duke, who rebuked Sir Francis Burdett for recanting his radicalism, and became first Earl Russell; his son, the famous Freethinking and high-principled scholar, Viscount Amberley, M.P.; and Amberley's famous son, the second Earl Russell, who defended conscientious objectors in the House of Lords during the last war, and his pacifist brother, Bertrand Russell, the present Earl Russell, who was jailed for his pacifist activity, and forbidden to speak in Glasgow or lecture in Maidstone. Glasgow comrades may remember that Robert Smillie read his forbidden lecture to a large and enthusiastic Glasgow audience.

I recalled this contrast of service to the cause of political freedom, of civil liberty between the Stewarts and the Russells, the Marquess of Londonderry and the Duke of Bedford families, as I watched the proceedings from behind Londonderry, during the Duke's speech.

A friend who was with me said that it impressed her deeply to see the Duke standing there, speaking so quietly and so firmly, not one friendly face to be seen, some people whispering to each other, or walking about, one Government supporter (on the Front Bench) with his feet on the table. The Duke looked so fine speaking in opposition to this complacent entrenched interest, his slightly white hair and very young looking face emphasising the strength of his stand. He was so absolutely alone and so absolutely fearless.

The Archbishop of Canterbury came into the passage before the debate started but did not stay. Obviously, he feels on the 18B issue as he feels on the conscience question. As Primate and head of the Capitalist State Church, he has no war-time use for Jesus's injunctions about the oppressed, and is not going to ask the Government to put any of the Sermon on the Mount into practice. An excellent cleric—true to State tradition!

One can hardly describe the amazement and delight one felt as soon as the Duke sat down. A young, energetic-looking man got up and supported him with great energy and feeling. He opened his remarks with a slight hit at the length of the Duke's speech, which hit but gave power to remarks in support of the Duke's main contention and protests. He drove home every point and positively flayed the old cronies on the opposition side. His fervour and conviction were inspiring. This speaker was Lord Morris. He is a solicitor and barrister and succeeded his father, the first Baron, in 1935. His father was born in Newfoundland and was a great Newfoundland statesman, lawyer and jurist. He served as a member of the British War Cabinet, 1916-17. He was created a Baron in 1918. Not one of us who believe in libertarian and Socialist ideas had heard of the present Lord Morris.

The Duke's calmness and Lord Morris's intervention were too much for the Lord Chancellor. He was white with rage. He did not answer the Duke's points but simply lost his temper. I have noted since that even some of the reporters for the ordinary press record the fact that the Lord Chancellor went white with anger.

I return to the Marquess of Londonderry. I daresay Gestapo is in his blood. It is the Stewart tradition.

In 1939, Victor Gollancz published a remarkable and interesting book, entitled Tory M.P. by Simon Haxey. Herein are listed the active champions of Fascism and Nazism, the friends of Mussolini, Hitler, and Franco. Only one slight reference is to be found in these well-informed pages to the Russell family. There is no reference to the Duke of Bedford. The truth is that the fifth Duke defended the French Revolution in the House of Lords almost alone and the present Duke defended the Soviet Revolution when the press of Britain was denouncing it and the present Prime Minister was praising and supporting, as a member of the British Cabinet, White Russian adventurers, Denikin and Kolchak, against the Soviet. The Stewart family—the Marquesses of Londonderry and Viscount Castlereagh—figure prominently in this vigorous and effective indictment of Fascism and Capitalist Imperialism.

On pages 148-152 the author details the full story of the Londonderry family. No apology is needed for embodying the record in this indictment.

In 1937, Lord Londonderry was President of the Conservative Party Organisation. In 1890 the Londonderrys owned 50,323 acres with an annual rent-roll of £100,118. The family also held 11,560 acrres in Antrim.

Londonderry's ancestors were Scottish landowners. In the reign of James I., they received a grant of forfeited estates in Ireland. Marriage with the laughter and heir of Sir Henry Vane-Templest brought the family large estates in Durham and elsewhere. The family name became Vane-Templest-Stewart.

The most famous, or infamous, member of the family was the Viscount Castlereagh, son of the 1st Marquess, notorious during the Carlile period. He brought about the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland. He bought the Irish House of Commons and eulogised his corruption in one of his letters as "the profligacy of the means by which the Union has been accomplished." Castlereagh was returned as M.P. for County Down after an election which cost him £30,000 in bribery and vote-buying. Shelley denounced him in the stern uncompromising lines :—

I met Murder on the way,
He had a mask like Castlereagh.

Byron, who defended the Luddites in his famous House of Lord's speech, attacked Castlereagh in many vigorous epigrams. He wrote of Castlereagh's suicide :—

So Castlereagh has cut his throat; the worst
Of this is that his own was not the first.

Canning, then Foreign Secretary, held Castlereagh responsible for the disastrous expedition against Antwerp in which 40,000 soldiers were landed on the fever-stricken island of Walchehen and there lost their lives; this expedition cost £26,000,000 of public money.

Castlereagh was strongly sympathetic to the so-called "Holy Alliance," a league of the despotic rulers of Russia, Austria, and Prussia for the better suppression of democratic doctrines throughout Europe. Castlereagh feared the effects of the French Revolution and was the chief promoter of the hated Six Acts, the "Gagging Acts" by which the ruling class Party tried to quash the demand for reform.

News of his suicide was received with wild delight by the people of London. The crowd at his funeral outside Westminster Abbey cheered while the service was proceeding.

Harriet Martineau declared :

There was abundant reason for the rejoicing which spread throughout the world on the death of Lord Londonderry. When a man's acts have proved him the enemy of his race, his race will not desire him to live that he should continue those acts.

The Dictionary of National Biography (Vol. LIV., p. 280) gives a similar picture of his brother, the 3rd Marquess :

. . . in England, as a conspicuous opponent of reform, he had incurred so much hostility that he was on one occasion mobbed and dragged off his horse.

It was calculated that he and his immediate relatives received a total of £11,100 a year in places and pensions.

The Durham estates of the Vane-Tempest-Stewarts grew rapidly in value during the nineteenth century, mainly as a result of the exploitation of coal. Lord Londonderry is to-day the Chairman of Londonderry Collieries, Ltd., while his son, Viscount Castlereagh, M.P., is Assistant Managing Director.

The fourth Lord Londonderry issued a manifesto in his dual capacity as mineowner and Lord Lieutenant of Durham County, during the great strike of the miners in 1844 for fairer terms of hiring. He superintended, as Lord Lieutenant, the wholesale eviction of the strikers from their homes, and their supersession by Irishmen specially imported from his Irish estates and peremptorily ordered the resident traders of Seaham not to supply provisions to the workmen on strike.. His manifesto was reprinted in the Northern Star for July 27th, 1844. Part of it runs as follows :

Lord Londonderry again warns all the shopkeepers and tradesmen in his town of Seaham that if they still give credit to pitmen who hold off work, and continue in the Union, such men will be marked by his agents and overmen, and will never be employed in his collieries again, and the shopkeepers may be assured that they will never have any custom or dealings from Lord Londonderry's large concerns that he can in any manner prevent.

Lord Londonderry further informs the traders and shopkeepers, that having by his measures increased very largely the last year's trade to Seaham, and if credit is so improperly and so fatally given to his unreasonable pitmen, thereby prolonging thee injurious strike, it is his firm determination to carry back all the outlay of his concerns even to Newcastle.

Because it is neither fair, just, nor equitable that the resident traders in his own town should combine and assist the infatuated workmen, and pitmen, in prolonging their own miseries by continuing an insane strike, and an unjust and senseless warfare against their proprietors and masters.

In the two counties mentioned—County Durham and County Down—in both of which the Vane-Tempest-Stewarts have been landowners and mine-owners, Parliamentary seats were long at their command. Here are the periods during which these two constituencies were actually represented by the Vane-Tempest-Stewarts :

County Down	County Durham
1771-83	1675-7
1790-1805	1678-89
	1705
1812-20	1741-54
1826-52	1761
1878-84	1768-90
1931-1944	1794-1800

The present Lord Londonderry gave evidence at the Coal Commission of 1919. (Report of the Coal Commission, 1919, Daily Telegraph, May 9th.) At this Commission he said :

That he owned minerals already proved to exist in about 5,808 acres in the county of Durham. He also carried on business as a colliery-owner in that country, being the owner of three collieries situated near Seaham Harbour. . . . He carried on his business as the Londonderry Collieries, Limited. All the shares in that company except four of £100 each belonged to him. As between that company and his estate, the coal-mines were let to the company, the amount of the rents, which averaged 4½d. per ton, being credited and paid to him by the company. The number of men and boys employed at the colliery were 7,000.

Lord Londonderry added that the town and harbour of Seaham were established by his great-grandmother, and that he owned the railway. He then provided statistics :

The total output of coal from all the freehold properties belonging to witness in the years 1913 to 1918 inclusive was 3,280,321 tons, of which 1,569,296 tons were worked by Londonderry Collieries, Limited, and the balance by other lessees. The royalties . . . were fixed tonnage royalties. They varied from . . . 5½d. to 3½d. per ton. Of the average annual output of 546,720 tons, 378,124 tons were worked at an average of about 4½d. per ton. The average annual income received by his father and himself from mineral royalties and way-leaves during these years were:

Mineral royalties	£9,608
Way-leaves	£5,076
Independent surface way-leaves	£656

The witness declared that he was opposed to nationalisation and believed in ownership of private property. The report continues :

Mr. HERBERT SMITH: If the holding of your property were to cause national distress, would you consider changing your views of the rights of property?

Lord LONDONDERRY: If the community became anarchic they would take everyone's property.

The present Viscount Castlereagh, son and heir of Lord Londonderry, sits in Parliament for County Down. His father, the present Marquess of Londonderry, broke the family tradition by sitting for Maidstone as Conservative M.P. from 1906 to 1915. He had also held the following positions : Under Secretary of State for Air, 1920-1 ; Minister of Education and Leader of the Senate (Northern Ireland), 1921-26 ; First Commissioner of Works, 1928-9, 1931 ; Secretary of State for Air, 1931-5 ; Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Lords, 1935 ; Mayor of Durham, 1936-7. Lord Londonderry was a member of the Anglo-German Fellowship. His wife and son were both members of the Spanish Children's Repatriation Committee, an organisation closely associated with the Friends of National Spain.

In other words the entire Londonderry family supported Franco against the common people in Spain and their struggle towards a workers' republic.

OURSELVES AND GERMANY

SHOULD BRITAIN REGARD GERMANY AS HER POTENTIAL ENEMY, OR SEEK HER FRIENDSHIP? LORD LONDONDERRY THINKS WE SHOULD ADOPT A POLICY OF FRIENDSHIP WITH HITLER AND A BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF GERMANY'S AIMS

The dust-cover explained :—

This book . . . is the clearest exposition so far of the policy of rapprochement with Nazi Germany and a plea for a more sympathetic understanding of Herr Hitler's point of view.

Few men have played such an important part in our diplomatice relations with Germany as Lord Londonderry. During his frequent visits abroad he has spent considerable time with Hitler, Goring, von Neurath and Ribbentrop. This book first appeared early in 1938, summarising his experiences in Germany and expressing his sympathy with the aims of Germany's foreign policy. It is now reprinted with no alteration, except the addition of new material which brings the book up to date.

This study is too long already. I will not quote the author's remarkable preface to this work. One sentence will suffice :

I would like to take this opportunity of expressing my particular gratitude to Herr Hitler, Field Marshal Goring, Herr von Ribbentrop, and Baron von Neurath for their repeated kindnesses and hospitality to me and members of my family, as well as for affording me many interesting sources of information.

The rest of this preface and the wisdom of the Marquess of Londonderry's book I will deal with in a special essay. As also with his Anglo-German Review essay. Enough has been cited to establish the nature of the political sympathies expressed by the Marquess down to the very outbreak of war. Does anyone believe that this man should be taken seriously by the working class of Britain, the miners and labourers of field and factory, the soldiers drawn from the ranks of the proletariat, as a patriot and enemy of Fascism? Was not Nazism persecuting the Jews and the Socialists during Londonderry's visits to Hitler and Goering? Is he in a position to pass scathing remarks while the Duke of Bedford pleads now the cause of conscience, and now the cause of jailed ex-service men under 18B, in the House of Lords? When the Service men and women return from their sufferings given and received, when the last conscientious objector to be released from jail takes his place again in society as one day he must, when the last 18B victim has been restored to liberty, who will be upholding the people's right of justice side by side with those Socialists who have not compromised their ideals for the sake of securing place and profit — the most noble the Marquess of Londonderry, or the much despised and ignored defender of civil liberty, the Pacifist Duke of Bedford?

FRED JOWETT

Our veteran comrade, Fred. Jowett, passed away at his Bradford home, on Tuesday afternoon, February 1, the day after his 80th birthday. He read his birthday correspondence before lapsing into the final sleep.

Since October, 1941, Comrade Jowett has been a regular and valuable contributor to these columns. He remained vigorous and active for Socialism to the end. We have a large number of essays from his pen for publication and will release these at an early date. Comrade Jowett was addressing personal letters to us, discussing every phase of Socialist thought and struggle, to within a few days of his death. Every letter revealed his sincerity and greatness.

Much has been said about his work in these columns. We are proud of the tribute paid to the living man and do not need to weep beside his grave. We do intend, however, to collect and publish some of the appreciations that have been expressed concerning his loyal work to the common people during a life of untiring and selfless devotion. A collection of his anti-war essays during this war, and bold questions and utterances in the House of Commons during the last war, will be published by the Strickland Press at an early date.

The tribute we must pay to Jowett's memory is to unite for Socialism and Peace. Let us have a powerful united, genuine Socialist movement, a movement of living pacifism and service to humanity. Let us build now.

The Rationalist Press Association suggests that our readers should write to their M.P.s at the House of Commons, Westminster, London, S.W.1, in opposition to Clause 24 of the Bill which makes it compulsory in every school for the day to begin "with a collective act of worship on the part of all pupils." The R.P.A. claims that this is a return, in principle, to the Act of Uniformity. No "conscience clause" would, in practice, be operative.

Readers who hold this view should make known their irrevocable opposition to the infringements of civil liberty inherent in the proposals of the Bill with regard to :—

1. The compulsory act of collective worship.
2. The maintenance of Dual Control.
3. The continuation of denominational religious instruction in any school aided by public funds.
4. Religious tests for any teachers in State-aided schools.

WAR OBJECTORS—
DUKE OF BEDFORD IN ACTION

Under the excellent sub-heading adopted above, Denis Hayes, Editor of the C.B.C.O. Bulletin, publishes an interesting summary of the Duke of Bedford's speech in the House of Lords on the "Cat and Mouse" treatment of War Objectors and Lord Croft's weak official reply to the Duke's strong factual and legal indictment.

Denis Hayes treats his readers to an interesting picture of the Duke in action in his opening paragraphs :—

The Duke of Bedford has again raised in the House of Lords the position of C.O.s.

On January 18th there were about fifty peers present in the heavily ornamented chamber in which the Lords now meet. The Lord Chancellor, in full wig and robe, sat on the large red Woolsack, when from the Socialist Benches the tall, gaunt figure of the Duke of Bedford rose to call attention to the continued "cat and mouse" treatment of conscientious objectors with special reference to practices which deprive them of the protection intended under the National Service Acts. Some noble Lords continued to chat to their neighbours amiably, but there was no interruption.

The Friend, for January 28, comments on the Duke's speech in the following paragraphs :—

We appreciatively acknowledge the devotion to the principles for which the Conscientious Objector stands displayed by the Duke of Bedford, who last week once more faced a largely unsympathetic House of Lords when he called attention to repeated prosecutions of objectors, both men and women. Objectors affected include those to whom tribunals have refused the exemption they claimed and also, as the Duke pointed out, those like George Elphick, the local F.O.R. secretary at Lewes, and Laurance Tarr, a 60-year-old member of our own Society, because of their refusal, for conscientious reasons, to fire-watch. . . .

The scandals of the last war have, happily, been largely avoided this time, but constant vigilance is necessary. And no amount of legal or considerate treatment can alter our belief that compulsion for military purposes is in itself an evil which we must continupe to oppose.

With the Duke of Bedford, we remain unconvinced on the very point that The Friend takes for granted. Gilbert C. Lane, of Wallington, Surrey, having foolishly taken a medical examination, has been court-martialled six times. Basil W. Cullingford and Jack Boddy of Norwich have been prosecuted repeatedly for refusing to obey directions to part-time Civil Defence under Defence Regulation 29BA. L. G. Bidewell has been prosecuted twice. George Elphick was prosecuted and sentenced for the eighth time for refusing to do fire-watching. In Prisons and Detention Barracks throughout the country a number of conscientious objectors are to be found

And the war office does not scruple about falsifying facts to impress complacent politicians. As witness these two quotations :—

Detention is not in the same category as imprisonment. It is very light. Detention does not take place in a cell; it takes place under camp conditions. —Sir James Grigg, Secretary of State for War in the House of Commons, October 12th, 1943.

. . . while the word "detention" carries less stigma than the word "imprisonment," the treatment of persons sentenced to imprisonment and detention is in the main the same, the only difference being that some of the places of detention are in their environmnt more unpleasant than others.—Report of the Prime Minister's Committee of Enquiry into Detention Barracks, November, 1943.

Every soldier knows that the statement made by Sir James Grigg is false. We were in Devizes Detention Barracks during the last war and both then and since we have served hard labour sentences in different prisons. The Report of the Prime Minister's Committee is correct and the statement made by Sir James Grigg is incorrect accordingly.

The scandals of the last war have not been avoided. The conscientious objector has less vigorous defenders. During the last war, the war resister had powerful defenders in Earl Russell, Lord Parmoor, and Lord Sheffield. These noble Lords are deceased. Their speeches were outstanding and sometimes earned grudging support from other peers. To-day there is no bold spokesman for the right of conscience in the House of Lords other than the Duke of Bedford. He stands completely alone.

The loneliness of the Duke of Bedford in his defence of conscience and his maintainence of civil liberty is a scandal of this war, a grave scandal peculiar to this war. The Friend does not assist the struggle for conscience and civil liberty by ignoring facts.

"VOODOO BEAT"
By ROBERT KENNEDY

"Voodoo Beat" was the title of an item of a radio programme on the Forces wavelength at 10.15 one Saturday evening sometime since. The item consisted of a 15-minute gramophone recital of the fear-instilling, blood-chilling music of the Voodoo cult.

The preamble to this item defined Voodooism as a form of black magic still to be found among the natives of the West Indies and some of the southern states of U.S.A. Black magic, superstition, fear, oh, the odium of the thought that such things should exist in this enlightened (?) age! But worse was to come. In a melodramatic voice the announcer went on to impart the incredible information that the high priests of this loathsome practice did, and sometimes still do, demand human sacrifices. These innocent victims of this demand were subjected to cruel and horrible deaths.

Can the reader believe that in this year of grace, nineteen hundred and forty four, such practices still exist? Surely the enlightened doctrines of Capitalism, Imperialism, and Monopoly have permeated every corner of the inhabited world and every strata of the societies inhabiting the globe. Can one imagine the High Priests of Finance, the twentieth-century prophets of a benevolent God of Mammon, demanding a human sacrifice? No! the king-pin of our civilization is to love our neighbour as one's self. The shedding of blood is a thing of the past; no longer do we sacrifice victims in ones or twos from some weird blood-lust rituals; nor do we slaughter thousands in alleged religious crusades. No longer do we seduce the masses from the healthful, creative, progressive purpose of living to that of destruction, by the use of sensuous, soul-destroying rhythm or the paassion-inflaming blare of the march. All this belongs to brutal and bloody past. We are more deliberate, artistic, cold, and scientific in our destructiveness. Should you, gentle reader, entertain for one moment the idea that those wonderful inventions the cinema and the radio have taken the place of the ancient tom-tom and are but the modern expressions of Voodoism and the "Voodoo Beat," give up such unpatriotic, irreligious and barbarous thinking. Rest assured that, wherever militarist society's civilizing influences penetrate, there no longer do the tom-toms roll out their terrorising thunder, rending the stillness of the night, and rousing the savage lust for blood. Should such voices disturb the peacefulness of your repose, remember the closing injunction of the announcer of "Voodoo Beat" "let us hope it is only your imagination"—or the Sirens.

THE UNITED SOCIALIST MOVEMENT

A Very Short Story of its Antecedents and Developments

By J. TAYLOR CALDWELL

A new Group of the U.S.M. has been formed in Lanarkshire—and another in Brooklyn, New York, U.S.A.! Several others seem to be in the process of being formed. Not by any conscious effort on the part of the Glasgow (Pioneer) Group, for we are not out to "build" Groups; we like to see them form themselves by the natural coming-together of the people concerned. So these new Groups and those which are in promise please us because they show that our propaganda has not been wasted: they also show that the U.S.M. form of Group organisation is that which arises naturally from the people.

Several younger comrades have written us to say that, while they would like to form a U.S.M. Group, they are not sure what we "stand for." Do we not seek power? Don't we want to send members to Parliament? How do they know we won't betray them? This article is intended to help those comrades out of their perplexity.

The U.S.M. does not seek power, nor does it want to send people to Parliament; nor can it betray the workers because it does not aspire to become a Party apart from the workers. Every Group looks after its own affairs with no interference from the Pioneer Group. There is no Central Executive—there's not even an affiliation fee!

The U.S.M. is a very easy-going congregation of Socialists. We meet in Groups and discuss current affairs and methods of propaganda. We convene public meetings, and sell socialist literature on the streets. We propagate Socialism as fully as we can in our private lives by our actions, and by our comments, arguments, and general attitude. We have no "Party line." Our policy doesn't change from day to day. We are Socialists, and we act accordingly.

By "Socialism" we don't mean the Dictatorship of a Party. The dictator-mind is not attracted to so ultra-democratic an organisation as the U.S.M. We mean the social ownership and control of natural resources, of the means of production and the machines of distribution; substituting for their exploitation for profit their organisation as servants of our needs. We believe that politics and political society are an evil and should end, and that in place of the government of people by Parliament and the State we should have the administration of things by elected, unprivileged Industrial Councils.

Being individual Socialists we do not all agree on all points. Some of us think that coupon-money will be needed in the transitional stage to a money-less society. Some of us are sympathetic to Peace organisations—as well as to the Pacifist activities of the U.S.M. Some of us think the Church might be revolutionised. A few, but not many, of us think that Socialists in Parliament are useful for making Socialist propaganda easier outside of Parliament.

We are, as already stated, a congregation of Socialists. We meet to co-ordinate our activities, and help each other in our propaganda. We have no Party discipline. We are opposed to authoritarianism in all its forms.

FORMATION OF THE U.S.M.

The Glasgow (Pioneer) Branch was formed in 1934, but the history of the Group goes back to 1906, and the ideas which it represents are found inspiring men and women away back at the time of the French Revolution, and the very beginning of Socialist propaganda.

When Socialism first began to be preached its message was clear: the overthrow of the middle (Capitalist) class and the establishment of the working-class as the only class in ociety. And with memories of the French Revolution in mind the methods seemed clear too: direct action.

But the repeated failure of violent upheaval at the barricades drove Socialist thought into other channels. One school favoured industrial action — the General Strike; non-co-operative, passive resistance—and the other school advocates the attainment of political power. This latter course meant a programme of "reforms," "immediate aims"—the patching up and continuance of the old society, and the delay of the new society.

Then it grew to mean more than that. It finally meant that those who had a litle ability could very soon leave the street corner rostrum for a seat in the legislature. It meant a career for the ambitious. It was a new field and rich in opportunity. It was easy to arouse the poor into a state of self-pity and have them cry for reforms—and have them vote men into Parliament to get these reforms. It was easy to arouse them, and the careerists saw that the poor were aroused. It was good to use up their energies in this futile game of sending men to Parliament.

And, of course, young men—and women—deliberately entered "politics" as a career. And fathers already established made the way easy for the sons to follow. So the game of Labour Parliamentarism was started and played with great gusto. But Socialism was only a pawn in the game; so were the people.

William Morris saw this, and in 1884 he left the Social Democratic Federation and formed the Socialist League in the hope that the League would operate without the charlatanism of place-hunters.

He was unsuccessful, and in 1893 the League was dissolved. Parliamentary Socialism grew in force and influence. It captured the Trade Union movement and in 1904 the Unions formed a political organisation: The Representative Committee. In 1906 this body became the Labour Party.

Guy Aldred—Anti-Parliamentary Pioneer.

In 1904, at the age of 18, Guy Aldred entered the political arena. Not as one looking for a career—he had one in front of him if he cared to pursue it, for he was regarded as a young journalist of outstanding merit—but as one inspired by the ethic of world brotherhood and service that has moved many poets and prophets down the ages. After two years of apprenticeship as a vigorous propagandist for the Social Democratic Federation he left that organisation and began to attack the sham of Parliamentary Socialism (see the Justice letter reprinted in Dogmas Discarded, Pt. II., chapter 12).

He revived the ideas of industrial direct action and formed Communist groups all over London. By 1914 they were in existence all over the country. And they were Communist Groups. Founded eleven years before the Russian Revolution they urged the need for an International—which the Bolshevics later formed and corrupted. In those days the word Communist meant a member or sympathizer with one of these Groups. The bastard-communism of the Communist Party was unknown—it had not been invented.

It was quite natural that Aldred should spend the war years in gaol. But the power-hunger Labourites continued their desertion of Socialism. Beginning as an expedient only, the attainment of Parlamentary power had become an end in itself. Parliamentarism meant Nationalism; and Nationalism meant war. So while the orthodox Socialists of the Allies and the Central Powers were shouting for each other's blood in the interests of World Brotherhood Guy Aldred was kept in gaol as a dangerous character.

With the advent of the Russian Revolution many of the Communist Groups, seeing the "New Light" became members of the Communist Party. But Aldred, with his peculiar sense of divining the future development of embryo organisations stayed clear of the new Party and was very soon attacking its bureacratic nature.

In 1921 the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation was founded as a federation of several Communist Groups. Till 1933 the Federation carried on vigorous propaganda and in many districts gained more support than the subsidized Communist Party. Then the betrayal of McDonald and the general collapse of the Labour Party as a serious Socialist body made it so clear to the workers that Parliament was not the way to Socialism that Anti-Parliamentary propaganda seemed superfluous.

Aldred broke away from the A.P.C.F. which declined and died a few years later. With several other comrades he established a Workers' Open Forum. This bridged the gap till the mind of the Movement became more settled; then several comrades, some from the Anti-Parliamentary Communist Federation, some from the I.L.P. and some unattached, came together and formed the United Socialist Movement.

The theme of the inagural speeches was: Parliament, or no Parliament we are Socialists. Let Parliament betray us and "leaders" desert us, Socialism is still the only hope of the workers. We are Socialists. We are the Movement. In this at least we are United Socialists.

"CONCHIE" NOTES

The Conscientious Objectors' Tribunal at Liverpool on October 1, 1943, granted unconditional exemption from military service (Home Guard) to Marco Pallis (48) of Fulwood Park, Liverpool, musician, author and traveller.

Pallis is an ex-Service man of the last war. After living among Hindus and Buddhists in the East in 1933 and 1936 he renounced meat and fish as a step towards non-injuriousness.

In this war he had put in nearly two years of continuous voluntary work at the Liverpool Citizens' Advice Bureau. He was registered for special duties in the event of a revival of air raids, and he was to be placed in charge of the Reception and Advice department of the Emergency Help Centre for South Liverpool.

Mr. J. W. Wheeler, of Greystoke Avenue, Pinner, Middlesex, draws attention in the "Middlesex Advertiser," Uxbridge, for Oct., 22, 1943, to the "Cat and Mouse" treatment of Miss Florence Haynes, of Ruislip, at that time in Holloway Prison serving a sentence of three months (in lieu of a fine of £20) imposed at Uxbridge Police Court on September 20. Her offence was that she had refused to register for fireguard duties under the Civil Defence Duties (Compulsory Enrolment) Order, 1942, and she stated that she had a conscientious objection to such registration.

Miss Haynes was prosecuted at Ealing Police Court on April 2, 1942, for failing to carry out fire prevention duties and was fined £5, in lieu of which she served one month's imprisonment.

On June 25, 1943, Miss Haynes was prosecuted at Uxbridge Police Court for failing to register under the Civil Defence Duties (Compulsory Enrolment) Order, her reason for not registering being the fact that there was no provision for conscientious objection in the Order. She was fined £10 in lieu of which she served two months' imprisonment.

Although the genuineness of Miss Haynes' conscientious convictions has never been challenged, she was sentenced to a third term of imprisonment on account of her principles.

Under the Fire Guard (Local Authority Services) Order 1943, it is no longer an offence to fail to give particulars following conviction, for non-registration. This Order came into force on September 20, the date on which Miss Haynes was last prosecuted.

Neville Chamberlain, in the House of Commons, on May 4, 1939, said:—

I think we found it both a useless and exasperating waste of time and effort to force such people (C.O's) to act in a manner which is contrary to their principles.

The present Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill, speaking in the House on March 20, 1941, described anything in the nature of persecution, victimisation, or man-hunting of conscientious objectors as "odious to the British people."

A BALANCE SHEET OF STATESMANSHIP

By C. H. NORMAN

The present state of the ordinary citizen in Britain and Europe is so terrifying (as slavery exists generally except for the buying and selling of the slave market) and the prospect for the future is so gloomy, that it is worth while considering the records of the leaders of the various communities whose activities have brought the citizen to this dreadful condition. As a preliminary, it is worth setting down in simple language what is the position of the ordinary citizen in Britain and Europe as the result of recent wars and revolutions. He has been deprived of the free use of his labour power: he has been deprived of the opportunity of purchasing such food, clothes and other articles that he may desire. He has no right to his own home, as all kinds of people can be billeted upon him. He is denied the opportunity of reading anything about the war except the particular selection of lies that his particular government, British, German, American, or Italian, chooses to permit the newspapers or the wireless to circulate. The only thing that can be said of this news is that 95 per cent. of it is plainly false, the British, Russian and American liars being as clumsy as their German Italian and Japanese counterparts. His home has been broken-up by the conscription of women, which has taken its worst forms in Russia and Britain, though, in due time, other countries will copy these bad examples. His children, male and female, are scattered all over the country doing unpleasant and dangerous war service for most of which civilised human beings are totally unfitted. His wages, poor and scanty in most cases, are heavily eaten into by income tax, purchase tax, and other forms of taxation. The persons who have created this appalling state of things for the most part have contrived that they are largely immune from or can evade the rigorous laws and regulations they impose upon others. The British citizen lives under a regime in which, by a cruel and rediculous fiction, everyone is supposed to know the law. Since 1939, according to Butterworth's handbook of Emergency Legislation over 200 Statutes have been passed through the House of Commons and several thousand statutory rules and orders, mostly carrying heavy penalties have been enacted by various Government Departments! How the King in Council and the judicial body can reconcile this state of things with the oath taken under the Act of Settlement and the Promissory Oaths Act is a matter for their consciences; but never was the British citizen oppressed by such a spate of stupid and tyrannical orders and rules as in the years 1939-1944.

All the belligerent Governments have reached the point in which the more their citizens are engaged in active destruction by bombs, rifle, submarine and aircraft the better they are pleased. The remarkable doctrine of the "scorched earth" (which began in Russia nearly 150 years ago) has been developed in many peculiar and sinister ways by these governments which are supposed to guarantee their citizens liberty, life and property. Indeed, the only excuse for the existence of these governments is no longer valid. The purpose of all these belligerent governments is the destruction of the life, liberty and property of their citizens, whose wives and children share in the common disaster brought upon them. It is true that Mr. Churchill blames Mr. Hitler and Mr. Hitler blames Mr. Stalin and Signor Mussolini blames Mr. Roosevelt and vice versa. But that is all part of the game of deceiving the citizens of each state, so that their wrath may not be concentrated upon the real authors of their misfortunes who are within their reach, but upon some mythical devil in human form who is beyond their reach and control. One would have thought this stale device would have been worked out by now, as surely it must be obvious that powerful states like Britain, the United States, Germany, Russia and France cannot produce the calamities of these days without their rulers being willing participants in the crime.

Let us consider the record of some of the rulers whose policies and actions have contributed to the shocking condition of the world. There was Sir Edward Grey, one main architect of Britain's misfortunes, who was engaged in dangerous intrigues the whole time he was Foreign Secretary, about which he spoke nothing but falsehoods when questioned in the House of Commons. This man's wisdom and judgment can be measured by his statement in a considered and careful memorandum prepared by himself as early as February, 1906, four months after taking office as Foreign Secretary. "I hope the French recognise that in a war with Germany British liabilities would be much less than theirs. We shall risk little or nothing on land, and at sea we might shut the German fleet up in Kiel and keep it there without losing a ship or a man or even firing a shot." (The Coming of the Storm, J. P. Gooch, page 16.) Considering what did happen when the war that Grey, the alleged peace-lover, was discussing in 1906, did actually come about, these sentences are really beyond the scope of reasonable comment. This man Grey drew from the taxpayers of this country over £50,000 while in office; and that was the kind of self-revealed mentality for which they were paying! Of a similar character was Mr. Winston Churchill's statement in October, 1939, that the U-boat campaign was completely under control and that not a German ship dare to venture on the sea. Over the water, there was Herr Goering's statement that German cities could not be bombed and that no foreign air force could stand against the German Luftwaffe. There have been Mr. Hitler's repeated announcements of the annihilation and complete defeat of the Russian Armies, which may be balanced against the wild statement of Mr. Stalin about the German losses in killed, wounded and prisoners, plus his bold assertion in May, 1942, that the Germans would certainly be "driven out of Russia by the end of 1942." The absurdity of all these statements was apparent to any reflecting mind of the time they were made: but their authors hoped that the public memory would be so short that they would fade from recollection, being substituted by the numerous similar falsehoods which these various persons have uttered since.

Russian statecraft has been so reckless that in forty years the Russian people have been involved in three disastrous wars, in two of which the defeat was heavy, and in the third of which the calamity has been great. Those wars are the Russo-Japanese war, the war of 1914-1918, the main cause of which was the Russian policy in the Balkans, and the unfinished war which began by the partial occupation of Poland in 1939, and the war against Finland in 1939-1940 by the Soviet Armies, though the issue was not really joined till the invasion of Russia by Germany in 1941.

There is little to choose between the policies of France and Germany in the past seventy years. The destruction of both states is a possible result of the calamitous policies for which Bismark, Napoleon III, Von Moltke, Poincare, Delcasse, Deladier, the German Chancellor, Bethman Hollweg, and Herr Hitler and his advisers hold an equal responsibility.

One could develop the theme indefinitely did space allow. There is the final and terrible example of the result of the ambition of Mr. Lloyd George. This man ached to be Prime Minister. His only hope of being Prime Minister was through the exigencies of war (as was the case with Mr. Winston Churchill). When the Liberal Cabinet under Mr. Asquith, appalled at the casualties on the French front, was considering negotiating peace with Germany in 1916, Mr. Lloyd George intrigued against his leader and finally displaced him by the cry of the "knock out blow," so satisfying his ambition of being Prime Minister. The state of Europe at the present time is the handiwork of this Welsh architect of the Treaty of Versailles. He drew from the British taxpayer over £75,000 in salary, and he obtained an additional £100,000 from his book on the war, derived largely from information secured while acting as war Prime Minister. The British citizen had a bad bargain in the case of Mr. Lloyd George, who is supposed to have led the Empire to victory, but in truth largely contributed by his evil policies to the present desperate situation.

How desperately placed the British Empire is as a result of the efforts of British statesmen from 1906 to 1942 can be seen by this summary. Large parts of British Empire are under the domination of a conqueror, Japan. Other large parts are in grave peril from that same enemy. Large sections of the British Empire have been handed over to the control of the United States. Those who appreciate the true war position know that the British Empire could not have gone on against Germany, Italy and Japan, with anything but the certainty of complete defeat. without the assistance to the full extent of the United States. The rulers of the United States are now controlling large parts of the British and French Empires. The defence of Australia and New Zealand is being mainly undertaken by the forces of the United States plus the local forces. Mr. Winston Churchill declared that he had not undertaken the duty of Prime Minister in order to assist in the liquidation of the British Empire: but the present position is nothing but an advanced form of liquidation? The Empire is simply overwhelmed in debt which is mountain high.

The Spanish, Chinese, Italian, American, and Japanese statesmen have brought immeasurable catastrophies upon the peoples of their countries in the last forty years. The state of the United States and Australia in the slump period would be unbelievable to the ordinary British citizen, grave though the unemployment was in Britain during that time. In Sydney, the effective capital of Australia, 85 per cent. of the able-bodied population were without employment at one period.

The facts speak for themselves. What hope is there for the future? The electoral returns during the war show that the same kind of dunderheads and knaves are being returned to the legislative assemblies, from which democratic governments are drawn. The shorthand notes of the treason trials in Russia under Mr. Stalin's rule revealed a terrifying state of public corruption of every kind. The dilemma there is plain! Either the charges against the accused were true, in which case one can only say Communism in Russia has produced a dreadful state of public morality; or else the changes were imaginary, in which case what can one think of a government which invented such a method of destroying its political opponents?

Those who talk so glibly about a new order springing from the war (at a time when the most strenuous effort is required to get a few shillings a week addition to wages) might explain how they reconcile their assertions with the facts reviewed here. Or is this talk merely another variation of the carrot held in front of the donkey Democracy's nose to induce the poor donkey to tread the path of tribulation uncomplainingly to the grave?

"ALIEN BLACKS"

The Duke of Bedford and His Pro-War Critics

Three Years Press Campaign Reviewed.

When Herbert Morrison mentioned the Duke of Bedford without relevance in the House of Commons on Tuesday, October 21, 1941, the pro-war press decided to make the Duke the subject of untiring attack. In due course, the "Communist" press joined forces with the millionaire press and became a most aggressive co-belligerent. The campaign of abuse augurs well for the Duke's future activity. Even E. D. Morel triumphed over the war-time slanders of the same press and the same journalistic psychology as assailed the Duke. Ramsay Macdonald was threatened with the Tower but Horatio Bottomley became the convict and died a pauper. The press that denounces the Duke of Bedford to-day slandered the miners during the General Strike. The war press is entrenched and corrupt. It is Mammon-eloquent. But it is a fraud and truth will destroy it and its bloody masquerade of pomp, circumstance, and glory.

In this article we do not propose to cover the ground already traversed in these columns. We make a selective study of press attacks not tabulated or discussed hitherto with our readers. They make interesting and instructive and sometimes amusing reading. Slander has a puny aspect largely because its venom is without humour. Unthinkingly, the Duke's enemies portray him as a thinker and a propagandist, a man of public courage and affection, moved by singleness of purpose and a spirit of uncompromising integrity. The abuse presents us with an excellent likeness of the man abused, one who speaks and writes from sanity; a warrior-prophet of peace who uses the word, spoken or written, as a weapon to be employed in loyalty to his fellow-man.

Let us glance at the attacks in order: 1941; 1942; and 1943.

We begin with the year 1941.

Commenting on Morrison's statement that he was watching the Duke of Dedford's activities very closely, the Scots Daily Express for October 22 stated :—

We hope Mr. Morrison will read the duke's latest pamphlet "What a Game!"

Labour men, before rejoicing in the Express attack on the Duke, ought to pause to consider the type of jingo "Labour Leader" this Beaverbrook organ supported during the last war, men who passed into oblivion with the coming of the Armistice. It supports Will Lawther to-day and denounces the Duke of Bedford. We hope the workers will remember that Will Lawther, the miner, not yet the miner's leader, opposed the last war. Horatio Bottomley was the "hero" of the moment. Workers should look up the Daily Express record and reflect: What a Game!

The pamphlet was reviewed antagonistically by the chief columnist in The Evening Standard, London, for the same date, at some length. We quote all that matters—the significant opening paragraph :—

I have been reading the pamphlet written by the Duke of Bedford entitled "What a Game!" It is marked by that kind of logic which has led His Grace from one political and economic abyss to another.

Setting his name out in big type as the heading, the Aberdeen Evening Express for October 28 quoted with joy the following mention of the Duke by the Rome radio :—

The Axis Powers are in no need of peace overtures from the Duke.

Italy's unconditional surrender would seem to give an unexpected emphasis to their 1941 boast of the Rome radio. At the head of the recognised Italian Government is the former war criminal, Badoglio, Marshal of Italy, sometime Duke of Addis Ababa, our co-belligerent against Fascism. Badoglio worked on the theory of poison gas against the Abyssinians. When the Duke of Bedford would have negotiated with the Italian Socialists, Radicals, and Liberals, in exile in London and New York while the fighting was going on, the Duke's critics and enemies, the apostles of unconditional surrender plotted to impose on Italy and Sicily Amgot and Badoglio. Amgot, with its financiers, who had no knowledge of nor interest in living democracy, denies the right of Italian Socialists to agitate and decides that political silence that must prevail in Italy and Sicily lest the people talk, commune, think, revolt and inaugurate a new society. The Rome radio was right. It was anticipating the events of 1943 when it condemned the Duke of Bedford's policy in 1941. Badoglio and his cronies were not in need of peace overtures from the Duke of Bedford for he had none to make to them. His message was to the Italian common people. Badoglio was looking hopefully, and not without reason, to the statesmen-dictators of the policy of "unconditional surrender!"

In its issue for October 30, the News Review, London, summarised the Duke's situation and reaction in some smart paragraphs from which we quote :—

Earnest but erring Hastings Sackville Russell, 12th Duke of Bedford, says he is a pacifist, but he is seldom at peace. . . .

Once a Labour Party fan, he switched his allegiance to Social Credit, then began promoting his own organisations with the object of obtaining European peace. . . .

The patient Duke was not discouraged. Lately issued by him was a pamphlet entitled "What a Game!" in which he deduced that war is lunacy. . . .

Last week the unfortunate Duke was dragged somewhat unnecessarily into a Commons debate. . . .

At his Scottish mansion at Cairnsmore, Kirkcudbrightshire, the unruffled Duke talked to reporters over a meal which included creamy butter from his own cows.

Two days later, the London Evening Standard leading columnist attempted to attack him bitingly in the following paragraph :—

The Duke of Bedford appears in print again to-day. . . . Now when his Grace takes up his pen in the seclusion of his ducal mansion he makes no bones about his opinions on current affairs. How he forms those opinions I do not know, for apparently he doesn't believe anything he reads or hears.

He has "the lowest possible opinion of the intelligence of the average politician," and "an equally low opinion of those who control the Press and B.B.C." From these he only expects "lies and folly."

The workers ought not to accept such a mental approach to the Duke's discredit.

The Glasgow Evening News, in an editorial headed The Duke, published in its issue for November 5, said :—

The Duke of Bedford seems likely to achieve martyrdom of one kind or another. . . .

It may be the mild martyrdom of the disgusted disapproval of 99 per cent. of his fellow-citizens, or the harsher martyrdom imposed by a Home Secretary who states that he has his eye on the Duke

Denunciations of the Duke made the big headlines in the Capitalist press throughout Great Britain and Ireland on November 19.

The Belfast Telegraph, in its leader, described the Duke as that Peer, who appears from his public statements to be a Pacifist of extreme tendencies.

Taking its cue from Lord Simon, the editorial emphasised the failure of the Duke to take his seat, in the following concluding reference :—

Lord Ponsonby, who was raised to the Upper House as a Labour representative in 1930 but has now severed his connection with the Labour Party, objected strongly to Mr. Morrison's remarks about the Duke's tendencies in the House of Lords on Tuesday. The Home Secretary's attitude was, however, vigorously defended by Lord Crewe and by Lord Simon, the Lord Chancellor. The latter pointed out that in the Duke of Bedford's case the question of privilege does not arise, since he has not yet taken the steps requisite to obtain admission to the House of Peers.

Glasgow "Evening Times."

DUKE OF BEDFORD WITH GUY ALDRED

The above picture was taken in the Strickland Press Office on Monday, June 28, 1943, and published in the Glasgow "Evening Times" the same evening. Beneath the heading "DUKE OF BEDFORD'S VISIT TO COAL PITS," our contemporary reported the Duke's denunciation of the conditions under which miners of Lanarkshire worked and lived.

The Nottingham Journal stated :—

Now it is rumoured that the Pacifists want the Duke to take his seat in the Lords and table a motion in favour of a negotiated peace. It will be all to the good if he does, for it will cook the goose "for all time," as Professor Joad might say.

We wonder if history will record its verdict with the same quaint dogmatism.

The Western Mail, Cardiff, under the heading Whitewashing The Duke, said :—

Lord Ponsonby, being himself an impenitent and incorrigible Pacifist, was well qualified to whitewash the Duke of Bedford.

Even the Manchester Guardian, in its "Miscellany," edited by "Lucio" had to forget its great Libertarian traditions. In its isue for November 21, under the sub-heading Dukes and Ducalities, "Lucio" commented :—

Lord Ponsonby has been telling the House of Lords that in some ways it is easier to defend a dustman than a duke. This does not seem to accord precisely with a view expressed by Lord Houghton in 1878 when the Duke of Sutherland of the period came out strongly in support of the Turks against Russia. Somebody expressed surprise at this attitude. "Oh," said Houghton, "dukes must be allowed their ducalities." It is not perhaps too unfair to say that the present Duke of Bedford has his ducalities in what many regard as a distressing form.

History may reverse this description of the Duke's "ducalities" and assert that the distress was occasioned by his critics, the interested and hireling apologists for war, and the ex-conscientious objectors becoming peers for war-time services—away from the field of battle!

The Evening Standard, London, for November 29, outlined the Duke's plans; this time not too unfairly :—

The Duke of Bedford does not often come to London. He prefers to carry on his pacifist campaign from his home in Wigtownshire. . . .

The Duke of Bedford has not yet taken his seat in the Lords: he opposes in principle what he calls a chamber of privilege. But he has stated in a Scottish pacifist journal that it is his intention to go to the Lords should he feel that circumstances were favourable. The "favourable circumstances" he requires before becoming the spokesman of Pacifism in the Upper House consists of an assurance on the part of his readers that he will have their backing "as an avowed enemy of war and poverty." . . .

The duke declares that the "ultimate task" of his movement is the establishment of prosperity and social righteousness, the setting up of a system which removes all barriers to trade, and financial reforms. All this, of course, is dependent upon a negotiated peace.

The "seat campaign" came to a head on December 1, when The Daily Express, London, gave big headings to the following very small paragraph :—

PACIFIST DUKE TO SIT IN LORDS.

The Pacifist Duke of Bedford is to take his seat within a month's time in the House of Lords, which he has "boycotted" since he assumed his present title in August, 1940.

Two days later the Duke took his seat and affirmed. This event is described in Appendix IX to Part I of our work Socialism and Parliament. The Freethought press made no comment on the Duke's action, but the sensational press jibed at his conduct. One would have thought that the fact that he was the first Duke to affirm would have been worthy of note by Rationalists and Freethinkers. It was an important assertion of a great principle of freedom and integrity and a registration of progress. Consider Charles Bradlaugh's tremendous struggle against the oath. The Duke of Bedford sealed Bradlaugh's House of Commons triumph. But war-mongering pettifogging Freethought could not be bothered to note the fact. What degeneration!

The failure of the Freethought movement to applaud the Duke's simplicity and soundness in affirming and so asserting his conscientious objection to oath-taking—itself a very clear declaration of anti-Fascism—is emphasised by the Rationalist desire to ridicule him on another matter. The Literary Guide, organ of the Rational Press Association, in its "Random Jottings" in its December issue stated :—

The Duke of Bedford, who recently startled the country with an apology for Hitler, declares that "God in His mercy has given me, unworthy as I am, some small share of His own divine understanding." It is curious, however, that the Archbishop of Canterbury and other exalted Christians who likewise claim a small measure of divine understanding reach conclusions diametrically opposite to those of the Duke, being convinced that Hitler is the embodiment of evil, that we are engaged in a war for Christian civilization, and that we must, as Christians, fight to a finish. From this conflict among the inspired we may draw the conclusion that man still makes God in his own image.

We raise no objection to this comment. On the contrary we endorse it. The Duke left himself wide open to such criticism. But we suspect the reference to Hitler, which is not correct, and the entire setting of the comment, arose from prejudice rather than reason. Lord Snell knows that many of his associates speak in exactly the same terms of God on the war-side and remain his honoured colleagues. We read the Literary Guide and it is passing strange that only the Duke of Bedford has been singled out for attack. Why? In any case, if the Duke had to be criticised for this utterance, because only criticism could appease the conscience of Freethought, he ought to have been applauded for his stand against the oath. Not a comment was made. Why? Was his attitude too sound, too direct, and so not open to criticism or would the Freethought rank-and-file have wanted to applaud? And, of course, that never would have done! For whatever reason, and from whatever angle, the one thing to do in the sacred cause of war is to ridicule the pacifist non-conformist and heretic. That is a war essential. A sacrifice of Truth is another question.

CHURCH, WAR AND PEACE

Dear Guy Aldred,—With reference to your remarks, as reported in "The Motherwell Times" of 24th Dec., may I just add that it has become very noticeable in recent years that, with a view to self-preservation and continuance of power to decoy the simple and unwary, and to exploit superstition, the several rival "Firms" composing the so-called Church, have been conspiring and manoeuvring for the elimination of competition, by the formation of "Cartels" and "Combines" under such specious slogans as "Reunion of the Churches" and "A New Order AFTER the War." (Truth and War cannot both have priority: and "the Churches" have made their choice.)

As, however, THE Church, of which Christ, the Truth, is Lord, has never been dis-united, all this bother about re-union makes it ever clearer that the miscellany of Corporations participating therein, do not in any sense whatever constitute IT. They, severally and collectively, constitute naught but a wide-spread insidious ersatz.

The War, you spoke of as "spreading death and destruction among the common people." There is an important point in this connection, too often overlooked, namely, that the war-makers are not the war-wagers! The war-makers only arrange fixtures for the matches. They would be utterly stumped if "the common people" were to head Keir Hardie's words to the effect, "Wars will cease when the peoples in all lands refuse to obey their rulers commands to murder one another"; or those of the Baroness von Suttner, "Lay down your Arms." Death and destruction are waged upon the common people, by the common people.

Spokesmen of the various Ministries are continuously haranguing the public that the prosecution of the war is utterly dependent upon the efforts of "the common people." True! ye war-mongers' touts. But, thanks be, whole Peace-waging families like those of John Morley and Charles Earl, as well as thousands of individuals, both men and women, throughout the world, are steadfastly demonstrating how to stop the ghastly holocaust.

The real Church is a Peace-waging Army, composed of people who have entered upon inheritance of that Peace which the world can neither give nor take away. Its members are all on active service, resolutely determined to mete to all mankind just such treatment as they would that mankind mete to one another: to do to all others as they would that all others do to them. For only so, is membership of THE Church to be retained, and concomitant enduring Peace to be known.

PEACE BY NEGOTIATION

A Statement issued by The Northern Peace Board York.

From the 17th century to the 20th the peace testimony has flowed steadily through the life and history of Quakerism. There have always been some Friends who have not recognised it as an essential part of Quakerism, but this has never caused a schism in the Society for we are not a religious order pledged to maintain certain rigid rules but a society of seekers after truth, some seeing a larger measure than others but all united in a common devotion.

The strength of the Society of Friends lies in the recognition that there is no conflict between the claims of the individual and those of the community when these claims are rightly ordered. Our belief in "that of God" in every-man emphasises the supreme importance of human personality and shows us both a means of approach and a goal to be reached. But because individual personality cannot fulfil its divine purpose in isolation, but only in unity with others, emphasis is also laid on the importance of the community ultimately embracing every human being as a child of God in the Family of God. There have been periods in the history of Quakerism when the needs of the individual have been overstressed, but never sufficiently to lead Quakerism into an extreme form of evangelicalism; now, we are sometimes warned that our social activities harbour the danger of our degenerating into a charitable organisation whose whole concern is the welfare of the community.

A healthy religious society must always integrate the spiritual development of the individual and the growth of the world community. It cannot separate right relations between God and man from right relations between man and his neighbour.

THE PEACE TESTIMONY RENEWED

War is a total denial of all that we hold to be the right way of life. In war and in preparation for war, personality is denied and its growth is warped: by conscription all are forced into the same mould, all become implements in the hands of the State, trained and directed towards the same goal, to be used solely for the objects the State has in view. Among the civilian population, liberty of thought, of action, of expression is maintained only within narrow limits and may be completely eliminated if the exigencies of the State demand it.

Between communities, war breaks those bonds of friendship and mutual service which unite the human family under the Fatherhood of Good. It is the breeding ground of hatred, malice and fear, and releases forces which disintegrate mankind into factions knowing no other way of life than that of violence. In begetting hatred, it kills love and so re-crucifies Christ.

Thus in our peace testimony we declare that war is a sin under whatever circumstances and for whatever purpose it may be waged. By this we mean that our peace testimony is not held because it is a traditional creed, however reasonable a creed it may be; if it were that, our acceptance of it would be sincere in normal times, but the deep instincts and emotions aroused by war would usurp the rule of reason and the peace testimony would be temporarily suspended. It is held because it is a living experience shared by generation after generation of those who accept this way of love as the way of life. Thus, in 1938 Yearly Meeting declared: "Out of a living experience of the indwelling presence of God as revealed in Jesus Christ, our forefathers have maintained a testimony for Peace. We re-affirm their testimony and are determined to make it our own." And in 1942 Yearly Meeting again affirms "our sure and certain conviction, born anew out of the experience of these years, that all war is contrary to the heart and mind of God as known in Jesus Christ."

If then war is diametrically opposed to the way of life as shown by the ministry of Jesus, it must necessarily raise more problems than it can solve. Trying to run God's world on principles which deny God is doomed to failure as surely as, if not more surely than, trying to develop the natural world by breaking nature's laws lead to disaster.

But the problems which are the occasion of wars and evils arising out of wars change as the world changes, and so it is necessary always to be thinking out anew the application of our peace testimony to the immediate circumstances of the time. In the past it was often possible for Friends to separate themselves from some of the evils of their day. Thus Friends could apply their testimony against slavery by themselves giving up slave-owning and taking no part in the slave-trade. Other channels of less vicious economic activity were open to them. Similarly when wars were fought largely by professional armies and peace-time markets were hardly restricted by war, Friends could be clear of any association with the persecution of war.

Conditions change. Now we are in total war, war that affects every department of life, private and public. No one can dissociate himself entirely from the war. There is little else in our national life but war and activities dependent on and affected by war. It is therefore not surprising that there are wide differences of opinion within the Society regarding the application of the peace testimony to-day, particularly as there is now a wider recognition than ever before of our responsibilities as members of the national community. Total war is not a rootless phenomenon; it has grown out of the system in which and by which we live. In our standard of living we have benefited, directly or indirectly, by British imperialism, by the exploitation of weaker peoples, by the growth of our trade under British prestige, and having benefited we share the responsibility for the evil results this system has produced, a responsibility which has increased by our failure to apply in our individual and communal lives that spirit of brotherhood which would revolutionise the system and make war impossible.

Yet if we have kept our vision clear we have recognised the injustice of our system and have foreseen the dangerous possibilities inherent in it, and in our efforts to bring about changes we have laid stress on the means to be adopted, for the means create the end, the future grows out of the present.

And so in 1939 we stood out as part of a small minority from the general belief that the consummate evil of Nazism, with its doctrines of the natural supremacy of a race and of the glorification of the State, could be abolished by methods of war would intensify rather than mitigate the evils of Nazism, that instead of freedom being restored to Europe the spirit of domination would become more firmly established, that the moral deterioration which always accompanies war would widen the breeding ground of hatred and intolerance.

EFFECTS OF THE WAR

What has happened after more than three years of war? Moral degradation is perhaps seen in the growth of callousness to human suffering. We read camly of 300,000 Germans being "liquidated" after being surrounded on the Russian front and we are indifferent to the despair and sorrow that this means in 300,000 German homes, mothers bereft of their sons, children of their fathers. Do we think of a score of virile young men dropping from the clouds as burnt and mangled human flesh when we read that "three of our planes are missing"? Does the expression "mopping up pockets of resistance" call up a picture of half-starved, disease-ridden men, knowing not why they are where they are, hoping against hope that they may be spared the final agony of a painful death? Think what an ocean of human suffering is hidden in the brief announcement that "such and such a "submarine has failed to return to its base. The next of kin have been informed." Killing is spoken of in terms of sport—a "bag" of four planes, "the score was 8-3." Humanity is impersonalised, and we speak of calling up the "1942 class," sending up "reserves," training "troops," knocking out "tanks" or losing "machines."

A vivid light is thrown on this moral degredation by the account of the destruction of a Japanese convoy in the Bismarck Sea. There was at one time a tradition of chivalry at sea, even in war time, which demanded that efforts should be made to save survivors from a destroyed vessel. In this engagement, we were told, the convoy was finally "mopped up" by merciless bombing — note the adjective — of barges, rafts and lifeboats. At one time 500 men were seen struggling in a sea covered with oil and infested by sharks; later there were only 200. No excuses were given for failing to rescue any of these doomed men. Instead there was the concluding comment "We have got another ally." No protest has been raised from any section of the public against the suggestion that we have now descended to the moral standard of sharks. Rather was there general satisfaction that our bombers and their new ally, the sharks, had ensured that there was not a single survivor of the 14,000 men involved.

The moral deterioration resulting from three and a half years of war has been accompanied by the growth of the spirit of intolerance and domination which we call fascism. The persecution of the Jews in Central Europe had become so intense before the war that the appeal for help was responded to, not only by humanitarian organisations, but even by Governments. War has magnified the persecution far beyond what was thought to be possible in 1939, whatever discount may be placed on atrocity stories. The answer of our Government to this untold suffering is to vow retribution on the perpetrators. Promises have been made, under certain conditions, to help those who are able to escape. We welcome these promises and hope the conditions may be interpreted with the utmost generosity, but apparently admission to this country is excluded on the plea that it might lead to the growth of anti-semitism here. That plea is a confession that the war which, we are told, is to establish freedom in Europe is breeding anti-semitism here; it is a spiritual epedemic knowing no frontiers but spreading wherever the conditions are favourable, and the most favourable conditions are those of war.

The spread of anti-semitism is a symptom. Fascism in its other manifestations has invaded all the belligerent countries. We see it in Britain in the progressive regimentation of the people, in the acceptance of the State as the supreme authority and in the denial of freedom of conscience. The recognition of conscientious objection to military service in 1939 was in the tradition of democracy, but later Acts to discipline the whole population to further the war effort override conscientious objection in this sphere. The Trade Unions and Employers' Federations are discussing agreements which, if implemented, will effectively convert Britain into a Corporate State. Can there be any confidence that the grip of fascism will be relaxed after the war, or that in "liberated" countries Governments of a fascist character will not be established and supported?

"COMMUNIST" NOTEBOOK.

"Mission to Moscow" was exposed in these columns for October and November. The film whitewashes the infamous Moscow trials. During the actual trial proceedings, when Davies was in Moscow, he described the charges as preposterous and the procedure as a travesty of justice.

Despite the fact that ex-Ambassador Davies recites a prologue to the film, he is not deceived by the slanders he applauds. The main charges in the trials is that the persons accused were plotting with Trotsky and the capitalist powers to re-introduce capitalism into the Soviet Union. In the "New York Times" for August 1, 1943, Davies attacks Trotsky for endeavouring to maintain Communism in Russia and to spread it throughout the Capitalist world. Here is an excerpt from Davies' article:—

There can be no doubt that its (the Comintern's) object, in part was to build up a militarist agency to attack their enemies from within, by organising internal strife through class war. It also confirmed the Trotsky programme of world revolution, and Soviet aid to class war outside of Russia, as necessary to successfully maintain a communist state in a single country (the Soviet Union).

By this action (dissolving the Comintern) Stalin put the last finishing touch, so far as the Soviet Union was concerned, to Trotsky's programme of international world revolution through violence and class war . . .

It was the last chapter in Trotsky's battle to commit Russia to a policy of permanent revolution, and to militant and active promotion of subversive class warfare against neighbouring governments in a war against capitalism.

This statement gives the lie to the "Mission to Moscow" film. How could Trotsky have fought to restore capitalism in Russia and have struggled to "wage a war against capitalism" at the same time? Davies' contradictions demonstrate the cynical hypocrisy of Stalinism. These "Communist" hirelings are using capitalist propaganda for their own purposes of power politics and careerist advancement.

We are somewhat surprised at the "Daily Herald" adding to the Stalin anecdotage. In the end this kind of picturesque falsehood will react badly on every section of the Socialist movement. What sense is there in publishing the following item culled from the "Daily Herald" for July 15, 1943:—

STALIN AIDS A ROMANCE

In the midst of war, Stalin has personally intervened on Wendell Willkie's request, to help forward the romance of a Russian girl and an American newspaper correspondent.

Mr. Wilkie confirmed the story yesterday, but kept the names of the principals secret, says Associated Press.

When the correspondent and the girl were seen together in Moscow some Russian officials thought the correspondent might be trying to get information from her, and she was removed from Moscow.

The newspaper man returned to the United States and appealed to Mr. Willkie, who cabled to Stalin: "Anything you can do to facilitate this union I will personally appreciate, for I have absolute confidence and am willing to vouch for X" (the newspaper man).

Stalin replied five days later: "I am glad to tell you your request regarding X will be fulfilled. The decision was made as a special exception on your recommendation and vouching."

The correspondent is returning to Russia to marry the girl.

"Stalin Aids a Romance"! How neatly described, but what does the story mean? That the girl was arrested wrongly. That the newspaper correspondent was lucky to know Wendell Willkie. That terrorism prevails throughout the Soviet Union as in Nazi Germany. Face facts, and consider the hideous picture of life in the Soviet Union this strange story reveals. Romance! What a synonym for oppression!

The true romance story is supposed to reconcile us to the execution in a prison at Kuibishev, one day in December, 1942, of two brave men, Jewish Anti-Fascists and Polish citizens, life-long loyal Socialist propagandists, enemies of Czarism and terrorism, Henryk Erlich and Victor Alter. The protest of the Secretary of the Labour Party, Mr. J. S. Middleton, to Maisky, then Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. in Great Britain ,was published in these columns recently. The "Communist" war criminals responsible for this outrage should be placed on trial before a Polish Jewish Socialist Tribunal or else at the bar of the International Socialist Movement. These criminal executions are rejoiced in by lying stooges of the Communist Party. They belong to the same category as Mussolini's murder of Matteoti and the Socialist and Jewish murders of Hitler and his Nazi associates. Murder is not forgiveable because the murderers pose as "Communists."

The "Daily Worker" for October 30, published another canting ranting contribution by Douglas Hyde, dealing with the release of John Beckett, beneath the heading: "John Beckett, Notorious Ex-Fascist, Released."

The account opens:—

John Beckett, one of the most notorious of the ex-Fascist leaders, has been released from Brixton Jail. This was announced by the Home Office last night. He had been detained under Regulation 18B since May 1940, when he was arrested along with eight other persons, including Sir Oswald Mosley.

Details of Beckett's career follow. He is accused of being "viciously Anti-Semitic and pro-Nazi" and termed "this would-be Hitler."

The report concludes, under the heading—"No Explanation":

At the time of his arrest, the Minister of Home Security, then Sir John Anderson, stated that the deentions were "because of the danger that the organisations of which the persons concerned were leading members, might be used in the execution of acts prejudicial to the security of the State."

Inquiries at the Home Office last night failed to bring any explanation for Beckett's release.

As recently as last May Beckett applied for a writ of Habeas Corpus, saying in affidavit that his views had completely changed since Germany's invasion of Western Europe. But his application, significantly enough, was dismissed by the High Court of Justice.

Readers of this journal know that Professor Haldane, at a "Daily Worker" meeting in Glasgow, before the Soviet Union was invaded by Hitler, denounced the regulation 18B, and insisted that "even Mosley" ought not to be interned without trial. The "Daily Worker" attacks on Anderson can be recalled. Since when have "Communists" accepted as gospel a decision of the Capitalist High Court of Justice? It is not necessary to agree with Beckett to realise that Communists"—the close friends of the Fascist M.P., Lt.-Col. Sir Thomas Moore, for Ayr—are gangster enemies of human struggle, and apologists for the murder after false arrest of our brave Jewish Socialist comrades, Ehrlich and Alter.

When the Duke of Bedford spoke with us at the Plaza Cinema, Burnbank, on Sunday, 31st October, last, the "Communist Party" issued a leaflet denouncing him as a Fascist. At Motherwell previously they had issued a similar leaflet, but asked for the meeting to be smashed. Their tactics did not take a trick. This time they made no threats. But they endeavoured to take full advantage of the very full freedom of discussion allowed by the I.L.P. to slander the speakers. We believe in free discussion, but certainly the platform ought to be allowed full time to reply.

Leaving the meeting one C.P. stooge said: "Fancy selling John Maclean's 'life' and speaking with the Duke of Bedford! An aristocrat!"

We do not object to such comment when it is honest. At that very moment the C.P. was selling tickets for a meeting to be addressed by Lady Glen-Coats. Here is an advertisement culled from the "Evening Times," Glasgow, for Wednesday, November 3, 1943:—

Is there some proletarian difference between the wife of a Baronet and a Duke? What humbug! And notice the Chairman's "O.B.E.," Quite Marxian! Believe in the class war if you will. Narrow its interpretation to war on the aristocrats, on all titles. That is understandable. But be consistent. The baronetage is the lowest order of the peerage. If you accept "Ladies," as comrades, there is no reason why you should not accept "Dukes." The question then becomes one of personal record. And now, "comrades," what is the record, the Socialist record, of Lady Glen-Coats? Answer humbugs! Answer, apologists for the murder of our Anti-Fascist Jewish Comrades, Ehrlich and Alter! And incidentally explain the past flirtations with the Tory Duchess of Atholl.

In his most interesting Testament to "Democracy," the late Lord Wedgwood records this incident:—

Once, when I was at Gyor, in Bolshevik Hungary, I got talking to a man—or he got talking to me. My companions sheered off, nervous of my company, for the man was a propaganda agent, a job which has other less attractive titles. He asked me how I liked the country. I said: "Fine, but it is all so peaceful. You might drop the dictatorship business." He said: "Impossible! We could not maintain order without it." It seemed to me the order of dumb animals, so I said: "I prefer rebels to cabbages." Being a man of labels and erudition, he replied: "I see you are a follower of Bakounin. I believe in Karl Marx." I rather hope Stalin believes in himself. These post-mortem loyalties are so cramping.

We accept this dictum of Wedgwood. We believe in ourself and we decline to permit the hired apologists of dictatorship to select either our private companions or our platform associates for us. We object equally to all despotisms.

The "Daily Mirror," for November 1, 1943, among other papers gave an account of the dinner at the Kremlin:—

Marshal Stalin drank toasts to the Allied and Merchant Navies, and to the Army of General Montgomery at the dinner he gave to Mr. Eden and Mr. Cordell Hull at the Kremlin on Saturday night.

The dinner, which began at 8.30 p.m., ended at 2.30 yesterday morning.

There were more than twenty toasts—to President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, to the success of the Conference, and to Victory . . .

There were more than sixty guests.

Stalin sat in the centre as host. Mr. Hull was on his right and the British Ambassador, Sir Archibald Clark Kerr, was on his left.

M. Molotov sat across the table from Stalin with Mr. Eden on his right.

Of course, all the guests represented the proletariat, the miners of Burnbank, etc. They had more in common with John Maclean than our murdered comrades, Ehrlich and Alter! What contemptible hypocrisy. Such is "Communism," 1943 brand!

On Monday, February 21, the editor addressed the Cowlairs Literary Society connected with Cowlairs Church of Scotland, Springburn. The minister, the Rev. C. Vincent Williams, M.A., presided. The speaker's subject was: "What Peace Means." Vigorous questioning followed the address. The society hopes to increase its influence in Glasgow and so hasten the establishment of a sane and peaceful society. Mr. Williams is a well-known Pacifist and Labourist and expresses his opinions clearly and vigorously.

"LABOUR" LORDS

If the reader will turn to Appendix IX of Socialism and Parliament, Part I (The Word Library, 2nd Series, No. 4) they will read the official report and contemporary press accounts of the manner in which the Duke of Bedford took his seat in the House of Lords on December 3, 1941. The Duke affirmed instead of taking the oath and is the first Duke to affirm.

In the March, 1942, issue of The Word we criticised three new "Socialist" peers, created in December, 1941, who took their seats in the House of Lords with the usual ceremony and oaths, and made no protest against the oath-taking: which is an offence against Christian teaching and all Socialist tradition. The tendency of Socialism is to ally itself with Freethought, and the majority of Socialist pioneers, and the rank and file members of the Socialist movement, are Freethinkers. Most Socialists are Atheists. Until they reach the House of Lords few Socialists deny the fact of their Atheist sympathies.

Last month we commented on the new Socialist peers, Ammon and Westwood.

The following account of their seat-taking is culled from the Official Report, Vol. 130, No. 17 (Hansard):—

Wednesday, 2nd February, 1944.

The House met, The LORD CHANCELLOR on the Woolsack.

LORD WESTWOOD.

William Westwood, Esq., O.B.E., having been created Baron Westwood of Gosforth in the County of Northumberland—was (in the usual manner) introduced.

LORD AMMON.

Charles George Ammon, Esq., having been created Baron Ammon of Camberwell in the County of Surrey—was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Reporting these proceedings, the Daily Sketch said:—

Baron Ammon of Camberwell and Baron Westwood, of Gosforth, took their seats in House of Lords with the customary ceremony.

Scarlet and ermine robes concealed the identity of two men active in the Socialist world.

If one speaks on the same platform as these poor careerist creatures of capitalist political orthodoxy, and supports a Churchill candidate, one remains in the Labour Party. If one supports the Duke of Bedford in his defence of conscience and civil liberties, and his opposition to war, one is expelled from the "Socialist" movement! What a movement! What respect for integrity and sincerity.

We need Socialism. We need a great "Victory for Socialism" campaign. We need to launch again an intensive propaganda activity in the crusading spirit of the pioneers of the movement. In that campaign not men and women seeking place and conventional honour but persons of worth and integrity must have a place. Such folk will not fear to identify themselves with the Duke of Bedford, who is the outstanding spokesman of the Pacifist movement in Britain to-day, and its most fearless and consistent pamphleteer.

What a contrast! The Duke of Bedford is denounced by the millionaire and militarist press for opposing war and the destruction of mankind. He is ostracised for his stand against injustice and the persecution of conscience. Like the immortal Thomas Jefferson, he upholds freedom of the press and freedom of religion and the right of Habeas Corpus. He stands boldly before the world as a heretic. Insists on affirming and declines to take oaths, thereby sealing the great stand made by Charles Bradlaugh in the Commons.

Against him, on the side of the compact reactionary Tory majority are these Labour peers, manufactured to perpetuate war and the capitalist system; tamely taking their seats with alll the trappings of ceremony and all the usual oaths, outraging Truth and the Christian concept of God as the Father of ALL MANKIND, betraying the workers to whom they once uttered semi-class-war words of hatred; the workers whose past support explains their elevation.

With whom should the workers associate? These pensioned off, stupid, reactionary life Labour Peers, elevated because they have no male issue to succeed them, or the Duke of Bedford intent on world well-being, peace, and prosperity.

ON SOME PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

By W. B. CURRY.

[Reprinted from "The Monthly Record" of The South Place Ethical Society, February, 1944. All comrades Should secure this excellent magazine.—Ed.]

I wonder how many readers of The Monthly Record noticed in the newspayers two or three months ago an acocunt of some proceedings in the House of Commons that were at once comic and in their implications essentially tragic. I feel that they deserve further comment.

Captain Cunningham-Reid raised the question of the administration of a certain girls' hostel, and as part of his evidence as to the alleged mismanagement, he adduced the startling and horrifying facts, first, that when the matron's room had been cleaned, an empty spirits bottle had been found, and second, that she was known to have entertained a man in her room. As I read the tale of mounting infamy, I began to wonder whether he would not end by announcing that the matron had been seen wearing a pair of slacks, and actually smoking a cigarette. Captain Cunningham-Reid is not, it appears, a popular member of the House, and he was severely attacked, not on the grounds that his charges were trivial but on the ground that he could not substantiate them. Earl Winterton, after a slashing aattack on the gallant Captain, ended by saying that in impugning the matron's chastity he had made the "foulest accusation" that could possibly be made against a woman.

Why is all this nonsense taken seriously? Let u look at it more closely, and as becomes the page of The Monthly Record, more rationally than honorable and noble and gallant members seem capable of doing. An empty spirits bottle was found in the lady's room. I infer from this that she was accused of not being a teetotaller, and there exists within its precincts ample opportunities for the slaking of thirst. Most members of the House of Commons who are not teetotallers undoubtedly keep alcoholic refreshments in their own homes, and dispense them to friends. Why then should it be supposed that in mentioning the empty bottle Captain Cunningham-Reid was making a grave accusation against the lady? Couldn't empty bottles be found in most of our homes? Her room is presumably her home. Is it alleged that matrons ought not to drink alcohol, or that if they do, they must only drink in public? What is in fact alleged that is morally opprobrious? I confess that I am entirely at a loss to understand.

Secondly, the matron was alleged to have entertained a man in her room. Think of that! No evidence, so far as I know, was adduced as to what they did there. Apparently his mere presence was sufficiently shocking: Here again what is one supposed to infer? Is a grown-up woman not supposed to have men friends, or if she has them, is she only to see them in public, or if in private, suitably chaperoned? In which decade of which century are we now living?

And then let us suppose the worst. Let us suppose, as was apparently meant to be inferred, that her relations with the man were technically improper. Are grown-up people still expected to believe that what makes a sexual relationship good or bad is its technical propriety? And that this aspect takes precedence over all others? Is there any grown-up person yho has not known of technical improper relationships which had more elements of real value than many properly solemnized marriages?

But what most caused me to rub my eyes in all this was Earl Winterton's outburst about the "foulest accusation." Here is a world in which people are being killed, maimed, and tortured by the million; in which matrons and others maim the minds and bodies of children by cruelty, neglect, or the over-exercise of a moralistic sense of power; in which for the sake of dividends, human beings have been impoverished, degraded and tortured; in which the hopes and happiness of countless ordinary men and women have been treated as mere pawns in vast, cruel contests of power and ambition. And in the midst of all this we are solemnly told that to accuse a woman of unchastity is the worst thing you can say about her. And people still talk as if to be found guilty of one such act of unchastity was to be proved unfit for the exercise of any educational function. Isn't this plain nonsense, and shouldn't we all have the courage and sense to say so openly?

Finally, I should like to add a word about certain educational aspects of all this. The matron was in charge of girls, and they were girls who had got into difficulties. She would need to be a woman of broad human sympathies, with wisdom and kindness and tolerance and charity. She should be a woman capable of giving them affection without demanding any in return. She would need, in short, to be a complete and happy human being, as free as possible from repressions and frustrations in her own life. All this is surely commonplace to any informed educationist or psychologist. Are such people willing to accept the absurd conditions that the honourable members seem to think proper? What happens to grown-up people who are expected to live surrounded by these taboos? They become narrow-minded, warped, irritable, and envious of the happiness of others. They become, in fact, entirely unsuitable for the proper care of the young. Would it not, I suggest, have been more appropriate if members of the House of Commons, instead of being indignant with Captain Cunningham-Reid for making these grave charges unsupported by proper evidence, had howled him down with derisive laughter for thinking them worth making at all?

THE EDUCATIONAL BILL

By J. W. H. BROWN

(Education Officer of the Rationalist Press Association).

[This statement has been issued by the R.P.A. as a leaflet and also published in "The Literary Guide." We are in favour of complete secular education and the total abolition of denominational schools.—Ed.]

In common with other progressive bodies we give a hearty welcome to the general educational proposals of the Bill which Mr. R. A. Butler, President of the Board of Education, has introduced into Parliament. To mention only two of its main features: we particularly commend the raising of the school leaving age, and the unifying of the elementary and secondary systems of education into one national system. But our satisfaction with the educational and administrative reforms must not blind us to the manifest defects of the proposals relating to religious instruction. These, in our opinion, will rivet more firmly than ever on the schools the fetters of clerical control. Here Mr. Butler has surrendered to the demands of a powerful minority whose vested interests he fortifies.

We find ourselves opposed to him most strongly on his proposals with regard to:

1. The compulsory provision that in every school the day shall begin "with a collective act of worship."
2. Dual Control.
3. Religious tests for teachers.

So far as religion in school is concerned, the most important Clause is 24. This proposes to make it compulsory for every State-aided school to begin each day "with a collective act of worship on the part of all pupils." The intention is obvious, but is foredoomed to failure in the long run. In the days of Queen Elizabeth there was an attempt by legislation to make everyone conform to the established Church, and penalties were imposed for non-attendance. It is difficult to find any difference in principle between the abortive Elizabethan Act of Uniformity and Mr. Butler's proposal. True, in the latter there is provision for the withdrawal of pupils from both religious worship and religious instruction, but in practice this concession, as is probably intended, is likely to be inoperative.

Further, while there are no stated penalties for withdrawal, it would be, to most children, and particularly to the sensitive ones, a very real and cruel penalty to be made to appear different from the general body of their companions. Most parents would shrink from exposing their children to it. In practice, therefore, the children are apparently to be indoctrinated by compulsion. What, then, becomes of the "freedom" of religion promised in the Atlantic Charter?

Few, if any, dispute that Dual Control has been the greatest obstacle to educational advance. It was widely hoped that the new Bill would make a clean sweep of this stumbling-block. The Education Authorities, the principal organizations of teachers, the Workers' Educational Association, the Council for Educational Advance are unanimous in condemning Dual Control; yet the Minister, in defence to Catholic and Church of England minorities, actually extends and entrenches this administrative anachronism. It is very disappointing.

Clause 14 sets up three categories of "auxiliary" (denominational) schools and lays down the conditions under which they are eligible to receive increased grants from public funds. This will still further complicate the administrative machinery, but it does something more fundamentally wrong: it gives larger sums of public money without a corresponding increase in public control. In effect it is using public funds to endow denominationalism.

The new Bill classifies "auxiliary" (i.e., denominational) schools as "aided," "special agreement," and "controlled."

In aided schools the managers will appoint the teachers. Salaries and other maintenance charges will be paid by the local education authority. The managers will receive from the Board of Education a grant of 50 per cent. of the cost of alterations to the school buildings; they will be responsible for external repairs only, and half the cost of these will be met by grants from the Exchequer.

Twothirds of the managers will be appointed by the denomination—"foundation managers"—and the other third by the local education authority. Religious instruction will be given in accordance with the trust deed, or previous practice. It would appear that, though paid from public sources, the teachers in all these schools will be subjected to religious tests.

The special agreement schools are those which are permitted to revive proposals made under the Education Act of 1936. Under this Act teachers are appointed by the local education authority. An agreed number of teachers in each school is "reserved" for the purpose of giving denominational instruction. In the appointment of these teachers the local authority must consult the managers. Obviously, religious tests will be imposed on these teachers.

In controlled schools (i.e., those anxiliary schools where the managers are unable or unwilling to provide half the cost of necessary alterations) the whole cost of upkeep falls on the local education authority, who will appoint and dismiss teachers. The number of "reserved" teachers must not exceed one-fifth of the total staff. In the appointment of reserved teachers the authority must "satisfy the foundation managers" of their fitness and competence to give denominational instruction in accordance with the trust deeds. Though the head teacher in these schools is not "reserved," the local authority must "consult" the managers about the appointment. Here we have religious tests for teachers in schools wholly supported from publilc funds. In these schools two-thirds of the managers are to be appointed by the local education authority; the other third are to be foundation managers (i.e., appointed by the denomination).

Clause 25 of the Bill makes provision, under certain conditions, for denominational religious instruction to be given in county secondary schools. These have never been voluntary schools, and therefore have never previously had such instruction. It is difficult to reconcile this uncalledfor extension of the Dual System with the statement of the Board of Education in the White Paper (par. 13) that the Dual System

"is inappropriate to present conditions and inconsistent with educational reconstruction and development."

It is equally difficult to understand why Mr. Butler has unconditionally surrendered to the denominationalists. A considerable and eminent section of the Church of England—for instance, the Modern Churchman's Union—would gladly see the Dual System go. Writing in The Times of December 23, Bishop Hensley Henson (Durham, 1920-39):

"It is certain that there is no general demand for denominational teaching among the parents of the children who attend the State schools. Personally, I much regret that Mr. Butler did not 'grasp the nettle' by making an end of the Dual System."

Even at this eleventh hour it is not too late. The Bill can be amended. But nothing will be done unless the opponents of Dual Control exert themselves. Members of Parliament react in proportion to the influence brought to bear on them by their own constituents. There has been much pressure exerted on them by supporters of the Churches. Rationalists have an opportunity to make their influence felt. If, in their thousands, they write to their representatives in Parliament the objectionable clauses of the Bill may be appropriately amended.

The opposition of the teaching profession to the subjection of its members to religious tests has repeatedly been expressed. Something might have been said for such tests in the days when the denominations found the greater part of the cost of upkeep of their schools; but since teachers have been paid entirely from public funds (i.e., since 1902) these tests are indefensible. Yet in more than half of the country's schools nearly all the teachers are directly or indirectly subjected to them.

The Bill does little to remove this infringement of the civil liberty of teachers. Clause 23 confers on the managers of "aided" schools the right to appoint teachers. This means that if, in all voluntary schools, the managers can find half the cost of new buildings or necessary alterations, all the teachers in the 12,900 departments of denominational schools will be appointed by the managers and therefore subject to religious tests. That is, public servants paid from public funds could not, whatever their academic and professional qualifications, obtain appointment in these schools unless they conform to the doctrines of the denomination concerned. This is a return to the long-discarded principles of the notorious Test Act of 1673. The effect on the promotion prospects of teachers is obvious. Unless they are practising members of the Church of England or of the Roman Catholic Church, teachers are ineligible for the headships of more than half the schools in the country. For be it noted that, even in "controlled" schools, Clause 26 provides that "before appointing any person to be the head teacher of such a school the local education authority shall inform the managers or governors of the school as to the person whom they propose to appoint and shall consider any representations made by the managers or governors with respect to the proposed appointment."

That is likely to make inoperative, with regard to religious tests, the provision in the same clause that "the head teacher of a controlled school shall not be a reserved teacher." Here again a great opportunity has been lost by Mr. Butler.

All who value civil liberty must recognize their duty to oppose its infringement wherever and whenever it is threatened. They should take every available means of influencing their representatives in Parliament to support such amendment of the clauses of the Bill dealing with religious education as will (1) relieve the schools of the imposition of the proposed compulsory act of collective worship, (2) secure the abolition of Dual Control, (3) free teachers from religious tests.

PRAYER FOR WARRING NATIONS.

O Fierce God of Empire and Nation and State,
Proudly and gladly we sacrifice make.
Our young men are tortured and blinded and killed;
Their bodies lie rotting, for Thy Holy Sake.

The blood of our children is shed in their homes,
Our young girls are ravished and treated with shame,
The Years of our aged are bitter with grief,
And all to the glory of Thy Holy Name.

In return, thou shalt grant us the favours we ask,
Prestige, honour, victory, rule of the seas,
Profits and trade routes—above all, the power
To treat all the rest of the world as we please.

Our danghters' respect, the lives of our sons,
Compared to such riches we deem little worth.
Great God, we will sacrifice tenfold again
If thou wilt but help us to own the whole earth!

PACIFISM IN LIVERPOOL

Unity Hall, Liverpool, was crowded on Saturday, January 29th, when a very representative gathering of welfare workers came together to hear the story of the actual experiences of members of the Pacifist Service Units. Mrs. Irene Barclay (Housing Manager), London, dealt with the issues raised in the new book "Our Towns," and Mr. Michael Lee, M.A., spoke of the activities of the Unit working on Merseyside.

Mr. Rhys Davies, M.P. (Chairman), congratulated those conscientious objectors who were not satisfied with adopting a mere negative attitude to war and killing but who proved to the community by actual devotion to social problems that they were builders, and willing to sacrifice as much in the effort to save human life as the soldier did on the battlefield in destroying his foe. He had lived long enough to see the emergence of all our Social Insurance Schemes; and with some experience in administering cash benefits he had no hesitation in saying that there were still persons who fell between every stool provided by those schemes. He gave, as an example the awful consequences to the family and especially the children when the parents quarrelled and parted. The law, as yet, had not been able to deal effectively with this type of case. That fell to be dealt with by the social expert.

Mrs. Barclay said that better housing would go a long way to solve family difficulties; slums bred a slum mind and she blamed the owners of such dwellings for many of the calamities that befell the people living in them. The reactionary argument against better housing by telling the story of coal in the bath. It was time those who made that statement were asked to prove the assertion. In all her wide experience she had never yet seen that done.

Mr. Lee said that the Unit lived together in a hostel and fended for themselves. It was the custom for those in distress to go in search for help from the various societies catering for them. Members of the Unit, however, resersed the order; they went into the highways and byways to offer assistance to "problem" families and were always welcomed. Asked whether he had found opposition because they were C.O.s he replied "None; these poor people never bother about labels." One person, when told that the caller was a Pacifist retorted "I don't care; there is some good even in those Fascist chaps." She was obviously not concerned about the many "isms" that are current in politics.

PARLIAMENTARY PEACE AIMS GROUP

The Liverpool City authorities refused, when the first application was made, to lease the Hall and allow the meeting referred to in what follows; according to Press reports the City fathers feared a breah of the peace.

Further efforts were made and the Picton Hall, in the centre of the capital city on the Merseyside, witnessed an excellent gathering on Sunday afternoon, January 30th, 1944, when Mrs. Rosalind Rusbridge, B.A., L.R.A.M., occupied the chair, and Messrs. Rhys Davies, M.P., and R. R. Stokes, M.P., Chairman and Secretary respectively of the Parliamentary Peace Aims Group, were the speakers.

Incidentally, the Picton Hall was refused early on in the present war when Sir Hugh Roberton, Mr. Stuart Morris and Mr. Rhys Davies, M.P., were to speak against Bombing. That meeting, however, held on the outskirts of the City, was quite a successful gathering and did not create any disturbance.

The meeting on January 30th, did not, as apprehended by the authorities give the slightest indication of rowdyism. Indeed, unless we are mistaken, we are more likely to see a breach of the peace in this country, not because speakers want to bring the war to a close but because those in authority are determined to drag it on unto what they call "Unconditional Surrender."

Comrade Rhys Davies, who spoke first, mentioned his travels in Europe. He had verified by experience what he had always believed, that the working class everywhere was the same. The workers do not make wars, the Governments of the countries make wars. He stood for the working man everywhere. He knew him to be basically decent in other countries in other countries as in this.

The present official policy of unconditional surrender could have no other outcome than to estrange those in the enemy countries, who, given the hope of a better world, would help to destroy fascism.

Mr. Stokes followed. He drew attention to the necessarily belligerent character of capitalist society. That is not its only evil, however. Why should men make a living out of "owning" the land which God gave to all men? In advocating change, he was not blind to the antipathy towards change felt by most people. They wanted change, but when the change pinched them somewhere, they wanted some change other than that one. "Change without change" is their motto.

When the speakers at the Picton Hall concluded their remarks and questions answered a man in the audience, quite spontaneously, asked if he could move a Resolution in favour of a Negotiated Peace. The platform interrupted and suggested that they must keep faith with the public; the meeting had been called to deal with Peace Aims and an appropriate resolution on that issue which ran as follows was carried with two dissentients:—

"That this meeting regrets that the maximum use is not made by His Majesty's Government and its allies of political and economic pronouncements to the peoples of the world in order to bring the present conflict, with its incalculable misery, destruction and waste, to an end at the earliest possible moment."

The resolution was carried without opposition.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH

We have received the following interesting letter from Charles Bradlaugh's grandson, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh Bonner:—

92 Fleet Street.
London, E.C.4.
Jan. 19, 1944.

Dear Sir,—I read with great interest Mr. Micklewright's article on my grandfather in your January issue. There was, however, one statement in it which indicated that the author was not well acquainted with one facet of Bradlaugh's expressed opinion, viz., "he was opposed to unionism and co-operation." My grandfather was not an individualist in the narrow sense of the label, otherwise his views on the land problem, labour problems, etc., would have been very different. He was opposed to Communism (the Socialism of to-day has moved multiform away from that position), to which his answer was "union and co-operation," as expressed in addresses to the Northampton electors and elsewhere.

I thank you and Mr. Micklewright for the sympathetic and generally excellent article.

Yours truly,
CHARLES BRADLAUGH BONNER.

PAYING FOR THE WAR

125 Church Lane,
Leeds, 6.
29th January, 1944.

To the Editor.

Dear Sir,—May I through your columns first thank His Grace the Duke of Bedford for his favourable review of my pamphlet "Paying for the War," and then reply to the technical criticism of my explanation of bank loans on page 11. The second paragraph on page 11 states:—

"The banks create the credit just as effectively as if they printed new notes or minted new coins. This is not generally realised, because the banks encouraged the belief that bank loans are like loans by individuals. The fallacy of this belief can be easily exposed. When an individual lends money he parts with the money and his pocket book or bank balance is reduced by that amount. When a bank lends credit no account is reduced but a new account is opened. The bank actually does not part with anything, but gives the borrower permission to write cheques up to the limit of the loan."

This I contend is technically more correct then His Grace's statement:—

"They (the banks) create new money for lending," and does not call for his comment that "banks do not lend their deposits at all."

The above paragraph is in itself not sufficient explanation of bank procedure for the ordinary reader, who might be granted a bank loan of £100, and take some of it away with him in used notes; therefore further down page 11 I show how deposits, reserves and loans increase step by step. I believe that this explanation is technically sound and of vital importance as propaganda. The banks do not lend their deposits, but they do lend the money deposited. That is the point I emphasised on page 11, and I am afraid that that is the point His Grace missed.

Yours faithfully,
WILFRED TOWNEND.

THE LABOUR PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP

The Labour Pacifist Fellowship seeks to associate those members of the Labour Party and its affiliated organisations whose convictions preclude their endorsement of War and who endeavour in consistency with their Socialist Faith to encourage elements of social and international sanity essential to constructive Peace; to safeguard and improve the well-being of the working class; and to seek the achievement of a Socialist Commonwealth.

We believe that social structures incorporating traditions or assumptions of exploitation, aggression and tyranny as predominant characteristics of humanity are false to true human fulfilment and that Man can and must transform his society, so that democracy, social justice and fraternal co-operation prevail.

We hold that modern war endangers even those high principles for which this war is allegedly waged, involves incalculable destruction, waste and misery, perverts the capacity for creative effort and stimulates perilous, impulsive, cynical or reactionary tendencies.

We fully recognise that any alternative to war demands drastic exemplary social and economic change, persistent promotion of international equity and co-operation, profound confidence in the ultimate triumph of resolute goodwill and the necessity of disciplined non-violent resistance to recognised iniquity. We appreciate that as yet only a small minority can accept this conviction, but we desire whenever possible to work with other Labour Party comrades in loyal service to common purposes that will secure peace, justice and dignity for mankind.

WAR AIMS

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

[The speech to which this article refers was made in the House of Lords on Wednesday, March 8, as the Government reply to the Duke of Bedford's War Aims motion. Lord Bruntisfield will be better known as Sir Victor Warrender, Tory M.P. Grandson of the 8th Earl of Shaftesbury, and nephew of the 9th Earl, he represents the influence of the aristocracy in politics. Although born in 1899, he remains a typical hide-bound Tory and has a Primrose League outlook. Unlike many of his colleagues, he has never shown any enthusiasm for Fascism or Nazism, but has been a consistent Tory anti-Socialist of the old Imperialist school. He has no message for the working class and is opposed to their struggle towards social emancipation. But not more so than the careerist Labour Leaders and ex-Trade Union champions who now sit in the Upper House as his war-time colleagues. On the other hand, unlike many members of the Tory Party, he has never flirted with Hitler or Mussolini.—Ed.]

Lord Bruntisfield was of opinion that if my advice had been followed the Government would not now occupy a position on the hilltop on which he believes it to be standing. This is undoubtedly true, for the "hill-top" appears to me to be one of the summits of cloud cuckoo-land, or the kind of mountain which one climbs on one side by a gradual slope to find oneself confronted by a sheer precipice on the other.

Lord Bruntisfield's repeated emphasising of the devotion of the Allied nations to the principles of the Atlantic Charter is too palpably ridiculous to deserve more than a very brief comment. The attitude of the Soviet Government and its Press towards Poland and the Baltic States and those economic "straws in the wind" to which I made reference in my speech, and with which Lord Bruntisfield, in his ignorance of financial matters, made not the slightest attempt to deal, show how much is likely to be left of the moral principles of the Atlantic Charter in the event of complete military victory being secured for the Allies. Moreover, I am by no means alone in my views as to the fate which the Atlantic Charter has already suffered. Some members even of the House of Commons appear to realise it almost as plainly as I do.

Lord Bruntisfield suggested that, when I was dealing with economic matters, I had in mind, for the post-war world, an "expansionist" policy. This is not the case. I had in mind something much newer, more fundamental and infinitely more useful. An "expansionist" policy is the old familiar dodge whereby Orthodox Finance prevents the demise of the industrial goose which lays for it golden eggs. It is the temporary palliative which prevents the complete breakdown of its rotten system and the awakening of the long-suffering and ignorant public to the racket which has exploited them for so many years. An expansionist policy means that considerable sums of new money are created by bank loans for production, on which interest is paid; and by bank purchases of securities, the process being started by the Bank of England, which increases the supply of those kinds of money which are known as "cash reserves" and which enable the commercial banks to create still further sums of money. The creation of this new money, albeit carried out in a clumsy and unsatisfactory manner, gives a certain fillip to industry and brings about a modification in slump conditions which is honoured by the name of a trade 'boom.' Such a trade boom, it will be remembered, occurred for a short period after the last war, and it is not surprising to learn that the financiers of Britain and America, fearing open rebellion on the part of the returning members of the Services if they are immediately condemned to too serious a degree of poverty, have decided to repeat the experiment. Under the existing financial system, however, a slump sooner or later follows a boom, as surely as night follows day. A continuation of boom conditions is only possible under a system where the money-supply is adjusted to the maximum output and import of real wealth in the form of desired goods and services and where money is created not in the form of debt, and to finance consumption as well as production. Under the orthodox system which Lord Bruntisfield and his colleagues in the Government desire to preserve, the climax to the boom is reached in one of two ways, or, it may be, by a combination of both. A system which enables the greater part of the existing output of goods to be bought at a fair price only so long as new money is being created to finance a still further extension of industry, breaks down when the point is reached when it is felt to be doubtful whether the goods resulting from this further extension of industry will be desired and therefore saleable. Alternatively, the financiers may decide that industrialists are getting too prosperous and too independent and no longer come to them with sufficient frequency to borrow money at interest. In either case steps are taken to put the financial system into reverse. The Bank of England reduces the amount of those kinds of money which are known as cash reserves, and the commercial banks begin calling in loans and destroying the money represented by the principal, while few new loans are granted. The result of all this destruction of money is to knock the bottom out of the market and spread poverty and unemployment in every direction, just as happened after the last war in conjunction with a return to the Gold Standard.

Lord Bruntisfied went on to deliver an attack on Social Credit, under the belief that I had been advocating Social Credit measures. Had he been less profoundly ignorant on the whole question of monetary reform, he would have been aware that the two policies are distinctive of Social Credit —the Price Discount (a kind of subsidy paid to retailers who have reduced their prices to consumers, with new, non-debt and non-taxation money), and the National Dividend (a kind of pension made with non-debt and non-taxation money, either to all citizens or to all citizens in a certain category). To neither of these proposals of Social Credit, excellent as they are, have I as yet made any reference in the House of Lords and I have been careful to confine myself to the advocacy of general measures and principles which have the support of all enlightened monetary reform movements, including the London Chamber of Commerce. The vicious attack delivered on Social Credit by Government spokesmen was, however, an excellent tribute to the merits of Major Douglas's scheme, and, by basing his criticism, not on any opinions at which he had arrived as a result of personal study, but on the opinions of orthodox economists,* Lord Bruntisfield placed himself in that category of persons to whom I had already referred in my speech, who are too mentally indolent, too lacking in intelligence, or too destitute of a sense of public duty, to trouble to hear and understand the defence of Social Creditors to their critics. I might perhaps remind readers of The Word that, during a period of many years, I have heard all the major criticisms of the leading orthodox and semi-orthodox economists and have observed their inability to make any effective answer to the Social Credit reply. On three or four occasions I have engaged in public debate with well-known economists, and I think I can say without boasting that, in the opinion of an impartial audience, I did not have the worst of the encounter.

Lord Bruntisfield said that I had made it abundantly clear that I shared the same ultimate goal as the Government, namely, victory. In point of fact I said nothing of the kind, for the policy which I advocated, and have always advocated, has been neither victory nor defeat for Britain or any other country, but a negotiated peace in which both sides make concessions for the general good of humanity.

Lord Bruntisfield considered my suggestion laughable that the Government were proceeding without a plan. At the present time, I should say that lack of really effective post-war planning is one of the principal causes of the Government's growing unpopularity in the country, so Lord Bruntisfield might do well to take steps to convince the electorate as a whole that, under the Government's able guidance, everything in the post-war garden is going to be lovely!

Lord Bruntisfield asked, if we of this generation fail, from lack of realism and political sagacity, yet again to profit from the fruit of bitter experience, what hope there is that civilisation can progress or even survive. A most admirable sentiment! But it is precisely this lack of realism and political sagacity which the Government have been displaying to an outstanding degree, and the whole object of my speech was to make a final, and urgent, appeal that this blindness should not continue.

The universal hostility of orthodox and semi-orthodox economists to monetary reform is due to the fact that those interested in the preservation of the existing system take care to see that no one is appointed to a post which will give him the name of an economist of national repute unless, either he is in sympathy with the existing system, or, from a "Left" approach, can be relied upon to keep people barking up, what is largely the wrong tree, at "private ownership" and "industrial profit." Most economists, also have pet remedies of their own for existing evils and, until they have seen these tried without success, they will not look at anyone else's suggestions, even when these are superior to their own and go more to the very root of the trouble.

MONEY MATTERS

By PAUL D. ABBOTT.

In a recent legal case, "Re Eumorfopoulos," heard in the Chancery Division on 29th October last, a testator died in 1939 leaving certain works of art valued by expert valuers for probate at just under £10,000. In June, 1940, these articles were sold and realised more than £29,000 in excess of the valuation. Evidence was given that the difference was due to the fact that the value of works of art had greatly appreciated by June, 1940, owing to fears of inflation.

The degree of inflation then anticipated was roughly that the value of the £ would be about 5/-. If the buyers held on to the works of art until after the war, are they likely to be the losers, assuming the relative value of the articles remains unchanged?

If the war were to end now I think they would be the losers, but the ratio of inflation is bound to increase with the duration.

The Government's policy in stimulating War Saving seems to be designed to make people keener on the war, by giving them a vested interest in the survival of British capitalism. But the interest on these savings has to be paid after the war and this can only be done by inflation, so that, in effect, the purchasing power of the income (and capital) of the savings will only be a fraction of what it was. This will lead to people feeling cheated and probably, at least, a financial crisis. No doubt the capitalists will then load the burden of remedy on the Socialists and try and repeat the events of 1926/31. It is up to Socialists to be prepared for this occasion and to meet it with bold and wise changes of financial policy.

Professor J. H. Jones, in "The Accountant," 24/7/1943, estimates an annual post-war debt charge of at least £1,200 millions. This includes interest on £20,000 millions at 3 per cent. and an annual sinking fund charge of nearly as much. He also estimates an average annual charge for public services of at least £1,000 millions at pre-war prices if promises are to be fulfilled. Pre-war total Government expenditure was about £800 millions annually.

This means that post-war government expenditure is likely to be 2½ times as much as pre-war expenditure, and if this is taken to be the measure of inflation the £ would be worth 7/3. It must, however, be realised that the increased expenditure will raise the national income, but in order that there shall be a financial incentive to work the debt charge must only be a small proportion of the national income, hence the need for inflation. It is unlikely that a sterner treatment of unearned income for taxation could altogether solve the matter, as there would remain the problem of capital repayment.

A distinguished accountant some months ago saw an advertisement: "Buy National Savings Certificates. A rattling good profit free of Income Tax." His remark was, "the future Chancellor that is called upon to produce the profit will certainly be rattled."

And, in fact, Lord Kindersley, head of the National Savings Committee said that inflation was always round the corner.

In addition to this problem, the country's real wealth has diminished as a result of the war and it has lost its unearned increment from abroad in the shape of interest on investments (which means free imports). The average age of the population is also tending to rise and its incentive to work consequently diminishing. Under a sane system there would be little about which to be concerned in these facts, and in any case it is doubtful whether Britain is justified in maintaining a heavy population which she does only by exploiting the rest of the world. But the decline of Britain is liable to be a very painful business, perhaps involving starvation, and we have a duty to foresee the troubles lying ahead and to minimise these difficulties by putting our house in order by increasing equality both internally and internationally.

This can only be done by realising the wisdom of adopting Christian principles and by being willing to give and help while we have the chance. Already the lack of faith between the United Nations has been demonstrated by their failure to co-operate in an international monetary scheme such as the White or Keynes plan, and it is hardly surprising that Christian principles do have hard work to enter into capitalist agreements, especially when these are the proposed outcome of a war.

CATHOLICISM & CONSCIENCE

Dear Mr. Aldred,—As the four-times great grand nephew of a Sicilian Cardinal Archbishop on the distaff side but myself neither a Christian nor a Catholic, I must I think point out that your excellent correspondent, Mr. William Speirs is not quite fair to the Church. The "Universe" cuts very little ice with educated and cultivated Catholics whom I have heard say very—and justly—severe things about it. Journals such as "The Tablet" are quite admirable for their sanity balance and fairness, not to mention "The Catholic Herald" and "Catholic Times," which are both coats of very much another colour from the "Universe." Indeed one of these latter a short while ago—I think it was the "Catholic Herald"—gave a long series of quotations from recognised Doctors, Fathers and theologians of the Church on the subject of War and just as many were absolute and total in their condemnation of it as not, and further a number declared that a Catholic was guilty of mortal sin if he was convinced that his Government was waging an unjust war and he took part in it himself. The article concluded by saying that the Church did not lay down the law about the matter either one way or the other.

As for the "patriotic" mouthings of local-national clergy one has only to contrast these with the utterances of the reigning Pontiffs of the two "Wars for Freedom and Democracy." How different is the attitude of the supreme authority in the Church upon the matter.

Of course no one would or could deny that the average member of the various local-national Catholic clergy is the same unscrupulous time-server and toady to the Governmental powers that be as all the rest of them. The cream of the jest is the fact that the utterances of those on either side cancel each other out as authoritative "spiritual" guidance to their flocks in the war-mongering matter. Thus: a priest (a) in England declares that the war is a "just" war and that it is the duty of the members of his flock to accept his ruling; and priest (b) on the other side, declares the same thing to HIS flock, as he certainly will (vide the patriotic-chauvinistic attitude of some of the Italian clergy in the infamous Abyssinian "empire-building" business). Obviously the two rulings of the opposing priests make nonsense of each other.

But, as there are better and truer Christian and Catholic priests in the Catholic Church than blasphemous blood-maniacs like those two choice specimen described by Mr. Speirs, so too in the English Church are to be found, in contrast to the bloodthirsty Archbishops, such admirable and noble priests and humane Christians as the Rev. H. L. Le Mesurier and "Dick" Sheppard.

To turn to quite a different topic, I wonder if you Sir, and your readers, noticed the priceless "give-away" by His Excellency Monsieur Molotoff in the "Telegraph" of February 2nd?

In the course of an address to the various Presidents of the constituent States of the U.S.S.R., this person actually had the impudence to adduce it as evidence of how much better things were to-day under Czar Stalin than under the other older Czars, that the Asiatic nationalities who under the latter were exempt from the conscription infamy were now conscripted as all the rest of the serfs of the present Czar, adding that no discrimination on the score of nationality was made in the U.S.S.R.

That is to say, that, whereas the old regime preserved some small modicum of decency, and realised the gross impropriety of coercing its Asiatic subjects into fighting for it, the new one had so far "improved" things that this small concession to human decency had been abolished and ALL the wretched subjects of the present Czar brought equally under the thumb of Moscow.

As a specimen of combined humourlessness and shameless impudence this contention would be hard to beat in any Imperialistic country. Mr. Churchill could hardly surpass it.

Yours very cordially,

K. S. SORABJI.

HUMANITY, ART AND WAR

An Enquiry into the Sanctity of Human Life as opposed to the sanctity of Monasteries, Cathedrals and other works of art.

BY COUNCILLOR CHARLES A. EARL

On Wednesday, the 16th February, 1944, in the House of Lords, Lord Lang of Lambeth had the following Notice on Paper:—

"To call attention to the importance of preserving objects of special historical or cultural value within the theatres of war and to ask His Majesty's Government what measures they have taken or propose to take for this purpose."

The noble Lord opened his speech by saying:

My Lords, I rise to call attention to the importance of preserving objects of historic or cultural value within the theatres of war. Perhaps I ought to have added to the Motion the words "SUBJECT TO OVERRIDING MILITARY NECESSITY," but I hope that those words will be regarded as governing anything I have to say.

It will be remembered that Lord Lang of Lambeth was until comparatively recently better known as "His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury." I have searched in vain for any statement of his, showing concern for the homes and lives of the ordinary people; and his successor the present Archbishop of Canterbury, giving an address over the wireless on the 26th December, 1943, in speaking of our bomber crews, said, "We are bound to take satisfaction in their achievements." As we all know, those achievements consist of the obliteration of great cities such as Hamburg, Cologne, Dusseldorf, Lubeck and now of course Berlin, and as the industrial centres of all such cities are the most densely populated and chiefly by the working class, it is they who are obliterated, and who, Lord Lang insists, must be obliterated because of overriding military necessity. It is also an achievement in which, according to the Archbishop of Canterbury, we are bound to take satisfaction. Can anything be more amazingly callous than the concern Lord Lang expressed for the Vatican City and Rome. He says of Rome:

I need not remind your Lordships that it is the object of veneration by millions of our fellow Christians in all parts of the world.

Noble friend, Viscount Fitzalan, said that it would be deplorable both on religious grounds also on cultural grounds, if any damage were done to the City of Rome. It must have been a satisfaction to him to hear the assurance given him by my noble friend the Leader of the House that it was not the intention of His Majesty's Government to drop bombs on the Vatican City nor, so far as it could be avoided, on the City of Rome.

What greater or more sacred treasures can the Vatican City or Rome hold, than the lives of God's children in Berlin, London, Cologne, Coventry and all the other obliterated cities? Is there anything more worthwhile than mothers and babies? Yet I can find no plea for these in the Noble Lord's speech. mass murder presumably is not deplorable on religious or cultural grounds. I suppose mothers and babies are to be overridden by military necessity!

Lord Lang speaks of Assissi and St. Francis. How appalled and shocked the spirit of St. Francis must be if it can hear the ex-Primate's concern for the memories of St. Francis and observe his complete disregard for the children. How different from the loving concern Jesus showed "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." Perhaps Lord Lang feels that if Jesus had been on earth to-day, he would have excluded the little ones of German nationality from the Kingdom of Heaven!

The speech goes on, "Must we not think with dismay of the possibility of any of these wonderful creations and expressions of the human spirit being damaged and destroyed by the ravages of war?" The fact that millions of human beings, each of them an expression of the divine spirit, are being damaged or destroyed, is of no particular importance, military necessity overrides those. Jesus said "I am the Way." He also said "Resist not that which is evil," but he did not add "subject to overriding military necessity."

I don't know what Lord Winster would have said to Jesus, because this Noble Lord considers it more important to be "judicious," than to be courageous and sincere. In this respect he differs entirely from Jesus. Also the Noble Lord does not love his enemies, and he most certainly believes in an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. For example, he said:

"It is all very well to be concerned over the fate of Hamburg and the 28,000 people who were killed there, but why not mention the 30,000 killed in Rotterdam?"

Does the fact that 28,000 people were killed in Hamburg by British or American boys, help the 30,000 who were killed in Rotterdam by German boys; and even more important, does the fact that 30,000 people were murdered in Rotterdam justify the murder of 28,000 in Hamburg? Lord Winster thinks it does. Jesus certainly would not, and as for Lord Lang, if it is a military necessity then it is just too bad for the people of Hamburg, and the Archbishop of Canterbury feels bound to take satisfaction in the achievement. Lord Winster said:

"I remember when the Germans were invading Russia they did not hesitate to defile and desecrate the home of Tolstoy, one of the greatest apostles of peace who have ever lived."

Imagine Tolstoy's pleasure if he knew that he had been avenged by having thousands of Germans blasted to death?

Lord Winster did not say one word about the Russians blasting the homes of the Finnish people, although at that time our Prime Minister called the Russians "bloody baboons" and the churches held special services and prayed special prayers for Finland. But I expect it is not "judicious" to speak about that now. It is apparently quite in order and good Christian practice to bomb Helsinki now, and Sir Walter Citrine the well-known trade union leader will not have to walk the streets of that city and observe with pain the results of the devilish and ferocious bombing done by the godless Russians. That was only necessary in the early days of the war. I wonder whether Lord Lang would say that the bombing of Helsinki was an "overriding military necessity?"

Lord Winster admits quite frankly that we cannot discriminate in our bombing. He says:

"If you know that a certain town is producing a large volume of munitions how can you possibly tell which parts to bomb and which parts to leave alone in order to destroy that production?"

Quite, how can you? I have often asked that question when the Government has insisted that we always hit "military objectives," but I do not remember Lord Lang ever asking that question, nor his successor, the present Archbishop of Canterbury. But then Archbishops are bound to take satisfaction in our bombers' achievements, and after all, although it is by no means a record for our bombers, to kill 28,000 of God's children in a single city is a tremendous achievement. The God of Abraham was made of less stern stuff than the Archbishop. You will remember that Abraham asked God when speaking of the city of Sodom, "Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked?" and God promised to spare the city if ten righteous people were found there. I wonder if the Commander of our Air Forces took the trouble to find out if there were ten righteous people in Hamburg! Perhaps his spiritual adviser the Archbishop of Canterbury forgot to remind him that that was a very proper question to ask. On the other hand they may have known that there were no righteous people in Hamburg and blasted the city accordingly. Hamburg babies must of course be dreadfully evil creatures, not only were they "born in sin," like all babies, but their fathers and mothers were Germans. Then again it may have been a case of overriding military necessity, so of course mothers and babies couldn't expect anything else but extermination, could they?

The official report of the House of Lords suggested that 74,000 people had been killed and 3,000,000 rendered homeless in Berlin alone; this was up to February 16th and the Prime Minister in the House of Commons spoke of the honour of bombing Berlin (to the glory of God, I suppose) so apparently when military necessity necessitates the wholesale slaughter of thousands of God's children, it is conferring an honour on the people who perform this un-Christian work. Let us therefore take satisfaction in their achievements as the Archbishop of Canterbury tells us we are bound to do. Now thank we all our God!!!

To get back to Lord Winster. He sees nothing to take exception to in the spirit of such remarks as these: "Let them have it, they did it to us, let us do it to them." Of course he sees nothing to take exception to. How very foolish Jesus was to suggest "turning the other cheek." The Archbishop of Canterbury knows better than that, and we need have no overriding military necessity to justify our actions. It is an honour in which we are bound to take satisfaction. Praise the Lord and pass the ammunition!!! When Lord Lang first put forward his motion he omitted the words "subject to overriding military necessity," and they were not printed; but when he rose to address the noble assembly he corrected his error, and the Lord Chancellor very magnanimously forgave him by saying:

"Really, nobody in his senses supposed that the noble and MOST REVEREND Lord or anybody else was advocating that our military operations should be in some way restricted out of respect for ancient monuments."

I should say not! How silly not to realise that the ex-Archbishop of Canterbury, the noble and most reverend Lord would not allow ancient monuments to interfere with the war machine, when he will not even allow the lives of babes to interfere with it. It is comforting to realise that the Lord Chancellor knew so well the mind of Lord Lang.

Then the Lord Bishop of Birmingham spoke. He suggested that the Christian position had not been adequately understood. He said that:

"Christian people throughout the country were gravely troubled by the direction which the war is taking. That among Christian men and women there was great sadness, much searching of heart, pride in the courage of their boys, sorrow at the work they are given to do."

How strange his words seem when we remember the Prime Minister has stated it was an honour to bomb Berlin; and how different from his spiritual leader the Archbishop of Canterbury who said: "We are bound to take satisfaction in their achievements."

Can it be that parents disagree with the Prime Minister and the Archbishop of Canterbury? Else how can they feel sorrow at the work their sons are given to do, and at the same time take satisfaction in it? Isn't it puzzling, but there I suppose the Archbishop knows best. It is quite obvious, according to him, that Jesus' command to love our enemies is just plain nonsense. The Lord Bishop of Birmingham quotes Jesus again. "Put up thy sword into its sheath"; and he goes on to state that the Government says:

"This is not practical politics, that Might is Right; that Might defends Right; Yes, then the Christian remembers, Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit saith the Lord of Hosts."

He reminded the Noble Lords that for the first three centuries the Christian church adopted the policy of passive acceptance of wrong and in the end against the might of the whole Roman Empire they won. Such words must have seemed very out of place in the House of Noble Lords.

As a result of all this discussion those responsible for our broadcast talks arranged for a Labour M.P., Comrade J. J. Lawson, member for Chester-le-Street, to give the postscript on Sunday, February 20th. His theme was the sanctity of human life. He deplored the fact that there had been any protests about the bombing of monasteries and other architectural treasures. He said he had seen Durham Cathedral's great towers, poems in stone infinitely moving, but to compare those things with the wonder of those naked bodies he had seen do such testing things in the mine, well that was asking too much. He added:

"The false view that the creations of man were more important than man himself had been responsible for much misery in modern times. It poses for the modern world the old question: What does it profit if we gain the whole world and lose our sons from generation to generation?"

All that sounds extremely well and like a true Socialist should speak, but I must draw attention to the fact that although he talks about the sanctity of human life, Brother Lawson makes no protest about the hundreds of thousands of human lives being destroyed in Germany.

Perhaps there is no sanctity about German lives, or does military necessity override the brotherhood of man that we Socialists say we believe in? Brother Lawson said "It was common belief that 'God made man in His own image' that 'we are a little lower than the angels and crowned with glory and honour.'" Not a word about the wonder of the bodies of the babes in Hamburg, Berlin, etc., that God made in His own image and who are a little lower than the angels and crowned with glory and honour; or aren't they? My sincere hope is that the Bishop of Birmingham is correct when he says that "Christian people are gravely troubled at the direction the war is taking." Was the fact that the Bishop of Chichester recently protested in the House of Lords against indiscriminate bombing a sign that there is a spiritual awakening to the horror and wickedness that abounds? Let us hope that it may be so and that all people will at last be brought to realise how incredibly evil and stupid it all is. Those fine words of J. G. Whittier always have a great appeal for me, and I am sure that they contain the only sort of spirit that can bring freedom from the tyranny of war and lead mankind at last to everlasting peace.

"O brother men fold to thy heart thy brother,
Where pity dwells the peace of God is there.
Follow with reverent steps the great example of Him whose holy work was doing good.
Then shall all shackles fall, the stormy clangour of wild war music o'er the earth shall cease.
Love shall tread out the baleful fire of anger
And in its ashes plant the tree of peace."

TO THINKING READERS.

We hate having to make appeals for help. This journal and its allied monthly propaganda is maintained, as all Socialist and Pacifist and Humanist propaganda must be maintained, at a heavy loss. It is an expensively produced paper, circulated cheaply for the education of the common people, for reading by the very poor. It cannot continue without big sacrifices on the part of some of its readers.

WAR.

(Translated from the German by MICHAEL BULLOCK).

He is risen who for long has been asleep,
Risen from far under in the cloudy deep.
He, the great unknown one, in the twilight stands,
And the moon he crushes in his jet black hands.

Upon the city's evening din there falls a hush,
The chill and shadow of a strange gloom on it crush.
And the market's whirling round is frozen in a daze;
All is still. Men look about—in ignorant amaze.

Already on the mountains he is striking up the dance,
Crying: "Ye warriors all, advance, advance!"
And there is a rattling when his black head he shakes,
For round his neck a garland of a thousand skulls he makes.

RELIGION AND WAR

By C. H. NORMAN

The articles and correspondence which appeared sometime back in "The Daily News" on the subject of "God and the War" reminded one that there was a great gap in critical literature on the point of the relationship between the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the continuation of war in human society. No scholar has ever examined impartially, or partially, into the question of how far the religious doctrine of the immortality of the soul has contributed towards the perpetuation of war as a tolerated form of human activity.

Yet there are certain obvious facts which strike the mind of anyone who has looked into this rather dreadful topic, one being the prevalence of the practice among primitive tribes and races of burying with the dead warrior the weapons of mortal use in the expectation that they will be at hand in some other sphere into which the warrior is expected to pass. The question which faces the inquirer is whether the knowledge that life was certain to end in this world would take away from mankind the taste for slaughter; as compared with the religious conception that death on the battlefield is a way of ensuring a rapid passage to some blissful existence far beyond the satisfactions of the world known to mankind. There can be no doubt that the conception of the immortality of the soul has acted as a force favourable to war, as religious or priestly sanction has always been given to war and the use of arms (with some slight exceptions) as an occupation of honour against which no valid moral criticism can be made. There is also the curious psychological circumstance that few soldiers ever believe that they, as individuals, will be killed: they think the heavy hand of Death will be laid on other shoulders than theirs. It is also certain that the acts of soldiers in war establish that the commandment or moral direction against killing has in fact never won general acceptance from mankind.

It is strange how dissatisfaction with the conditions ruling the lives of the masses of mankind in this world has proved fruitful ground for the growth of the conception of some other world more satisfactory to their longings. Yet few people have ever faced this notion in its full implications. What kind of world can it be in which the individual soul divided from a decayed body can be supposed to exist? None of those who profess to be in communication with the next world, who claim the capacity of speaking with the dead, ever pretend that their communicants in or from the other world give any intelligible account of any meeting with the leading figures of the theological world such as the Angel Gabriel, the Virgin Mary, the Apostle John, Moses, Mahomet, St. Peter, or Jesus Christ. Nor has any description of the appearance or nature of God or the Supreme Creator or Authority in this other world been offered. The explanation for this reticence possibly may be that spiritualism is merely another type of self-deception. The mediums employed for communication with the other world, only being able to rely upon their experience of the known world, cannot pass on anything which is outside their everyday knowledge, since their supposed communication with the other world is delusion, fraud, or self-deception. The undoubted fact remains that spiritualistic literature is silent upon the nature of life in the other world or of the beings, if any, that inhabit it.

The reading of such a book as T. S. Eliot's "The Testament of Immortality" does not really enlighten the mind on the fundamental issue of whether human conduct in this world has any relation to the existence of any other world. A convincing answer to the concept of the immortality of the soul is found in the general behaviour of human beings in their life on this earth. It is inconceivable that people should behave as they do in this world had they any real conviction in conscience on the subject of an immortal life in another sphere, for which they were supposed to fit themselves by their conduct and demeanour on this earth. The panoply of the princes of the churches is totally inconsistent with any such belief.

The candid mind, however, must recognise that, among the features of human character, is that one which leads its owner into a blind rush into the turmoil of war. Fear, rather than courage, is the psychological basis of organised militarism. It is fear of the enemy, fear of losing what is possessed, fear of consequences of abstaining from warlike activity, rather than the exercise of cool judgment, which is the operative factor in maintaining the grip of militarism psychologically on mankind. Religion (which is a Latin word meaning fear of the gods) also exploits the fears of mankind in much the same way as organised militarism does. Hence when war comes, the cleric and the colonel are hand in glove in their menaces against any form of criticism aimed against the practice of war. The moral duties of mankind as preached by the clergy in peace-time cease to exist in war-time, with the connivance of these same clergy. Religion by its propaganda of the immortality of the soul, is a powerful element in moderating the fear of death which is latent in the minds of most men and women. The writer once asked several officers of high rank what would be the response should they ask volunteers for a military project in which it was certain that all the participants would be killed in its actual execution. The unanimous answer was that none would volunteer: they pointed out that the whole principle of the "forlorn hope" was that there was "hope," whereas the proposition put involved that there was no hope of any kind. Religion, by its assertion of immortality for those who die on the battlefield, by its blessing the murderous activities of the State, has contributed much towards the maintenance of war as an institution for attaining certain ends. Indeed, one may reflect whether anything more harmful to the humane progress of mankind has ever been conceived than the theory of the immortality of the soul. Its great strength lies in its appeal to human vanity. None, from the humblest to the mightiest in the land, is very willing to accept the idea of complete extinction which is involved in the rejection of the singular conception of human immortality. Most human ideas which are based on vanity are repulsive in their consequences. If the terror of war can only be maintained by the religious propaganda in favour of the logically incomprehensible doctrine of the immortality of the soul, the sooner the rational view that what is begun in this world will end at the grave is accepted the better for the world at large, and the worse for the militarists and their allies, the clerical propagators of superstition and fantasy.

SHAKE HANDS WITH A MILLIONAIRE

By JACK ROBINSON

With the increasing strain of war and as the desire for a Second Front becomes more apparent, Russia is leaving no stone unturned to prove her respectability to more bourgeois United Nations allies who cannot forget or forgive her revolutionary past. The dissolution of the Comintern, the re-establishment of the Orthodox Church and the alteration in the wording of the "Internationale," were offerings on the altar of a Second Front.

Not to be outdone by our own Warship Weeks, Spitfire Funds and millionaire subscribers to war loans, Russia has been publicising stories of millionaires also; millionaires who invest in war loans. Such a slight crack in the fabric of Socialist Soviet equality might reassure Joe Davies about Russia's "normalcy" but it causes misgivings to Stalin's backroom boys, one of whom, after admitting that there are Soviet millionaires and that they do not "stick in his gullet," goes so far as to say that ". . . if the Soviet millionaires invest (their million roubles) in war loan at four per cent, a class of rentiers is being created which, in time, will become indistinguishable from any similar class in other countries." To calm such fears as these C.P. propagandist Reg Bishop turns a pretty tight-rope performance in a Russia To-day pamphlet: Soviet Millionaires (2d.).

The patent idiocy of war loans being any kind of financial help to the war effort is ignored, and Bishop concentrates his step on the broad, and crooked, path of justifying the million roubles of collective farmers. Even in a capitalist state it is obvious that the Admiralty does not wait with bated breath for the result of Warship Week at some little known place before going out to buy one more cruiser. This war is not being paid for in cash, and never will be: the real wealth of the country is in the labour power and raw materials available. The Soviet Union does own all the labour and raw materials available, so that the absurdity of war loans is doubly apparent.

The use of war loans (apart from the diversion of purchasing power into non-labour and raw material consuming channels) is to gauge public morale and to assure the public that it has a direct financial interest in the result of the war. No Victory—no war loan repayment! Bishop by quoting from "Pravda" admits this:

> Every international loan is a test for the country, an index of its unity. The brilliant success of our second war loan speaks to the whole world of the great unbreakable unity of the Soviet people, of their deep, unshakeable confidence in their own Government. . . .

Soviet Russia seems to have adopted capitalist means which are leading her to a non-communist end. The loan, be it noted, is only one of an annual series:

> Even prior to the war the Soviet State loans were an annual feature . . . linked with the whole plan of socialist construction . . . from 1931 to 1941 the number of subscribers to the State loan grew from 33 million to more than 60 million.

So we get a new nation of Soviet rentiers and among them some millionaires! Let Comrade Bishop explain away this gnat of the Russian millionaire. He quotes a promise made by Stalin himself in 1933 to ". . . make all the collective farmers well-to-do." Why this promise? The collective farmers were, according to Stalin's admission, already living in security.

In 1929 there was an attempt to liquidate the kulaks (or rich peasants). This has been substantiated. The kulaks were, according to Anton Ciliga, deprived of literally everything and their confiscated property was given to the common fund of the Kolkhosi (collective form). Entire families were sent to concentration camps and exile, and the same fate befel anyone who spoke a word against the Government policy. A woman factory worker stressed that no mercy should be shown to the kulaks' children, "as they would grow up into kulaks some day." Under no conditions were they to be allowed to join Soviet youth organisations or to be employed in any state establishment.

The liquidation was avenged. Livestock was slaughtered rather than that it should be handed over to the collectives. In 1932 Caucasian and Ukrainian farmers let their harvest rot in preference to its being turned to the State. Peasants kept just sufficient stock to feed their families during the winter, and a small share saved for tax purposes was seized.

Famine followed. News of it, and of its causes, were kept from foreign newspaper correspondents. Thirty-three million people, it is estimated, suffered from famine, typhus and influenza. All President Kalinin could find to say was that "only degraded disintegrating classes could produce such cynical elements" as the "political imposters who asked for contributions for the alleged starving Ukraine."

Russian dependency on agriculture is self-evident: two thirds of the population are normally engaged in it. The peasants had proved by their destruction of 50% of the cattle that they could not be dictated to. So, collective farmers were promised that they would be made "well-to-do." The promise was being brought to fruition by the farmers themselves when, according to "Left," February, 1940, the Communist Party Congress of 1939 announced a campaign against peasants who had managed to build up private enterprise under cover of collectives. In spite of this campaign, however, "Pravda" (February, 1942) regretted that ". . . the organisation of collective farm trade was seriously neglected." In many places the markets for farm goods had ceased to exist and speculators were active in some places!

The herds allowed as individual holdings on collective farms have increased fourfold since then, and this has made it possible for the Government to purchase about two and a half million head of cattle from 250,000 farms to replace losses. These losses, caused by the German invasion, amount to 30% of the grain crop, 32% cattle, 56% pigs and 39% horses. They must be made good by the collective farmers—and purchased if need be.

The peasants themselves have been distrustful of the Government ever since the famine. Indeed, bitter memories of collectivisation, liquidations and famine have even made for a fifth column in the Ukraine cloaked under nationalist aspirations. There is no lack of evidence that they have taken advantage of their present dominant economic position to feather their own nest. One collective farmer—Comrade Berdyebekov—has become a millionaire, because Stalin promised to make him "well-to-do" and because of his ". . . own toil and services to the Soviet State and people." A million roubles, though, isn't a million pounds, as Mr. Bishop points out. Nevertheless we know that the patriotic comrade who, as army factory foreman can give 3,000 roubles to the State loan, was earning 1,200 roubles a month. Comrade Berdyebekov on the other hand has been able to save, presumably, two and a half times as much each month and put it in the sock till now he is able to loan a million to the State. Mr. Bishop's moral criterion about all this inequality is that there is no inequality in being a millionaire so long as you don't get your money by exploiting the labour of others, or by speculation. But what if you get a million roubles by exploiting the State's need for your services, as collective farmers and engineers apparently have done? We know that there is some inequality in Russia. Before the war a movie star of Lovkino got one hundred times the janitor's wages. A playwright got 200,000 roubles in royalties, and a comic paper editor was paid 30,000 roubles a month. Mr. Bishop acknowledges that the Soviet has produced millionaires, even if, as he says, they only amount to a "handful." The calculation for the payment of these comrades is based on the relative value of the individual to the State, not upon his personal needs. Others, no doubt, on this reckoning get their share of the gravy too.

Is it not a privilege any longer to render a greater service to fellow citizens than other comrades can do? The regular cleaning of sewers is as necessary, and as valuable, as feeding people. Given an ideal to work for what need have we for economic differentiation?

Comrade Bishop says there are no private enterprises "suitable for investment in the U.S.S.R." (my italics). But if state bonds in the U.S.S.R. were paying 8% in 1935, according to John Gunther, what then? Where did the 8% come from? Somebody has to work eight per cent extra to pay it. In the same year, 1935, 43,000,000 depositors used the banks which were also paying 8% interest. Anyway, Comrade Bishop assures us, war loans are different. They pay 2% a year to organisations only—organisations such as collective farms. Perhaps Comrade Beryebekov classes himself as a farm?

> Individuals may only subscribe to the lottery prize portion of the loan which provides winnings to one-third of such bonds over the next twenty years.

So that if Comrade Berdyebekov is an individual he still stands a chance of increasing his million.

In any case it must warm his comradely heart to feel the patriotic glow as he lends (lends, mark you) his million roubles to the State. Maybe he'll find his name in the honours list along with Reg. Bishop for services rendered to the U.S.S.R.

MECHANISTIC OR HUMAN SOCIETY:

Mr. Wilfrid Wellock's 1/- booklet, "A Mechanistic or a Human Society" (P.P.U. Bookshop, 6 Endsleigh Street, London, W.C.1.) is essentially one of those publications which should be read by all who wish to understand more clearly the problems by which our 20th century civilisation is confronted.

Mr. Wellock is an inveterate enemy of mechanization and a passionate advocate of the value of craftmanship. He insists that a man should be able to take an individual joy and pride in his work and, in his opinion, where this joy and pride are present, even what some might regard as long hours of labour are by no means necessarily a burden.

Like many enthusiasts Mr. Wellock occasionally goes a bit too far, tending to overlook the immense service that Science and machinery have rendered mankind and the fact that a person can take a profitable pride even in the simplest and most monotonous job if the end is worth-while and his hours of leisure provide ample facilities for some more creative occupation. Although it would be unfair to say that Mr. Wellock is blind to the danger of being "laudator temporis acti"—an over-enthusiastic praiser of the days that are past; in denouncing the pursuit of wealth by modern capitalists almost as though it were some new evil, he rather forgets that the selfishness which desires wealth is as old as human nature; while the urge to gratify that selfishness by making profit is almost as old as the use of money.

Like many Socialists, also, Mr. Wellock fails to distinguish clearly between those evils in our economic system which are due to capitalism and those which are wholly, or mainly due to finance starving the home consumer of buying-power; and to the foolish maxim of the pre-machine age "No work, no income," for the average person.

Such minor defects, however, in no way spoil the value of a challenging and helpful contribution towards the solution of our spiritual and social problems.

WILLIAM FLOYD, Humanist

William Floyd, editor of The Arbitrator, died at his home in New York on November 26, 1943, aged 72. Two days later the great American Unitarian and Humanist Minister, John Haynes Holmes, delivered a memorial address at 114 East 31st Street, New York City.

William Floyd made the acquaintance of the famous American Freethought journal, The Truth Seeker, in 1904. At that time, and for the next seventeen years, his relation to the paper was that of landlord. But he visited the office and made the acquaintance of the editors without disclosing that fact to them. Instead, he enquired about Freethought literature and was persuaded to read Paine's Age of Reason. In his last book, Humanising Biblical Religion, which our comrade Cole reviews in another column. Floyd states that Paine "drove the author," that is Floyd, "into the heretical fold."

Floyd describes how he "served ten years as a vestryman of the Church of the Ascension" —Episcopal Church—but he does not tell the story of what happened one Easter morning during the time that he was reading Paine. Another vestryman met him with prescribed salutation: "The Lord is risen." He expected from Floyd the response, "He is risen indeed." But an Easter impulse was stirring through Floyd. He felt a mischevious desire to make heretical protest. To the surprise of his fellow vestryman, he replied: "Don't you believe it!" and went on his way rejoicing.

Floyd commenced writing for the Radical and Freethought press under the name of "John Doe." Later, he assumed the name of "Atwood Manville." He wrote regularly for The Truth Seeker on religion and evolution, and then, with growing scepticism, challenged the righteousness of all established institutions. He wrote a most radical essay on "The Conjugal Relation." After that, he turned Socialist and developed into a Humanist propagandist.

He was a man of wealth by inheritance and was able to indulge in radical publishing. He wrote and published Social Progress and People v. Wall Street, two striking books indicting the the money power and questioning the justice of prevailing economic conditions. He was arrested once as a Red and accused of being "subversive." This charge amused him since he was the great-great-grandson of that William Floyd who, for the colony of New York, signed the Declaration of Independence.

In 1918, he commenced to publish the Humanist monthly, The Arbitrator, in order to express freely his views on all subjects. His assistant in this work for many years prior to his death was the studious Therman D. Wakefield, the grandson of Ingersoll by marriage. Wakefield is continuing the Humanist work that Floyd served so well to the very day of his death. In almost the last issue of The Arbitrator edited by Floyd, he acknowledges the receipt of the bound volume of The Word, and mentions several of the Strickland Press publications, in a reference to "books received from our colleague."

In the Humanist Memorial Address, Holmes quoted the poem by George Santayana:

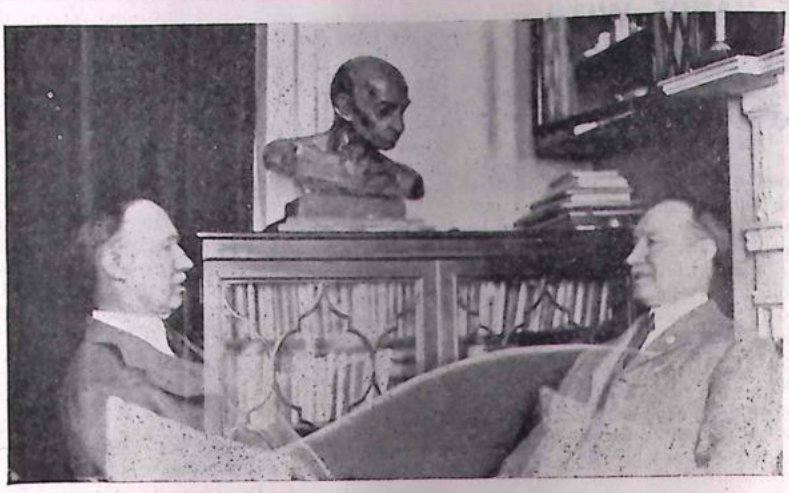
With you a part of me hath passed away;
For in the peopled forest of my mind
A tree made leafless by this wintry wind
Shall never don again its green array.
Chapel and fireside, country road and bay,
Have something of their friendliness resigned;
Another, if I would I could not find,
And I am grown much older in a day.
But yet I treasure in my memory
Your gift of charity and young heart's ease,
And the dear honour of your amity;
For these once mine, my life is rich with these.
And I scarce know what part may greater be—
What I keep of you, or you rob from me.

Holmes said that he felt wretchedly poor as a result of Floyd's death. He continued:

And I am not the only one, for Floyd's life was full of friends. They clustered all about him, young and old, distinguished and undistinguished, and he loved them every one. It was beautiful to see his humility among them, admiring and extolling them as a child his heroes, and never dreaming that he was himself among the best and truest of his own good company. And his generosity with them! No one will ever know the amount of time and money this dear man lavished upon his friends and their good causes, but it was bountiful beyond all proportions to his income. He gave much directly, on his own account, I have no doubt. But his chief delight was to make his benefactions through his friends and on behalf of their interests. He would learn, with eager sympathy, what YOU were doing to save this unhappy world, and then he would help you to do it, and never ask himself to be recognized and rewarded. He gave more often, therefore, to please others than to gratify himself. His chief happiness was to see others made happy by what he did for them. And he had a queer, whimsical, playful way of being generous. He would say: "Now, I'll give you this money, but on condition . . ."! Then he would lay down some terms of his own—that you must come to dinner once in so often, or what not—and only as you lived up scrupulously to these terms, did he fulfil his promise. It was a kind of game that he played, to the delight of everyone concerned. You might almost say that, in his bountiful giving, he was a kind practical joker, with the joke turned inside out, so to speak. The usual practical joke leaves its victim embarrassed, humiliated, and that's the reason we don't like it. But Floyd's practical jokes with his gifts left his friends elated, enlarged, uplifted, and endlessly happy. There's a way of doing things—and Floyd's way of being generous was a way of spiritual magic.

If I were to name the one quality in William Floyd's life which was central to his character, I would specify his integrity, by which I mean fidelity to his inner thought and life. He was a man who was all of a single piece. This was evident in what might be called the trivial aspects of his mien and habit. He was born and reared a gentleman, if you will accept the word in its spiritual meaning, and he came to live in a period of careless manners and loose morals. Ours is in many ways a degenerate age, and all too many of us show it in our heedless ways of life. But in all the years of my close friendship with William Floyd, I never found him even for an instant living beneath his own best standards. I have searched my mind in vain for the recollection of a single rude action, or a single profane or careless word.

What was thus so manifast in his speech and bearing was impressively evident in the whole movement and progress of his inner life. When I first came to know Floyd, he impressed me as a very sweet and gracious gentleman—sprightly, vigorous, alert, intensely interested in people and events, and extraordinarily friendly. But at that time he was utterly conventional! He was born of an old Colonial family, and was the lord of a manorial estate on Long Island. He was a graduate of Princetown University. He was a real estate broker with an office in the Wall Street district. He was a trustee of a prominent Episcopal church in this city, and a member of the Republican Party. Then, in those early years, there came changes—it would be interesting to know all the influences that brought about these changes! But gradually the horizon of his life widened; he had an open mind which was always eager to learn and understand new things; he was ever seeking fresh experiences, and making unusual personal contacts. The result was these changes of which I speak, and before they were done, these changes were fundamental. In these latter years he was a humanist, and thus on the extreme left wing of contemporary religious thought. He was a socialist, and thus a radical in his political thought. He was a pacifist—or peace patriot, as he would prefer to call it—and thus an outcast in time of war. Here was he thrice a heretic. Put humanism, socialism, and pacifism together and you have the holy trinity of heresy—though he would have objected to that word "trinity." How shall we explain this transformation through the years of a man's whole thought and life?



WILLIAM FLOYD

"By Himself."

This "Spirit" portrait was taken of himself by Floyd in May, 1943, and sent to us with a humorous comment.

Well, first of all, I think there was always in William Floyd a certain spirit of rebellion against the status quo. One of his ancesters, whose name he bore, was a signee of the Declaration of Independence, and that man's rebellious blood flowed ever in his veins. Secondly, from the beginning there was an open-mindedness in turn that was remarkable. He had this eager interest in all that was written or spoken, and along with this tolerance of opposition which enabled him, even in his conventional days, to welcome unfamiliar, novel, and unexpected truth. But central to the whole, I must believe, was this integrity to which I have referred. He must be faithful to his own soul, in all its experiences and quests. As his horizon enlarged, his mind must explore it to its farthest bounds. He must be honest with himself in accepting and not ignoring or defying what life revealed to him. Thus, in his outward associations, he kept pace with his inward thought, and preserved his integrity as the most precious jewel of his life. It is difficult to think of William Floyd ever having contempt or ill-feeling for any man. But if he ever cherished an atom of such emotion, it was in the case of those persons, not infrequently members of my own profession, who were compromisors in their theological thought and thus not honest with themselves. How he loved to pursue these men with his wit and wisdom, and try to get them on the record, so to speak, and to force them to face the dilemma of their quibbles and evasions! He would have these persons as honest as himself, and this was no easy task.

This brings me to one further thought! We are tempted to think of this quality of integrity as something that is superb, and yet rather hard and cold in nature. It suggests the granite rock on which the winds blow and the billows of the sea beat in vain. But there was nothing hard about William Floyd. He wrought the miracle noted in the Bible —which fact would not have impressed him—of combining strength with sweetness—strength of character with sweetness of temper. He was ever the gentlest, kindest, and most gracious of men. . . .

I remember an afternoon when I sat beside his bed, at a time when he was very weak and sick. I was holding his hand, and trying to talk with him cheerfully. Looking at me steadily, and with full knowledge of what he was saying, he whispered, "You know, Holmes, I am not afraid to die. But I am terribly afraid of living and not being able to be active, or even to think straight." . . .

As I think of him thus gone, I have been trying to compose an epitaph worthy of his shining record. I have not succeeded, but here at least is a suggestion:

IN MEMORIAM
WILLIAM FLOYD

The Beloved Heretic
honest of mind—brave of heart—gentle of spirit.
In his thinking he sought for Truth;
In his living he practised Goodwill;
In his dying he left the precious legacy
Of one whose country was the world,
And whose religion was to Do Good.

Before his death, Floyd prepared the Christmas, 1943, issue of The Arbitrator. This contained the words and music of a song entitled Morn of Victory, written and composed by Herman Epstein. We are unable to reproduce the music, but gladly publish the words:—

"That these dead shall not have died in vain."—Lincoln.

The dawning Rays in Morning Sky
Dispel the long and dismal Night;
The Day of lasting Peace is nigh,
Its Birth and Life are fed by Light;
Our Faith is firm, and Hope mounts high,
Uplifted by a wondrous Sight.
With Richly laden, fertile fields,
The willing Earth her children feeds;

Unending wealth Machinery yields,
We ride the skies on flying steeds:
Mysterious Force that Lighting wields
Is tamely tied to serve our needs.

An end to insane Wars,
Which forge anew war times;
An end to needless Want
With myriad Brood of crimes;

The star of Love our guide,
No longer brutal might
Ascending side by side,
To ever loftier height,
Glory we find in building common good:
To serve for all shall Science
And beauteous Art unite,
Informed, enlightened Creeds,
Thirst more and more for Light;
'Gainst Discord, Hate and Strife,
Enthrone harmonious Plan:
Unchained and fearless free,
Creation's Crown be Man.
So dawns the Morn of world-wide Brotherhood.
A new Day is born, Oh! Sun of Peace, Arise!

At the end of the music, our contemporary published the following letters:—

To William Floyd.

Dear Friend Floyd,

The people of the whole world are fervently yearning that the coming Peace shall be a lasting Peace.

This longing is deep in the hearts of all, in every country, in every belief, in those of every color, of every conviction, with no limitation of any kind.

I have tried to convey this common hope in the song I have written.

Knowing your all-embracing human sympathy and tolerance, I am sending you a copy with the greetings and wishes usually expressed at Christmas time.

Always,
HERMAN EPSTEIN.

Dear Herman Epstein,

I welcome the song you have sent me as a Christmas greeting, and fully join you in its call for World Friendship and service. This is the hope in which the world now unites.

Differences of opinion must continue, for these are rain upon the Tree of Progress so that it shall ever grow.

Yuletide this year must stress above all the common Hope for Peace.

For December 1943 issue of "The Arbitrator" I am sending to my subscribers no discussions, only your song of Unity.

Cordially yours,
WILLIAM FLOYD.

The song of peace and unity was Floyd's last message of harmony to all mankind.

except that as we have said, there are more modernists than he allows for, Dr. Floyd shows that his demolition work is still, unfortunately, a very necessary job.

"Perhaps," says Dr. Floyd, "the most important section of this book is that which analyses the Holy Bible as a moral quide." In this part, there are numerous quotations from the Old and New Testaments which set forth certain Biblical standards of morality and ethics, and the humanist reaction to them. We cannot now discuss this tremendously important section in detail, but if the author does repudiate much that many modernist Christians would retain, at least he offers other ideas and principles as a substitute.

In religion the old is dying—in the dark night of man's disillusionment and despair, and the job of those of us who believe that religion is an essential and vital need in human life is to help "Ring out the old, ring in the new; ring out the false, ring in the true." Dr. Floyd's book is an invaluable contribution to such an effort, and we gladly and unhesitatingly commend it to all who would "shake off the dust of errors" piled up by man's blind faith in the Orthodox Biblical religion, and who would "march to the praise hymn of progress."

* "Humanising Biblical Religion" by William Floyd, Arbitrator Press, New York, $2.00.

BIBLICAL RELIGION

By The Rev. CHARLES H. COLE

(Minister, High Street Unitarian Christian Church, Portsmouth; Chairman Portsmouth P.P.U; Minister Humanist Society of Friends)

"Ilico" in The British Weekly said in a recent article:

"We must be truly and fully human before we can be religious."

If by this he means that all our religious thinking and activity must be motivated and controlled by our natural human reason instincts and needs, and not by super-natural authority before we can claim to be really religious, we agree with him; and Dr. Floyd, in his Humanising Biblical Religion, seems to endorse the same idea.

The average orthodox Christian answering to this principle is—irreligious; for his religion is determined by a blind, unreasoning belief in a super-human, super-natural power whose message to mankind is revealed in a supernaturally inspired Bible and which demands that human reason, instincts and needs shall be subordinated to the claims of those infallible authorities. And paradoxically enough, by accepting religion in that manner he loses it. For true religion has nothing to do with Gods and Bibles and the Creeds and Dogmas that have been invented about them, but it is essentially a product of the human spirit, and finds its highest expression in the humanitarian behaviour of man to man. This truth was realised in a sudden flash of insight by one of the Jewish prophets as well as by one of the early Christian disciples, when they declared that what was required of the religious man—what constituted true religion, was the practice of justice and mercy in human relationships.

But as Dr. Floyd says:

"Among the concomitants of Religion as commonly understood and practised are Rabbis, Popes, Cardinals and Priests, angels and archangels, devils and saints, . . . fast days and holy water, . . . litanies and creeds . . . atonement and absolution, . . . heaven, hell and purgatory, an anthropomorphic God, the Holy Ghost, and a Redeeming Saviour; the Trinity—Humanism cares for none of these things."

Neither does True Religion. And in debunking, quite rightly, in our view, "religion as commonly understood and practised," Dr. Floyd appears to overlook this fact, or at least to soft-pedal it. We applaud the gusto with which he attacks the still widely-held belief in an Infallible and verbally inspired Bible which, as he shows quite clearly, has been responsible for so many of the Church's pernicious dogmas and doctrines, and which has militated against human progress; we admire the zeal with which he condemns all the falsified history, contradictions, absurdities, atrocities, immoral and unethical messages, etc., which are to be found scattered throughout its pages. We agree wholeheartedly that "reliance upon the Bible," accepting it as the Infallible Word of God and "its traditional sacredness unquestioningly . . . has done incalculable harm"; but we do not see why "ministers who have renounced the orthodox conception of the Bible, and who claim that it is only one of many inspirational works" (of whom the writer is one), should "Refrain in future from quoting from either Old or New Testaments." I think it was Dr. Haynes Holmes who wrote somewhere that "the Bible is a record of the wisdom and folly, truth and error, good and bad, of a great people in a classic age."

Well, let us by all means repudiate the follies, terrors and badness, but why should we also reject the wisdom, the truth, and the good? To do so would seem like "throwing out the bath with the bathwater!" I can understand a man saying that he is no longer interested in the fairy stories of Genesis, or in the genealogical tables in the books of the Chronicles, or in some of the imprecatory Psalms, or in the theological subtleties of Paul, or in the mystical Revelation of John; but I cannot understand why he should also say, because these and many other wrong and bad and stupid things are in the Bible, he will never again allow himself to search for the pearls of wisdom to be found, say, in Solomon's writings; nor let himself be uplifted and challenged by the dreams and visions of some of the O.T. prophets; nor look for the moral guidance that is contained in the Sermon on the Mount; neither will he ever read again so that he might be moved and exalted by it. Paul's immortal hymn is Love. Surely what is true and good in literature, any literature is good and true in itself, and it seems to me to be unreasonable to refuse to acknowledge the intrinsic worth and value of that which is true and good in the Bible, because one has been compelled to reject what has been discovered to be bad and false in it!

Humanity has much to gain and nothing worth worrying about to lose, by adopting the Humanist attitude towards the Bible—that is, by regarding it as a product of the human mind and spirit—and accepting all the implications of such an attitude which are so thoroughly dealt with in the book under review; but also, humanity would lose much that is worth while retaining if in doing this it ceased to "search the Scriptures" for whatever of truth and beauty, goodness and humanity is to be found there.

But if I continue to discuss this matter, which is to me an important one, but which perhaps to Dr. Floyd is only incidental to what his book is mainly concerned with, I shall be doing him a real injustice and shall deserve the anathema he pronounces upon anyone who criticises it "without discussing its revolutionary temporal hypothesis," which is that he "be consigned to read the Holy Bible from Genesis to Revelation and review that treasured volume as critically as he would any other book." I must avoid that awful fate at all costs!

So let me tell you in his own words what is the main contention of his work. It is:

"That the present is the most dependable era of Revelation and is therefore more suitable than ancient times as the basis of a modern religion or philosophy."

"Biblical Religion depends solely upon the distant past. Nothing has been added to its Revelation for nearly two thousand years. Religion lives on lapsed time."

That is true, of course, of purely Biblical religion; that is, of religion which continues to base its teaching on the orthodox attitude towards and interpretation of the Bible. I must accept Dr. Floyd's statement that that is the kind of religion which prevails in America—but as he says also, "there are various degrees of religiosity"; and not all Religion "lives on lapsed time."

As Dr. Julian Huxley said in a recent broadcast talk:

"The scientific Humanist . . . sees that man tends to advance in Religion as he does in science or in social organisation."

There are stages of religious advance recorded in the Bible even—as, e.g., the development of the idea of God. True that we know infinitely more to-day about the physical universe and the nature of man, and that the discoveries and inventions of science have opened up possibilities for human progress undreamed of in Biblical times, but I'm not sure that Dr. Floyd is right when he says that religion has shown itself quite unwilling to accept this new knowledge and take account of these new discoveries. My bookshelves bear witness to the fact that a new religious faith is emerging, which is basing itself on the eternal and sterling spiritual values and lofty ethical principles which the Bible does reveal to discerning minds, and also on the knowledge and inspiration derived from modern thought. There are, I am convinced, more modernist Christians "who," to quote the Doctor, "are scornful of the old theology" than he suggests.

Another object of the author's work is to establish the validity of the "straw man," that is, to refute the contention of some of his critics that when he is tilting at the ideals of orthodoxy to demolish them, he is only attacking "a man of straw—an imaginary creature of his own fabrication which he has created in order that he may demolish him." The solid existence of this so-called "straw man" is impressively proved, and

A STORY OF HERESY, PROGRESS AND CULTURE.

South Place established in 1815 an "Infants' Friend Society" for the relief of "new-born infants and their mothers." In 1830 this was developed and reconstituted.

This philantrophy is interesting because South Place was never a working-class centre. Fox was the orator of the Reform Bill agitation and later of the Corn Law agitation. The workers applauded him, but they remained aloof from his chapel.

His eloquence, said Thomas Carlyle, was like opening a window through a London fog into the blue sky. "But," he added, "I went away feeling that Fox had been summoning those people to sit in judgment on matters of which they were no judges at all." Moncure Conway, to whom this remark was made, assured Carlyle that therein he was mistaken; Mr. Fox was teaching the teachers, men and women who, or many of them, were centres of influence in their several spheres. And among those whose youth was largely influenced by Mr. Fox a considerable number did noble service for every human cause —men like John Stuart Mill; Peter Alfred Taylor, the brave commoner; Mrs. Frank Melleson, who founded the Working-Women's College; reformers like Slack, Saul, Whitehead, Macmorran, Holyoake, Ashurst, Dixon, Collet, Ryall, Braham, Johnson, Marsden, Raftery, Cunnington, Levey, Walters and Ragg; and families whose names rank high in the annals of London—as the Waterloos, Hicksons, Lyons, Taylors, Courtaulds.

The influence of South Place was very great. In 1856, when Moncure Conway lost his pulpit in Washington because he denounced slavery; and later, in Cincinnati, when Conway lost friends for denouncing supernaturalism, he was befriended by persons who had learned to love liberty of thought and person from W. J. Fox of South Place.

On the day when Rammohum Roy spoke at South Place, Harriet Martineau entered the chapel with Mr. and Mrs. Fox and heard her name mentioned in public for the first time. She had won three prizes for essays on the best means of propagating Unitarianism among Jews, Moslems, and Catholics. She was unknown and under thirty. Fox recognised her ability five years before, and persuaded her to come from Norwich to London to secure a better field for the expression of her talents. He introduced her to the Mills, and was the cause of her great intellectual progress. The meeting assured her literary success.

Rammohun Roy died suddenly at Bristol, and a memorial service was held at South Place on October 13, 1833. Harriet Martineau wrote a special hymn for the occasion, and Eliza Flower composed the music. This hymn began: "No faithless tears, O God, we shed——." Roy's motto was the words of the Persian poet: "The true way of serving God is to do good to man." Fox preached a funeral discourse asking all to adopt this injunction as the rule of their own conduct.

To this rule Fox dedicated his own life. He discarded Christianity for a Catholic Theism. His favourite selection for the choir was Pope's Universal Prayer:

Father of all, in every age,
In every clime adored,
By saint, by savage, and by sage,
Jehovah, Jove, or Lord.

In 1829, when many Dissenters were petitioning Parliament against Catholic emancipation, Mr. Fox and his society acquired honourable eminence by their exertions for that measure of justice to opponents. In the beginning of that year the Society passed a resolution:

That the Committee be instructed to take such measures as may appear to them necessary towards obtaining a repeal of all penal statutes affecting religious opinions, and more especially those affecting our Roman Catholic brethren.

The same year witnessed Catholic emancipation, but left twelve Deists in prison. This persecution may have led Mr. Fox to examine more closely the religion of Deists. After the Catholic emancipation he became interested in the question of the civil disabilities of the Jews, and commenting on some utterances of the Bishop of Hereford on that subject (1834) he wrote: "If this be the figure under which Christianity is to exhibited by its recognised leaders, there needs no prophet to predict that, as the religion of the people of this country, it will not last two more generations." But at this time he felt an increasing repugnance to the Deity of the Old Testament. On the twenty-fifth anniversary of the commencement of his ministry, in 1842, he preached a discourse in which he declared that there is more wisdom of God in the words of Jesus than in all the recorded declarations of the Jewish Jehovah.

Fox had probably been re-reading Thomas Paine when in an article on Cobbett (Monthly Repository, 1835, p. 486) he wrote:

He has been very absurdly compared with Paine, whom he excelled as much in fertility of popular illustration as he fell short of him in the faculty of generalising, and in the condensed, yet imaginative expression of abstract principles. Paine's merits as a writer are scarcely yet appreciated; those of Cobbett render themselves felt instantly.

The name of Paine was especially odious to many Unitarians, accused of being in the "halfway house to Paine," and Mr. Fox's remark is significant.

But in that same year, 1835, he is found speaking tenderly of Roman Catholic superstition. In his discourse on "The Moral Omnipresence of God," Fox describes the feast, celebrated in Catholic countries, of the raising of the Cross, with much sympathy and understanding, whilst protesting against the grievous error underlying the fanaticism and superstition of the celebration. It is a most eloquent passage.

At this time Fox found that he had "outrun his text." He could no longer confine his themes to verses from the Old and New Testaments, or keep his exposition within Christian limitations. He viewed belief as being as solemn as unbelief, and warned Theist and Atheist equally of the need not to be imposed on by words. After his fortieth year he gave up reading his sermons. He spoke from shorthand notes, and took books with him into the pulpit for the purpose of quotation.

Fox never doubted the existence of God, yet he was most just to Atheists and Atheism. In the London Times, November 29, 1833, a paragraph appeared, headed "Hissing an Atheist." Mr. Julian Hibbert, called as a witness before Alderman Browne, stated, when the Bible was presented, that he was an atheist. He was insulted by the attorney, Charles Phillips, and hissed by the people present, the jury joining, and Alderman Browne expressed satisfaction in this display of religious sentiment. On this, Mr. Fox wrote (Monthly Repository, January, 1834) the following admirable rebuke of the alderman and the attorney:

A man professing to be an atheist may nevertheless be a moral man, as far as regards his social duties; and if he be a punctilious man in regard to truth—which declaring his belief in opposition to public obloquy is mostly a proof of—it is utterly absurd and mischevious to incapacitate him from giving his evidence in a court of law.

It was harder to be just to the English Established Church than to Atheists, Deists, Catholics, and Jews, all of whom were persecuted and under odium. But Fox was equal to justice. At the close of 1833, in his Monthly Repository, Fox attacked a proposal for the indiscriminate disestablishment and disendowment of the Church as being penny-wise and pound-foolish. The community would not be benefited. He proposed, instead, that churches and cathedrals should be kept in good repair and put to the use of all denominations in democratic common enjoyment.

Fox's protest against indiscriminate disestablishment and disendowment was consistent with his persistent protest against the practical union of Church and State. In 1833 he gave six lectures "On Church Reform, considered as a national and not a sectarian object"; and on Sunday, March 9, 1934, the South Place Society adopted and signed a petition which was presented to Parliament by Joseph Hume. In this it is said:

Your petitioners are earnestly desirous of such amendments in the existing laws as shall secure the public benefit of a correct registration of births, marriages, and deaths; allow the marriage contract to be entered into without submission to a prescribed religious ceremony; prohibit any restriction of the advantages and honours of the universities by the imposition of a theological test; and exonerate all classes from compulsory payments towards the support of a Church from which they dissent; but that your petitioners regard these and many other evils which might be enumerated, as merely emanations from one great practical grievance, namely, the alliance of a Church with the State, so that while one sect is established, all others are only tolerated, and their members are, by the very fact of this legal partiality, subjected to insult, injury, and degradation.

The petitioners further, in well-weighed words, "disclaim any hostility to the Episcopal Church in its spiritual capacity," desire from the funds "due provision for their present recipients," and application of the residue to such national education as would fulfil the real intent of the endowments.

In 1837 Mr. Fox's discourse on this subject was published and sold in aid of Mr. Burden and the Braintree parishioners for losses consequent on refusal to pay Church rates.

MAN AWAKES AT LAST.

A thousand factories and a thousand laws,
A thousand slums, a thousand dreary piles
Of tenements,
And over all the watching eyes of those
Who check and watch, note and compile,
The continents;
The dull-eyed regiments, shuffling and sad,
Of slaves.

The river flows between the factories,
The grass is black with smoke, and foul to taste,
And there is talk
Of freedom and of brave new worlds—
(Its all been said before) and yet this waste
Of words, this ancient croak
Of slogans drips in the suffering ears
Of willing slaves.

Willing, obedient, citizens: their lot
The grimy six foot patch of seedy earth
When they are dead:
Their few pathetic years dripped willingly away
And all their hopes are led
Stupid to war, quietened and hushed, by the loud notes
Of the beaten drum.

Yet here, and there, in the obedient streets,
Humanity's slow whisper wakes and stirs,
And from the slums the sky
Is suddenly seen, bursting with clouds and blue,
And a voice says, that is not his nor hers,
But mine; and I
Am the possesor of the world; the fields are mine,
And the long lanes.

O let the whisper grow and let it roar,
Breaking the eardrums of the sickly few
Who have and hold,
And for their holdings, regiment their slaves,
Drive them to war, uncaring since they know
Slaves are not bold:
Now let them tremble when they hear their slaves
Burst from their chains!
And man awakes at last!

"ALIEN BLACKS"

The Duke of Bedford and His Pro-War Critics

Three Years Press Campaign Reviewed.

There is another point of approach. While we do not share the Duke's concept of divine understanding, surely, if he believes in God, he has a right to suggest that God has given him "a small share" of understanding. Is not this an answer to those who claim that God inspires their war utterances. We think that is a complete reply.

Under the pressure of the attacks made upon his views and himself in the newspapers of the country, the Duke addressed a letter of protest to The Evening News, Worcester. This resulted in a discussion with the editor that was summarised in The Newspaper World on December 13.

The Worcester editor attacked the Duke's letter of protest as "touching the honour and loyalty" of an editor. How many Capitalist editors suffer from honour?

The Duke wrote about editors who are "compelled to publish opinions which are not their own in order to satisfy those who control their paper."

This is the known condition of editors. The Duke rightly described this state of affairs as "a bad thing" but "understandable."

The Duke added :—

There are, however, times of crisis, of which this is one, when a man who has any sense of decency in him should be ready to risk his job if he is required to be the tool of a policy which is likely to ruin his country and perhaps bring mutilation or death on his family or friends.

The editor, knowing war-time hysteria and psychology denounced this very human comment on what is known to be fact as "the advice from this warped intellect, which takes as much account of the integrity and judgement of a journalist as it does of the commonsense of the British people as a whole."

The editor expressed surprise "that this corruptible counsel was not accompanied by the offer of a bribe."

The suggestion that a pacifist thinker and propagandist in war-time—even a duke—could compete in bribery with a powerful capitalist state, could arise only in the minds of a man born to be a day-labourer of the controlled press of capitalist society. The man thinks in terms of ignorance and interest and the conventional stupidity of an epoch of fear and uncritical passion.

And so ended 1941!

The most bitter 1942 attacks were made in May. On the 22nd of that month the Duke made the headlines again and there was a spate of bitter and unseemly attack.

The Daily Express under the heading "'Peace' Duke Defends Mr. Morrison" opened its parliamentary report :—

In Britain's House of Lords yesterday there rose to speak Hastings William Sackville Russell, 12th Duke of Bedford, formerly lieutenant, 10th Battalion Duke of Cambridge's Own (Middlesex Regt.), aged 53, Pacifist.

He rose to defend Mr. Herbert Morrison, the Home Secretary, whom he described as "my potential jailer."

The Sheffield Telegraph gave "Vulcan's" "London Opinion" as follows :—

KEMSLEY HOUSE, Thursday.

The House of Lords, this afternoon, listened to the Duke of Bedford with the silent, profound courtesy which it always extends to the eccentrics among its Members. The Duke is as utterly opposed to the penalising of the German people as Lord Vansittart is convinced of the need for this action. He presented his case well—better indeed than did Lord Ponsonby, who spoke later as a Pacifist and was trounced by his old Sheffield colleague, Lord Rankeillour.

But neither made an atom of impression on the House.

The Daily Mail published another view of the maiden speech, from Percy Cater, its Parliamentary Correspondent. Cater wrote, in bold type :—

The Pacifist Duke of Bedford, lonely crier in the wilderness for a negotiated peace with Hitler and the man Mr. Herbert Morrison "has got his eye on," made his maiden speech in the House of Lords yesterday—in hot defence of Mr. Herbert Morrison.

The Scotsman, Edinburgh, commented, in its news summary :—

Even with the Duke of Bedford intervening to support him, Mr. Herbert Morrison has emerged unscathed from the House of Lords debate in which his speech referring to justice for Germany after the war was discussed.

Under the heading "A Duke Shows Clenched Fist," the Glasgow Evening Citizen for May 22, 1942, "Londoner's Diary" stated :—

I heard the Duke of Bedford make his maiden speech in the House of Lords. When he had finished he sat down and rested his arm fully stretched along the back of the bench. Presently he raised his forearm and clenched his fist. And for a little time he remained like that. It was no doubt unconscious, but several in the House noticed that the Duke was giving the Communist salute.

A little later, I met Mr. Willie Gallacher, the Communist M.P. He greeted me with the clenched-fist salute, which was exactly the same as the Duke's. Mr. Gallacher says it is a gesture of defiance against tyrants.

This paragraph also appeared in The Evening Standard, London.

The Birmingham Mail attacked at length the notorious Duke of Bedford, who asks no more than that we should abandon the ridiculous idea of reparations and punishment, and let bygones be bygones.

The Daily Telegraph, London, for May 22, rebuked Herbert Morrison for making a speech which caused him to endure the embarrasing acclamation of the Duke of Dedford.

The next day, the Daily Telegraph leading columnist appealed to history under the heading "Russells' Ancestors." He achieved this spicy item of ancient gossip and current denunciation :—

I wonder, by the way, if the shade of an ancestress of the Duke of Bedford was hovering somewhere in the House of Lords when her descendant was making his poisonous speech in that debate. The lady I mean was the first Lady Russell, the wife of King Henry's Minister at the time of the Reformation, from whom the line of the Russells descends.

"Poisonous Speech!" To protest against the doctrine and policy of race extermination! That is how the Nazi foams when one protests against Anti-Semitism and the hideous torture of Jewish folk.

The Marquis of Donegal's stupid and pointless attacks on the Duke of Bedford in the Sunday Dispatch have been noted in these columns. On May 31 he referred to the Home Secretary . . . and his chief supporter, the Duke of Bedford . . .

This was because Herbert Morrison had declared publicly :—

I am against that foolish and purposeless vindictiveness which was sought to be imposed for a time after the last war.

During 1943, the "Communists" became the Duke's chief slanderers. The Daily Worker, in its issue for February 15, in its "Worker's Notebook" attacked the Duke of Bedford for a speech made to a meeting of Parish Council representatives at Foxfield House, and reported in the North Beds. Courier for February 2. The Duke spoke of bringing an end to the slaughter of our kith and kin. Commented his "Communist" critic :—

Now, the Prime Minister and the American President having declared for fighting until the enemy surrenders unconditionally, and Mr. Churchill having driven that home by pledging us to wipe out every vestige of Nazism and Fascism, it is an outrage that an aristocrat should exploit the influence of his landed family to plant defeatism among Bedfordshire countryfolk.

"Badoglio" is the correct comment on this political trash. We also direct our readers' attention to The Scottish Daily Worker for Tuesday, December 10, 1940, wherein is found a report of Meetings addressed by Harry Pollitt at the Victoria and Regal Cinemas, Dundee, on the subject of "War and The People."

We reproduce the main portion of this report :

POLLITT'S MESSAGE TO BIG MEETINGS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

DUNDEE, Monday.

Harry Pollitt and William Cowe, Scottish organiser of the Communist Party, spoke to packed and enthusiastic audiences at the Victoria and Regal Cinemas, Dundee, last night.

Announced a few weeks ago that Pollitt and Cowe would speak on the "War and the People" at the Victoria Cinema, so big was the demand for tickets, very chiefly among lowly paid jute workers, that the second hadd had to be taken.

Analysing the situation facing the working people of Britain to-day, Pollitt said that in the declining period of British imperialism, all signs point to the development of a stage which—unless the workers take their destiny into their own strong hands—will inevitably go down to posterity as the hungry and bloody forties of the twentieth century.

"The year 1940 brings to a close the nightmare period during which neither Tory, Liberal nor Labour parties have one success to record for either the present or the future welfare of the British people.

"It has been a period of disaster for the common people and it is the rottenness and decay of capitalism in its epoch of decline which is directly expressed munism with the bogey that it meant bloodshed and violence. These parties have now reached the position where they have nothing to offer but bloodshed and violence in contrast to the programme of peace and life, that is the decisive feature of Communism.

STRUGGLE FOR EMPIRES.

"The extension of the war into an open struggle for new empires or the retention of empires gained exactly by the same methods as those which Hitler is using against Britain, the refusal to state concrete peace aims, the more intensive form of aerial warfare, all of this is not being lost upon large and growing numbers of workers.

"They are seeing that the ruling class is always calling for more and more sacrifices whilst its own privileges and wealth remain unmolested.

What is the difference between the terms of this "rousing" 1940 speech of Pollitt at Dundee, and the "defeatism" pronounced by the Duke of Bedford "among the Bedfordshire countryfolk" in 1943?

What scoundrels these "Communists" are!

In The Word for July, 1943, we traced the history of George L. Matthews, the Bedfordshire Communist Farmer of military age who claims to be a member of the Labour Party through his Trade Union affiliation. We can understand an agricultural labourer belonging to the Labour Party through his Trade Union but since when did farmers, being the employing class, have a right to a say in trade union organisation? His wife, Mrs. Betty Matthews, is District Secretary of the S.E. Midlands Communist Party. Speaking at open-air meeting at Sandy, Bedfordshire, on the night of July 23, 1943, she attacked the Duke of Bedford as if he had been the chief speaker at the Victoria and Regal Cinemas in Dundee, and not Harry Pollitt. Said Mrs. Matthews in true "Communist" beware the bogeyman hushed tones :

We need to be on our guard against those forces which are working at a 24 hour shift to prevent the defeat of Fascism. They are not so far off. We have one right in our midst—The Duke of Bedford who lives in great comfort in a big estate at Woburn. He spends all his time getting out propaganda to weaken the spirit of the people. He has got up more pamphlets against the war than any other person or organisation. He's no friend of the British people and the workers. We are not going to stand for it. Men like the Duke of Bedford ought to be interned.

There is a man who seems to champion the Duke of Bedford—a man who goes under the name of "Woodman" of "The Biggleswade Chronicle and Bedfordshire Gazette." "Woodman" writes things like this: "I believe the Duke of Bedford is really interested in the working classes." Has there been any occasion when we have seen the Duke of Bedford standing up for the working classes? I call "Woodman "the stooge of the Duke of Bedford." It is high time "Woodman" bowed to the feelings of the people in this area; to the fact that Sandy Urban Council passed a resolution asking for the Duke to be interned. People in this district detest the Duke of Bedford. Leighton Buzzard Conservative Association have decided to obliterate his name from their Club—all honour to them. It shows it is not only the Communists who want the Duke of Bedford interned. It shows that there is a wider feeling even among people with a Conservative point of view.

What about the time when people in Bedfordshire detested Socialism? Was that a reason for ceasing from being a Socialist or agreeing with the persecution of Socialists?

How the phoney resolution of the Sandy Urban Council was passed has been exposed in detail in these columns for June, 1943. The Leighton Buzzard Tories were dealt with in the same issue. But what "Communist" propaganda!

The Duke's visits to Lanarkshire, his association with Anarchist and I.L.P. miners, his denunciation of their living and working conditions, answer the aspiring Matthews of this world, who breathe war and experience no hardship. The Duke's condemnations have been reproduced in these columns and need not be reprinted. The following heading and introduction culled from The Illustrated Carpenter, London, for July 16, 1943, answers Mrs. Matthews :—

NOW THIS DUKE KNOWS.

Housing conditions under which miners live in Lanarkshire were condemned by the Duke of Bedford last week. Following a two-day investigation of the conditions of mining communities in the county, the Duke made a statement at a Press interview in Glasgow.

Declaring that his impressions were very mixed, the Duke said that . . .

The very fact that this paper was circulating through the British and especially the English countryside the week before Mrs. Matthews made her speech, and that the Duke's declaration had received widespread circulation in the ordinary press, proves the audacious capacity fo falsehood and misrepresentation possessed by "Communist" propagandists.

By this time only the "Communists" were continuing the abuse that the Duke of Bedford was a Fascist. It has dawned on most journalists, no matter how great their militarism, that the Duke was a very convinced and very sincere Pacifist. The desire was to urge that he was without statesmanship and clear political concept on this account and was useless in war-time. His day was after the war not during it. Writing in The Catholic Times, London, on October 8, 1943, George Glasgow, discussing "A Christian Duty," used the Duke of Bedford to illustrate his concept of the last possible personification of Pacifism :—

Even the Duke of Bedford though, as he had said, he would not lift a finger to defend his property or himself against an invader, would without doubt not stand by and witness an unprovoked aggression upon an innocent and helpless third party.

EVEN! We like that touch!

On November 26, the Daily Worker, London, decorated the Duke's 18B notice of motion in the Lords into a fancy news item, trimmings free :—

DUKE LEADS NEW ATTACK ON 18B.

Daily Worker Reporter.

The Duke of Bedford, notorious advocate of a negotiated peace with Hitler, is to raise the question of 18B detainees in the House of Lords. His motion is, of course, an attack on the Regulation under which the British Fascists have been detained.

The Duke has long been an apologist for Mosley and has defended the Fascist leader's policy. His own detention under 18B has been widely demanded by working-class organisations.

This paragraph shows how well "Communist" journalists have studied and excelled the late Horatio Bottomley.

As to how the bogus "Labour" resolutions are brought about, let us hear the explanation of Herbert Morrison.

At the Annual Dinner of Labour Party Agents in London, held at Gatti's Restaurant, on February 11, 1939—as reported in Forward, for February 18, 1939—Morrison said :—

One of the saddest things about the Communists nowadays is their moral deterioriation.

Not only have they dropped almost every principle which they formerly regarded as essential to revolutionary action, but some of them are guilty (presumably by direction of their own leaders) of personal dishonesties that are distasteful and contemptible.

I am told that Communist Party members, in seeking to become Labour Party members or delegates sign declarations that they are not members of the Communist Party or its ancillary organisations; that others are given "leave of absence," so to speak, from the Communist Party in order that they may do its work within the Labour Party; and that in certain cases people use one name in the Communist Party and another name in the Labour Party.

Before 1943 ended, on the 10th of the last month, the nature-note writer of Spectator, London, under the heading "Alien Blacks" paid a tribute to the Duke :

The Duke of Bedford, one of the best and most accurate of naturalists, kindly answers my query about the black squirrel seen recently . . .

In his letter to the author of these notes, the Duke wrote :—

I have seen black varieties of the red squirrel which have been imported from the Continent.

The Duke's natural history seems to fit into human political experiences. Are not the "Communists" black varieties of the red squirrels imported from the continent—political "alien blacks" so far as Socialism and the Labour Movement are concerned?

On this note we end this review of the press campaign, "Communist" and Imperialist, against the Duke of Bedford. The reader will note the bitterness and the contradictions, and form his own view of the worth of the Duke's Pacifist stand and propaganda, his general witness against war and oppression. To those who want justice and liberty and are not moved by careerist ambition the Duke makes his appeal.

to one side, and viewing the matter from the most orthodox militarist viewpoint, we are convinced that neither Bertolini nor Pacitti ought to remain interned. Their offences consist, purely and simply, of close association with Italian compatriots—a romantic desire to keep language contacts with the country in which their parents were born. Their actual living interests are purely Scottish. On the outbreak of war both young men were unwilling to stand aloof from the conflict against Nazism, and volunteered for service in the Navy. The death of their fathers, who were not Fascists, under such tragic circumstances, embittered them for a while. The families have overcome all bitterness in a horror of the realities of war, and approach the matter from a Christian Pacifist standpoint.

The Pacittis and the Bertolinis are Catholics, and do not share either our religious or political views, although they meet us on the point of Pacifism. We are surprised, however, that the Catholic press and the Catholic priests in Glasgow have not championed these persons in their wrongs. But perhaps the Catholic Church, like the Protestant Church, is too busy being national to be really human and universal. Even priests ought to believe in the common Fatherhood of God, which means the brotherhood and oneness of humanity and, consequently, the outlawry of war and social wrong. We ask the Labour movement to investigate these cases and to enquire why wealthy Anglo-Italian Fascists have been released, while these poor folk remain interned. We trust that it will be unnecessary to return to this matter.

"IT MIGHT HAVE HAPPENED TO YOU."

This work has been noticed in a few independent journals. We shall cite the reviews from time to time, since the subject is one of urgent civil importance.

The Weekly Review, above the initials R. T., published the following commentary :

If only half the statements contained in this formidable indictment of the administrators of Regulation 18b are true it exposes one of the most sinister stories England has yet heard. It is an account, supported by chapter and verse and a wealth of circumstance, of the arrest, methods of interrogation and subsequent treatment of internees. And however little sympathy one may have for the political opinions of some of them, their ereatment as uncharged and unconvicted prisoners indicates that the subtleties of O.G.P.U. and the Gestapo are not altogether foreign to these islands.

The legal position of released men is startling as the Ben Greene and other cases show. Greene was imprisoned for 19 months on a charge of "hostile association" which it was at last discovered by Greene's relatives, had been laid against him by a Mr. Kurtz, an enemy alien employed by the British Secret Service. At the hearing of Greene's legal action against the Home Secretary it was established that no matter whether Kurtz's information was true or false the only question that could materially be considered for judgment was whether the Home Secretary did or did not believe Greene to be guilty. If he did, and even if the evidence to support that was later found to be untrue, he had no right to imprison Greene without trial for as long as he was of the same opinion.

The authors of this document have had the highest courage in publishing it. As a result of it may nothing sudden and unpleasant happen to them.

BRITISH ITALIAN 18B CASES

In his exhaustive speech on Regulation 18B, delivered in the House of Lords, on Tuesday, January 25 last, the Duke of Bedford made reference to the cases of Alberto Pacitti and Gino Bertolini. The Duke said :

In the case of persons of Italian origin, some who were released were definitely interested in political Fascism. I do not mean for a moment to suggest that they harboured any traitorous designs against this country for that reason, but there is no getting away from the fact that they were actively interested in political Fascism. On the other hand there are others known to me who have never been interested in political Fascism and yet who are still detained. I have in mind in particular two Italian families of the name of Pacitti and Bertolini, who are resident in Glasgow. The senior members of these families came to Scotland in their early youth and they and their children, except for appearance, could not be distinguished from ordinary Scottish people. The fathers of the two families were both definitely anti-Fascists, but they were packed off abroad in the "Arandora Star" and both were drowned when the ship was torpedoed.

The sons belonged to an organization called the "Friends of Italy." This organization had for its honorary president Sir Harry Britain who, I believe, has not been interned. Although it had the approval of the Fascist Government of Italy, it is not primarily a Fascist organization, but rather a social and compatriot organization for promoting good understanding between the two countries. The two young men, when they joined it, had not the slightest idea that they were doing anything which would ever be regarded as disloyal, but they are still interned in the Isle of Man. Some time ago Mrs. Pacitti went over there to visit her son and her friends, and, walking long distances from camp to camp, overtaxed her strength and has since become dangerously ill. Pacitti was recently brought before the Advisory Committee and asked whether, if he were released, he would agree to join the Army and go to Italy. He replied that in the early days of the war he would have been quite prepared to defend the country, but since his father's death his whole attitude had become profoundly changed and he could not take part in war in any shape or form. I say that to make a suggestion of that kind to a man in Pacitti's position is to add insult to injury.

Since these words were uttered, the Home Office has regretted, once more, its inability to release either Alberto Pacitti or Gino Bertolinni.

We know these families intimately, and we have known Alberto Pacitti for a number of years, since he used to attend our Socialist meetings at Alexandra Parade. The families are well known to be thoroughly law-abiding families. They are poor and we plead their case, because it is the duty of Socialists to plead for the poor and to oppose oppression. THE HUMANIST FRIENDS' CHALLENGE

By Lowell H. Coate, M.A., Ph.D.

(General Superintendent; The Humanist Society of Friends, U.S.A.)

The Humanist Society of Friends is incorporated under the state laws of California as a "Religious Organization," and as such it is authorised to issue Charters anywhere in the world. It is based and built on the Humanist Proclamation of May 1st, 1933, by more than thirty leading American educators, including such outstanding names as John Dewey, Harry Elmer Barnes, William Floyd and others. This "Humanist Manifesto," as it is usually referred to, features the philosophy of Religious Humanism, with its chief emphasis on Man. In the words of Protagoras: "Man is the measure of all things." In addition to this official Humanist statement, the Humanist Society of Friends has included the idealism expressed in the traditional Quaker emphasis on Peace and Non-Violence, together with a greater emphasis on real Democracy, including International and Interracial Co-operation, Equal Freedom, Civil liberties, Religious Unity, Economic Abundance, and similar ideals which many religious and intellectual movements have neglected.

Religious Humanism is unique in that it has no gods or devils, paradises or perditions, prayers or dogmas, sacred writings or unscientific beliefs. It is known as 'A Scientific Religion for a Scientific Age,' and the sponsors are convinced that if there is to be any religion at all in the future scientific age it is bound to be a scientific religion. As Humanist Friends they are not at all interested in spending their lives in trying to believe about things which they like to believe, or have been taught to believe, when the world is full of a million things they can know about and can scientifically verify to the satisfaction of anyone who cares to inquire or investigate.

Humanist Friends respect everybody's personal beliefs as their own private personal possession, and are glad for them to receive whatever degree of comfort or satisfaction they derive from them, but are not concerned with their beliefs as such, preferring rather to limit their public discussions and considerations to the more abundant life and wealth of scientific evidence, verifiable knowledge, intellectual and cultural arts, greater international and interracial co-operation and the historical emphasis on Peace as a way of life. This is the first time in the entire history of the human race, so far as is known, that anybody has undertaken to make a religion of Science, or rather the Scientific Method—abstract science alone, of course, being merely a tool capable of being used for good or ill, either creatively or destructively. But anything which is both scientific and for the best general welfare is good Humanism. Humanists are satisfied to accept one of Webster's definitions of Religion as "devotion to an ideal or a principle."

Humanism has been referred to as "the only religion of American origin," such churches as Mormons and Christian Scientists being merely variations of the more than 200 different varieties of the Christian religion, worshiping the same orthodox God, using the same sacred Bible and observing the same holy days as other orthodox Christians. Any Indian religions which existed previously had their origin long before this continent was known as America. Religious Humanism as a movement is therefore quite recent as compared to the earlier Classical Humanists such as Socrates, Aristotle and Protagoras, who lived several centuries B.C., or the later Scientific Humanists of more modern times, or even the Religious Society of Friends (better known as Quakers), whose Peace Principles Humanist Friends seek to emulate by including them as an important and essential part of their philosophy and programme. There is, however, no organic connection between the two organisations except by way of mutual co-operation with the American Friends Service Committee, whose impartial relief work and numerous other humanitarian services are known around the world. They are best known everywhere, however, for their Peace Principles and Tradition, which extend back almost 300 years to their founder, George Fox, in England.

The Founder of the Humanist Society of Friends, Dr. Lowell H. Coate, was himself known as a "Birth-right Quaker," both of his parents having been members of the Society of Friends at the time of his birth. He had also served as Pastor of a Friends Church in Indiana prior to coming to California. Dr. Hugh E. Macbeth and Dr. D. Herbert Heywood, also original incorporators of the Humanist Society of Friends, had long cherished the same Peace principles as sponsored by Friends. Dr. Heywood had personally known many of the New England Quakers and had often attended their meetings, while Dr. Macbeth, having been born and reared in Charleston, S.C., and the old South, was thoroughly familiar with the Quakers and their activities in opposing slavery and in conducting the "Underground Railroad' whereby many of his own race and kin were enabled to escape to their freedom in the northern States and to Canada. The Humanist Society of Friends is therefore justly proud of its Quaker background and heritage.

Although they are unable to accept the traditional idea of a personal God such as most orthodox people cherish, Humanist Friends do recognise a great universal Law, or Power, or Force in Life and in Nature which others have often referred to as God or a Supreme Being.

Humanist Friends officially deny that they are either Fundamentalists or Atheists. While the former have never claimed to scientifically prove their idea of an orthodox God, and the latter by the same logic have never disproved it, Humanists simply ignore it as something by the very nature of which nobody can know with the present available information, and are not too proud to admit that there are some things they do not know.

Everybody of every religion or no religion is equally welcome in the Humanist Friends Society, and no one need ever fear that terrible thing called "excommunication," so prevalent among orthodox religions. The very word has been eliminated from the Humanist vocabulary. Everyone is welcome to remain among Humanist Friends so long as he feels he can benefit from their fellowship or has any service or contribution which he can render the Society. They are also proud of the fact that they have no such thing as a "back-slider" among them, for one who is scientifically convinced of a fact does not need to be resold on it once a week for the rest of his life. In fact, they have entirely abandoned all orthodox terminology; they have no preachers, priests, parsons, pastors, deacons, missionaries, bishops, elders or "doctors of divinity." They do have ministers, preferably known as directors, but that is not essentially an orthodox term, for governments as well as religions have ministers, and the word "religion" existed centuries before orthodox Christianity was ever known or heard of. Their organisation is never referred to as a church, but a Society, and their public gatherings are announced as meetings or assemblies, but never as services. They are not in competition with orthodox churches or religions of any kind, for their efforts and interests are in two entirely different worlds: Humanists in the known world, Orthodox in the world of beliefs. Because of this, members of other churches or religions can logically affiliate with Humanist Friends while retaining their former affiliation, if they so desire. But their special appeal in America is to its 60 per cent. of population who are not affiliated with any church or redigion of any kind.

Rather than a divisive movement, as some have thought, Humanism actually supplies the only possible foundation for religious unity, for it is these never-ending personal and controversial beliefs, which nobody could possibly prove if his life depended on it, which have created the "thousand and one" variations and interpretations of the Christian religion in the world to-day, to say nothing of numerous other historical religions. By eliminating these divisive and controversial beliefs and limiting its considerations to the known facts of modern science, the Humanist movement definitely supplies the only real basis for such religious unity. Humanists are therefore neither Protestant nor Catholic, Jewish nor Christian—they are Humanists. ALL human beings, including every race, creed, colour and economic status, constitute one great human family, all of whom are automatically included in the fellowship of the Humanist Society of Friends.

Humanist Friends sponsor a definite programme for greater International and Interracial tolerance, goodwill and co-operation. To this end they propose doing socially, economically and religiously what practically all public schools throughout the State of California and most other States are already doing educationally; that is, giving equal opportunity, recognition and consideration to ALL, regardless of race, creed, colour or economic status. This is Democracy in Action. There is no such thing as Humanist Friends North and Humanist Friends South; they are, in fact, about the only religion without such national, racial and hemispheric differences, divisions and distinctions. They are one happy "Human Family" and may find it one of the great joys of their lives to share in this new friendly Humanist attitude and atmosphere. A programme of greater economic co-operation is also emphasised, whereby people are able to "solve their economic problems by economic methods."

It was Victor Hugo who once said that "the most powerful thing in the world is an idea whose time has come,' and if anyone is inclined to be sceptical of this statement let him be reminded of the fact that within the past decade, since the first World War, approximately two-thirds of Europe has abandoned its orthodox religion.

It is a characteristic of religions that they collapse and disappear along with the passing of the political and economic systems which they support, as history so abundantly testifies. This was true of the ancient religions of the old Egyptian empire, and later of the Babylonian kingdom, and still more recently of Pagan Greece and Rome. People simply decline to continue their devotion and respect to gods who seem to forsake them in their wars and times of greatest crisis and distress. It is this process which has recently occurred throughout much of Europe during and since World War I, as a result of which millions of Europe's populations have suffered the untold agonies of defeat, humiliation and despair. They are therefore abandoning the God who has so sadly "let them down."

It was the late Lord Morley of England who asserted that "the next great task of Science is the building of a new religion," perhaps in anticipation of these present days of world tribulation. For certainly there could never have been a scientific religion prior to this generation, for there was never a scientific age prior to this. Most of those who object to using the term 'religion" often base their objections chiefly on their dislike for the orthodox Christian religion, forgetting that there were numerous other religions centuries before the Christian era. These same objectors to the word "religion" do not seem to cherish the same aversion when applied to the Pagan Religion, which was no less a religion than the others.

Humanists have every reason to be proud of their moral and spiritual forbears, including among the Founding Fathers of America such men as Thomas Jefferson Thomas Paine and Benjamin Franklin; and later such outstanding men as Abraham Lincoln, Elbert Hubbard and Thomas A. Edison; and such contemporary scientists and educators as John Dewey, Harry Elmer Barnes, Oliver L. Reiser and Albert Einstein. No movement ever had greater representatives than these.

There is only one genuinely new religion evolved in about every 1,000 years on the average, and Humanist Friends enjoy a justifiable pride and a certain sense of destiny in having an active and personal part in this new scientific religion. Everyone participating in it feels that he is sharing in an important movement that is destined to make significant history, and that he is one of the actors in this great drama of building a New Religion for a New World.

Here is a remarkable opportunity for adventurous youth, for college students and for those who love to pioneer, for pioneering in the old sense of the "frontier days" has gone forever, but here are new intellectual frontiers which offer an unprecedented challenge worthy of the very finest courage, the greatest endeavour, the keenest intelligence, the strongest character, the most consuming ambition and the highest type of human service.

It is greater than the challenge of Freedom, for which more wars have been fought than for any other one thing, for Humanism is more than Freedom. It is greater than the challenge of Democracy, for which another war is now ostensibly being fought, for Humanism is more than Democracy. It is evengreater than the challenge of Peace, which is the ultimate goal of all wars, for it is more than Peace. Any peace, even world peace, on any other basis than equal freedom and economic justice is merely a truce between two wars. Humanism is therefore more than any one of these great ideals, for it includes all of them. A thousand wars have been fought during the past ten thousand years for the achievement of these human goals, but Humanism and its peaceful Educational Programme gives promise of them ALL. No greater challenge of any kind has ever come to human beings in any age. It heralds the dawning of a new day and the coming of a new world, as seen by one of the greatest Humanists that ever lived, Robert Ingersoll:

A vision of the future rises. . . .

I see a world without a slave. Man at last is free. Nature's forces have by science been enslaved. Lightning and light, wind and wave, frost and flame, and all the secret subtle powers of the earth and air are tireless toilers for the human race.

I see a world at peace, adorned with every form of art, with music's myriad voices thrilled, while lips are rich with words of love and truth; a world in which no exile sighs, no prisoner mourns; a world on which the gibbet's shadow does not fall; a world where labour reaps its full reward, where work and worth go hand in hand, where the poor girl, trying to win bread with a needle . . . is not driven to the desperate choice of crime or death, of suicide or shame.

I see a world without the beggar's outstretched palm, the miser's heartless, stony stare, the piteous wail of want, the livid lips of lies, the cruel eyes of scorn.

I see a race without disease of flesh or brain—shapely and fair, married harmony of forms and function, and, as I look life lengthens, joy deepens, love canopies the earth; and over all in the great dome shines the eternal star of human hope.

PACIFISM A CENTURY AGO

By MAURICE CRANSTON

"Principles of Peace and Non-resistance" were being busily propagated in this country a hundred years ago. The word "pacifism", had not yet come into our language, but the idea existed, and there was quite an influential movement in being to further it. The 1840's appear to have been something of a boom period for peace activities, in spite of famine and political unrest. Edwin Paxton Hood, an extreme "pacifist" wrote in 1846 that his literary activities had been delayed by "circumstances of an interesting nature in connection with Peace Principles, and of a more imperative nature."

These circumstances of a more imperative nature, so far as Hood was concerned, were repeated visits to public houses in the wake of recruiting sergeants, where he was "prepared with the ammunition of tracts and tongue to meet unthinking cruelty and fraud . . . to prevent enlistments in the army . . . and to advocate Total Abstinence." Hood carried his propaganda further than the Sedition Law permits the pacifist of to-day, and actually effected several soldiers' "salvation from the army."

In intellectual circles the principles of peace and international goodwill were being constantly canvassed. Carlyle had discerned a tendency towards a universal European commonweal, and thought that wars would become rarer, less inhuman, and in the course of centuries . . . become obsolete for ever. Leigh Hunt had refuted the notion that nations would grow cowardly without war. Wordsworth had eliminated from one of his poems a suggestion that war was an element in human progress. Lord Kames, now completely forgotten, but once a most celebrated apologist for war, was held in progressively less esteem by thinking people. Against such a background of moderate peace sentiment, the extreme pacifist teaching of the Peace Society reached an ever-widening audience. The implications of non-resistance were as clearly apprehended then as now, although there was not much understanding of the actual causes of war. Tariffs and Drink were seriously held by certain pacifists to be the root causes, and none seemed to see anything but good in the influence of Commerce.

Some research into the history and economies of wars was undertaken around this time, and is still of interest. The Newcastle "Peace Advocate and Correspondent" revealed that in the years between 1811 and 1842 the Duke of Wellington had received £2,258, 365 in British Army pay and grants alone, while an Infantryman wrote to the "Naval and Military Gazette" (Oct. 3, 1842) that a private soldier's small share of prize money was seldom received in time to buy his coffin. In a paper called "Statistics of Peace and War" read to the Peace Convention of 1843, John Allen revealed that: "According to the recent publication, showing the extent, population, revenue and debt, of the principle states of Europe for 1829, the debt of Russia was £35,550,000; of Austria, £78,100,000; of France, £194,400,000; of Spain, £70,000,000; of Netherlands, including Belgium, £148,000,000; of Prussia, £29.701,000; of Great Britain, £819,600,000." A contemporary, Mr. Abeel, wrote: "I shall examine the position in which Britain finds herself after trying the fortune of war for so long a period; and see whether she has been the gainer after all her exertions. We would suppose that she would at least have increased her riches and resources, in such protracted struggles; that she would have counted the cost, like the man in the scripture, before she went on her warfare; but so far from being the case, in 1835, her debt amounted to 778 millions of pounds, and the interest of this, with the terminable annuities, amounted to the sum of 28½ millions. Charles II commenced the national debt to support his extravagances. At the abdication of James II it amounted to more than half a million. At the Peace of Ryswyck, the eight years of King William's war increased the debt to 21½ millions. In the still more foolish wars in which George II engaged in respecting the Austrian succession, the debt was increased to 78 millions; and in the war for the distant colony of Novia Scotia, there was added 68½ millions, making 146½ millions. In the American war 103 millions was added, and in 1789, the debt arose of 234 millions, though several millions were paid off . . . at the overthrow of Napoleon it had increased to 865 millions; and all this was exclusive of the vast revenues of the country, which, at one period, amounted to 70 millions annually."

Pacifist propaganda abounded in such statistics. The following figures, culled from the "Paris Advertiser" of 1836, were widely circulated by the Peace Society:—

It is estimated that in the last 4,000 years 6,860,000,000 of the human race have perished on the field of battle, or have been slaughtered in the sacking of cities. At this rate, in 4,000 years, of 1,715,000 per annum, or seven times the present number of the human species." Dr. Dick, a theologian and peace-propagandist, in his "Philosophy of Religion," put the total number of persons killed in wars since the beginning of the world at 14 thousand millions.

Evidence was collected of instances where non-resistance had effectively been employed against a threat of violence. A book by an American writer, Mrs. Child, called "Letters from New York," and published, I believe, in 1840, gives quite as weighty historical support for non-violence as any modern author, including Gregg. And Paxton Hood's "Encyclopaedia of Peace," published in 1846, is not far behind Huxley's "Encyclopaedia of Pacifism," published in 1937.

One of the most energetic anti-militarists of the time was John Pye Smith. "The bewitching array of the military system," he declared, "covers a dark and unfathomable pit of crime and misery." Lord Brougham was even more forthright. He said at one Liverpool meeting: "15 millions have been squandered on cruelty and crime, in naturalising barbarism over the world, shrouding the nations in darkness, making bloodshed tinge the earth of every country under the sun;—in one horrid and comprehensive word, squandered on War; the greatest curse of the human race, and the greatest crime, because it involves every other crime within its execrable name, and all with the wretched—I thank God I may now say the utterly frustrated . . . utterly vain attempt to crush the liberties of the people."

There is a message at the end of Paxton Hood's Encyclopadeia which is worth conveying to the pacifist to-day: "The friends of Peace have a sacred work to perform for posterity; if war be an evil (and who can doubt it) then most obviously it becomes their duty to labour on—with earnest hearts, in secret, it may be; in silence, it may be; it becomes their duty still heartily and earnestly to labour on against all the mockery, the tinsel, frippery, and the tapestry of feudalism; against every sceptre wielded by the hands of injustice; against all the usurpations which men have made on life, and conscience and liberty; against every power based on oppression and fraud; against all these the Friends of Peace will array themselves with no weapon stronger than truth."

THE FIGHTING PARSON.

Let us honour the militant parson,
An asset to church and to state,
Who can prove to their joint satisfaction
That when Christ bids us "Love" he means "Hate."

Who can show that destruction and fury
And death that screams down from above,
Are works to the honour and glory
Of the God of forgiveness and love.

Let us honour the militant parson,
And trust he will reap his reward,
When his days, and his war work, are ended.
And he comes to account to his Lord.

JOHN MACLEAN

The comrade who lent us the original photo last December wrote at the time:—

On passing your shop recently, I noticed the picture of John Maclean, and wondered if the quite well preserved photo of him, taken with his school class before he made his great stand against war, would be of any interest to you. One of the pupils, as you will be able to recognise, is Councillor Mrs. Jean Mann.

Your picture of him made me turn to this photo, and brought back memories of Kinning Park School, otherwise called Brodie's School. Mr. Brodie was, at that time, the very much liked headmaster. Daddy McIntyre was head teacher, a little wiry man, sharp, but efficient. John McLean came next, but I think he left the school and then plunged into the political adventures which resulted in his death. I was quite small then and cannot remember all the details. I only got into the photo because the younger members of the family were allowed into the same photo as the older members to save buying numerous photos.

I well remember the older pupils in awed tones telling each other about him having been seen speaking at a meeting at such and such a street corner, and having said something or other which seemed remarkable. I am afraid that, to me,a quiet little girl, he was a very mysterious person whose ideas and meetings were not quite the same as the other grown ups.

JOHN MACLEAN AND HIS KINNING PARK CLASS.

This rare and hitherto unpublished picture of John Maclean and his pupils at Kinning Park School, Glasgow, will be appreciated by many comrades who recall the memory of our great Socialist Anti-Militarist

THE SOCIALIST UNITED STATES OF EUROPE

BY MATT KAVANAGH

The coming collapse of the present regime is apparent to all. Even the most purblind and stupid of mortals is awake to this obvious fact. "What will come out of it all," meaning the present absurd destruction rejoiced in by statesmen and militarists, is the anxious question that disturbs men and women wherever they congregate at the present time, irrespective of religion, politics, or any other alienism. It is the social-economic question, the one thought of the present total-crisis. Consequently we are being inundated by those in power with all sorts of wierd schemes, gilded pills to avert social earthquakes. The new world planners more and more succeed in proving the truth of Tolstoy's words: "The ruling classes will do anything for Labour except get off its back."

The new-world planning of the political parties, new and old, matters little in itself, for the planners are without sincerity. It is not a new world of peace and order that they would inaugurate. It is the old world, only with its powers of destruction intensified, its menace to humanity magnified a thousand-fold, that they would perpetuate. The promises, platitudes, and activities of these people are merely straws showing which way the social wind blows. Reaction plays at reformism to stave off revolution. The more determined the workers are to take action, the more earnest their opposition to post-war conscription and hunger-marching, the more lavish the promises of the politicians and the careerists. It is the case of the carrot and the donkey once again. A brave new world was promised at the conclusion of the First World War. During that war, Socialist meetings were rushed and speakers assaulted because they reminded the audiences of the fate of the heroes of the Boer War. Time showed that they spoke the truth, and the ex-Servicemen once more paraded their wounds for charity. The brave new world went into cold storage for the duration of the peace interlude. Now it is served up again, partly by "Socialist" (sic) politicians who made their names seeming to oppose the First World War. These men were never Socialists: merely careerists marking-time and preparing for their opportunity. Thomas Johnston! Lord Ammon! Herbert Morrison!

Honest, but simple folk, forgetting the story of the two Labour Governments, still believe that there is some political alchemy in Labour being in the Government. This belief exists in spite of the evidence which has been accumulated in every country of how the workers' movement and struggle has been side-tracked into the political morass. The study of the Social Democratic movement in Germany, and how it betrayed the workers until Nazism came to flourish, is an outstanding illustration of the parliamentary evil of Socialist careerism. This betrayal certainly contributed to the tragedy of the present world-war. Even now, the historic lesson notwithstanding, Socialism is very much in the background It cannot be otherwise because the Labour Leaders are concerned, not with the social struggle, but how they may gain power through the parliamentary machine, to administer that which they know is a false economic system. They have no desire to change it or to remove it nearer to the heart's desire. They wish to flourish under it, to conserve it.

Some of these Labour politicians have not quite made up their minds how to define their objective. They are afraid to give up the use of the catch-phrase, "Socialism in our time": it sounds such a promising mouthful; yet "Adequate Old-Age Pensions" seems a more certain and attractive objective. It may be the better carrot. Each seems to possess some merit as a slogan with which to deceive the common people. And in the eyes of statesmen, avowedly capitalist or nominally Socialist, the common people exist only to be deceived. Of such are the planners of the brave new world! What vulgar outrage on the decency of mankind!

The political deception of the careerists is not satisfied with its choice of slogans. The careerist is never comfortable within himself because he is conscious always of his Socialist beginnings which his climbing has negated steadily without destroying his power of looking back. He would appeal to the idealistic and genuine revolutionary section of the working-class. He would address this section in terms recalling the enthusiasm of his youth, with a slogan less vague and more potent than an undefined "Socialism in our time," and more romantic and less drab than pensions, especially since he knows how inadequate such pensions must be when achieved. They will be ceded in very small instalments. Consequently, the workers are treated to the pleasing legend-cry of "The Socialist United States of Europe." This phrase can never prove anything but a slogan, used in a vain endeavour to found yet another International.

"Socialist" politicians ignore the fact that the law of unequal development applies as much in sociology as in biology. Countries are similar, not identical, in their characteristics and development. In this respect, they resemble individuals. To blandly ignore this fact and speak of "The Socialist United States of Europe" is not Socialism but ignorance. It is parliamentarianism but not social usefulness. And it ignores the function of the people.

The victorious Powers may do what they will with the checker-board of Europe. Frontiers may be varied or abolished. It will be of no final importance. In the end, the common people will assert themselves in every country. Sooner or later, they will decide. Politicians and statesmen will pass. The last word will be with the people. The will of the people will decree the social reality.

The would-be rulers of civilisation entertain the absurd theory that the peak-point of civilisation is to be found only in the highly developed industrial countries. Leisure is ruled out as something vicious. Life is all work, tireless energy, constant movement. No repose. Any form of civilisation that does not organise social life on some belief that we live to work is ruled out, not merely as something different, but as something inferior and evil. The aim of our Imperialists is to build up Wigans and Bethnal Greens in China, Africa, and Arcadia itself. To do this would be to elevate the natives of these forsaken lands, or the inhabitants of Utopia, to the very acme of Christian and scientific culture. This ideal so impresses the leaders of Western Civilisation that the thought of it reconciles Christian and Atheist and unites them in a common brotherhood of efficiency. What a dream!

Turning from the map of the world to the much smaller one of Europe, the social thinker should see that the line of development in the different countries must vary. We have seen, in our time, how reality turned two revolutions from political revolutions into social revolutions. Both of these epoch-making events went contrary to the metaphysical dogmas of the self-styled "Scientific Socialists." Russia and Spain were almost purely agrarian countries. They had behind them the record of a splendid revolutionary struggle and a tradition of primitive but practical Communism. The heroes and heroines of this struggle and tradition belonged to the working class. Because of this record and tradition, the expropriation of the parasite class was not the negation of their civilisation, but its logical fulfilment. Departure from the first principles of this social development led to the betrayal of the Russian Revolution. The Russian Revolution failed, as every revolution must fail that ignores its own historical promise. In the end, it negated itself and not the old social order out of which it arose. It became the Russian Counter-Revolution.

It is strange to reflect how our "Scientific Socialists" have played with the idea of uniform social evolution everywhere; no hills nor dales, no mountain scenery, no real social landscape. Just a dead flatness of wearisome uniformity. What a revelation of their own deadly mediocrity! What an indictment of the parliamentary careerism. Speech without inspiration, just chatter and stalemate. "Uniform evolution" is an idea that can be left to these arm-chair theoreticians and political professionals, divorced from actual social life. Not only each country, but maybe even each locality, will adopt some peculiarity in its mode of life when the social change comes. Everywhere will arise that form of living which suits the people best, based on experience. Life will not be created by decrees according to the theories of the abstractionist parasites who would be the law-makers. Anarchists are right when they insist on the need for liberty and declare that real union of living is found in diversity of expression, not in regimentation of existence, and uniformity of speech and action. Dictatorship is an evil, whether it is termed Socialist Dictatorship, or admitted to be Fascist.

"The Socialist United States of Europe" does not sound too Libertarian, although a federation of Socialist communities could be completely libertarian. The First International ended in a Marxian conspiracy of expulsion against Bakunin and the Anarchists. The Second International expelled Anarchists and repudiated the social struggle despite the protests of Kier Hardie and Tom Mann. It ended in a reformist debacle and chauvinism. The Third International organised the destruction of Anarchists and then destroyed the old Bolsheviks and the Trotskyists. Finally, it destroyed itself in the interests of State Capitalist Imperialism. The idea of existing European States, or, if you like, world States, being administered by a Council of the International, no matter how allegedly proletarian it is, and no matter whether it is a 4th or 14 th International, is opposed to the first principle of natural liberty and self-determination, and savours more of Fascism than of Socialism. It is the pass to which conventional Socialism has brought itself in its servitude to militarist society.

Real, material progress, must come from the people themselves, from within the individual himself; and from within the social life of the individuals living together in society. It must be expressed in deeds, in practical living, social experiment, vital struggle and evolution. It must rise from the bottom dogs in society and not be imposed by Parliaments, or Dictatorships, whether Communist or Fascist.

War is forcing the lessons of liberty and social reality on the workers to-day as never before. Events are proving the true schoolmasters. From amid the anguish and suffering of destruction the new world is struggling to birth. Let us see that it is a world nurtured in liberty and not authority; a world in which all peoples will realise that only where there is an equality of right to well-being can there be a fraternity of interest; and that such equality can be enjoyed and such fraternity maintained only through the common enjoyment of liberty. It must be a world without fear.

OPEN FORUM ADDRESS.

"THE LOGIC OF ANTI-CONSCRIPTION."

Mr. Wm. C. McDougall, Glasgow, addressed an open forum meeting in Lesser Town Hall, Motherwell, on Sunday evening.

Mr. W. E. Currie, presiding, referred to the splendid service rendered by Mr. McDougall as chairman of the No Conscription League. Mr. Currie recalled the meetings and demonstrations held in Motherwell some four and a half years ago, protesting against the introduction of conscription. At that time a petition launched by the Scottish T.U.C. against conscription was taken up by the local Trades and Labour Council and widely signed throughout the district. To-day many of those who previously opposed that measure now accepted it without protest, while another section which at that time denounced the war as an imperialist war now called for a second front.

IMPRISONED DURING LAST WAR.

Although having served a term of imprisonment during the last war, Mr. McDougall still remained true to his principles, and to-day maintained his opposition to conscription and war with the same courage and fearlessness as in the years 1914-18.

Taking as his subject "The Logic of Anti-Conscription," the speaker dealt in turn with military conscription and industrial conscription. He pointed out that while many people opposed conscription in any shape or form they failed to realise that so long as the present system remained all their protests would be in vain. It was only logical, therefore, that in opposing conscription they should protest against the system which imposed such measures. Mr. McDougall reminded his hearers of the terrible suffering and years of unemployment at the end of the last war and issued a warning of a far greater catastrophe which may befall the common people as a result of the present struggle.

NEED FOR NEW SOCIAL ORDER.

He called for the overthrow of the capitalist system with its long record of wars in almost every part of the globe and stressed the need for a new social order that would banish war for all time and bring peace and security to the peoples of all countries.

At the close of the address a period was allowed for questions and discussions. Full advantage was taken of this opportunity and the speaker showed exceptional capabilities in dealing with the points raised.

THE LADY OF THE QUAB

Under this interesting heading, "The Monmouthshire Beacon," for Friday, September 3, 1943, published an interesting appreciation of the then recently deceased Miss Thirza Wakley and recorded the radical contribution to progress of the famous Wakley family

We make the following excerpt from our contemporary's tribute:—

Miss Thirza Wakley who died as the result of burns at The Quab, her Welsh Newton home, was a lady of outstanding personality who held decided views on child education. Headmistress of one of the largest infants' schools in the City of Cardiff, she gave up her post rather than submit to methods which she considered were not in the best interests of the children. Now after a lapse of 20 years most of her suggested reforms are included in the new Education Bill. . . . T.W. was a doughty warrior, championing the cause of reform in the education of the young child; and throughout the contest she never questioned for a moment but that her theories on Child Education would be put into practice.

In her enthusiasm for the welfare of the child, T.W. could see no obstacles. She needed more teachers (or "educators" as she persisted in calling the members of her staff). To her every child was a "person" and needed individual attention. Mass education was anathema to her and she wished every child in the land to have the opportunities afforded at Eton! No wonder her views seemed visionary! They were—twenty years ago! And yet Mr. Butler's New Education Bill practically incorporates them all!

Miss Wakley was a member of the Wakley family so closely associated with the medical journal, "The Lancet." The founder and first editor of that paper was her grand-uncle; and the editorship remained in the family until 1909 (nearly 90 years!) when Thomas Wakeley III died.

There are some curious parallels in her lifework and that of Thomas Wakley I, and one is tempted to think that something of his crusading spirit was reincarnated in his grand-niece. Thomas Wakley, while a medical student at a London Hospital noted conditions at variance with his ideas of justice. He found that money and not merit was a means of obtaining high places in the profession. There was overcrowding of medical classes for students owing to the insufficiency of schools of medicine. To get arguments for reform in front of the reading public, he founded "The Lancet," and after the passing of the Reform Bill he entered Parliament as the Member for Finsbury. His paper became the duelling ground for encounters between the Editor and the members of the privileged classes in medicine, and his Parliamentary work was devoted to supporting the claims for the amelioration of the conditions of the poor. His work bore fruit in the Medical Reform Bill of 1858, and the evidence given before the Committe of Inquiry confirmed what he had been saying in "The Lancet" for 10 years.

How many of our historians mention the name of Thomas Wakley? Most pass him over in silence; but, strange to say, a book entitled "Carlile and the Surgeons," by Chas. Wortham Brook, published recently by the Strickland Press, Glasgow, pays tribute to his work as a fierce Parliamentary champion of the people against an oppressive Poor Law.

All who are interested in the record of the Wakley family, and especially the work of Thomas Wakley, should secure a copy of Dr. Brook's magnificent factual study direct from this office, post-free, 2s. 3d.

EX-BAILIE HUNTER.

Councillor William G. Hunter, Socialist representative for Calton Ward in Glasgow Corporation, died on Friday March 17 in Stobhill Hospital, where he had been ill for a long time. He was 87. Ex-Bailie Hunter was the oldest member of the Glasgow Corporation.

Hunter became a parish councillor in 1909. He was elected a member of the Corporation in 1920 and continuously represented Calton Ward from that date until the day of his death.

For more than 30 years he was associated with the Operative Bakers' Union, latterly becoming general secretary, a post from which he retired 16 years ago. He was a member of the Glasgow Burgh Insurance Committee and of Bridgeton Old Age Pensions Committee.

On July 8, 1928, Hunter, sitting as a Bailie, sent a youth named Edward Reilly to prison for 10 days for alleged contempt of court. We reported the trial at length and denounced Hunter's behaviour on the bench in our paper, "The Commune," for July, 1928, 2nd series, Vol. II, No. 11, page 236. It is strange how parliamentary "Socialists" can stand on their dignity under the capitalist system and so rarely stand for the rights of the workers under and against that system. Irresponsible sentence for alleged contempt of court by a sitting judge or magistrate is an abuse of the law.

RELIGION AND WAR

A Reply to C. H. Norman

By the DUKE of BEDFORD

Mr. C. H. Norman's article on "Religion and War," though written from a Rationalist viewpoint which I do not share, raises some interesting questions. Personally I should say that the average Englishman's belief in a future existence is, like his religion, far too vague and far too little a real part of his life and philosophy to give him that encouragement in war and battle which we may suppose animated the Viking who felt assured of an immediate entrance into Valhalla if he died bravely.

With the exception of the tiny minority of truly religious men who are mistaken enough to suppose that participation in war is compatible with Christianity, soldiers in action are apt to find comfort, not in belief in a future life but in the feeling that death may strike the other fellow and spare them. In the last war a curious fatalism was also extremely common and brought some comfort, finding expression in the idea that if your number was not on the shell or bullet it would not get you.

The failure of the church to equip the majority of its nominal lay members with a living and intelligent faith is, I think, mainly due to two things. First, the neglect of ministers to fulfil the duty to seek and save that which is lost, i.e. to win, convert and redeem really difficult and disappointing people. Had they attempted this task more zealously they would probably have achieved an understanding of human nature which would have rendered them more immune to war propaganda and preserved them from bringing the whole Christian faith into disrepute by their ridiculous condoning of the sin of war.

Second, the failure of ministers to realize that the Bible is a profoundly unintelligible book to the ordinary person, whether he be good or bad. This failure resulted in a neglect to improve their methods of teaching so that those for whose religious instruction they were responsible did at least understand what Christianity involves and means, whether they chose to become real Christians or not.

Like Mr. Norman I am suspicious of the evidence of a future life which Spiritualists claim to provide, holding that most of it is charlatanism or self-deception and that any small percentage which may relate to genuine phenomena is probably of evil origin. My low opinion of Spiritualism is based on the poor, or bad, results which its practice has produced on the characters of persons known to me, including those who have claimed to recognize the existence of both good and evil forces and to have been careful to establish contact only with the former.

With regard to the future life itself any honest Christian believer will of course admit that our knowledge of what may be termed "important minor details" is very limited.

Apart, however, from what one may be called the "scientific" difficulty of seeing how, in a world where things are brought to an end by separation of the parts, the mind or personality, which seems to have no parts separable like those of the body, can be brought to an end by the mere fact of physical death, non-belief in immortality seems to many of us to involve more tremendous difficulties than belief.

For example it would involve the acceptance of the idea that Christ was mistaken; or that those who first died for the Christian faith and belief in the Resurrection, died for what they knew to be an invention and persuaded other men of alien race to die and suffer persecution and social ostracism for the same delusion.

Also, in a universe where there is so much that the intelligent human mind can find orderly and intelligible and where evolution shows the development of the beautiful from the plain; the complex from the simple; the thinking from that which is incapable of thought; and the loving from that which is incapable of love, it would involve belief that no Christlike God exists as the guiding Intelligence and motive Power, although such a God fits into the "picture" so perfectly and explains so much, including what in these days is so prominent a feature—the problem of evil.

DUKE'S WAR AIMS' SPEECH

The Duke of Bedford made his seventh speech in the House of Lords on Wednesday, March 8. The press report of the reception accorded to that speech, one of the most eloquent indictments of war, and the forces that make for war, ever delivered in either House of Parliament, condemns those who support war and not the Duke of Bedford for examining so completely the crime of war.

We quote from some of the press reports published the following day:—

The Daily Mail, London, published this report:

THE DUKE SAT ALONE.

Speech Clears House.

The Duke of Bedford, who is a Christian pacifist, spoke on war aims yesterday to a rapidly dwindling House of Lords. By the time Lord Bruntisfield replied for the Government only six peers remained.

As Lord Bruntisfield delivered a sharp Government rebuke the Duke sat alone amid tiers of empty opposition benches and heard his own speech described as based on false suppositions and verging "upon the impudent and even upon the subversive."

The Overseas Daily Mail for March 18 carried the same report beneath the heading:

THE DUKE CLEARED THE HOUSE

The Aberdeen Press and Journal carried:

PACIFIST DUKE REBUKED

The Newcastle Daily Journal headed its parliamentary report:

TWO PEERS REBUKED IN THE LORDS

We excerpt a few telling sentences from this report:

Government spokesmen administered strong rebukes to the Earl of Mansfield and the Duke of Bedford in the House of Lords to-day.

When the Duke of Bedford rose to speak the House emptied with the exception of seven peers in addition to himself, and of those three left when Lord Bruntisfield got up to reply.

The Duke declared that we went into this war to get rid of Fascism, but Fascism was now firmly established in this country.

The Northern Echo, Darlington, gave a double heading to its report:—

THE LONELY DUKE OF BEDFORD

Only Six Peers Remained in House

The Daily Express, London, headed its report:

THE LONELY DUKE.

The report was much the same as that published in the Mail, but there was a small addition to the report:—

The pacifist Duke of Bedford spoke to a rapidly-dwindling audience in the Lords yesterday. . . .

A few weeks ago Viscount Simon, the Lord Chancellor, suggested that he had a capacity "to swallow any yarn which supported his jaundiced views." ...

The Birmingham Gazette employed the same heading as the Express, and also carried the addition about Lord Simon, with the introductory remark:

This was the second recent criticism of the Duke by a Government spokesman . . . .

The Daily Mirror, London, made a box of its report and placed the heading at the side in striking black type:—

DUKE, A PACIFIST, EMPTIES HOUSE.

The Manchester Daily Dispatch reported beneath the heading:

PEER SAYS DUKE WAS IMPUDENT

The Daily Telegraph, London, headed its account:

PACIFIST DUKE AUDIENCE OF SIX

The Times, London, preserved its dignity and published a fair report.

The Liverpool Post summary was the most enlightening. Here it is in full:—

DUKE CRITIC OF MARSHAL STALIN

Lord Bruntisfield, replying for the Government in the House of Lords yesterday to a speech on war aims by the Pacifist Duke of Bedford, suggested that it verged upon the subversive."

The Duke had described conscription and other war-time powers in Britain as Fascism, and criticised Marshal Stalin for "not feeling scrupulous about the rights of small nations."

The new sedition! To criticise Marshal Stalin in Britain!

And the Daily Record, Glasgow, headed its report:

IMPUDENT DUKE

Cydeside Socialists will recall what this paper has said in the past about the workers when they were on strike against the intolerable misery of peace-time prosperity—the aftermath of the first Great War, and prelude to the second.

And what did the Duke say? He indicted "that human vulture Zaharoff" and concluded his speech by asking: "Cannot a new torch be lit and this nightmare ended?"

Now the working class know that only seven peers listened through the Duke's speech. But his speech is circulating in pamphlet form and will be read by the common people, to whom the Duke was addressing himself. One day these people will have something to say to the war-mongers who, like the Bourbons, forget nothing because they learn nothing. History and experience has no meaning to them. But history does inform the workers of the part played by the House of Peers in the past social struggle.

How can we ensure the triumph of what is best over what is worse? Will the pursuit of military victory lead to this end? PEACE BY NEGOTIATION

Effects of Victory

Can Europe be freed from these fruits of the war by the military victory of the United Nations? What hope of regeneration is there in the determination to prolong the war until the Axis Powers surrender unconditionally? No one imagines that victory can be achieved without further immense slaughter. It is acknowledged that there can be no hope of victory without a large scale invasion of Europe when the colossal slaughter of Eastern Europe will be repeated in the West. And if, when all this human suffering has been endured, when morality has sunk to still lower depths, victory is attained, what then?

The victory of 1918 provides an answer. There were at that time one or two statesmen with a much wider vision than any at the present time, men who had some inkling of how a repetition of the war could be avoided. Yet victory released emotional forces which they were powerless to control, and the seeds of this war were sown in the Treaty of Versailles and in the subsequent treatment of the ex-enemy countries.

Is there any indication that the same forces will not again be released should victory once more be achieved? Official intentions seem to show that, after victory, the same road will be followed as before. We are told that the four great powers, the United States, the British Empire, Russia and China, must dominate the world, just as Britain and France tried to use the League of Nations to establish their hegemony in Europe. We are assured that conscription will continue in this country and that the cost of defence will be on a higher level than before the war, though it is not stated against whom there is to be this defence.

Victory in the last war condemned the young men of this generation to death. Have we any assurance that victory in this war will not condemn the next generation to the same fate?

The Alternative

If there were no alternative to what is called a " fight to a finish " the outlook for Europe and the world would indeed be black. But there is an alternative. The foundations of peace can be laid if the war is ended by negotiaton, leading to a treaty not imposed by one side on the other but, imperfect as it certainly will be, accepted by all. We can start laying the foundations now.

Has the Society of Friends, out of the richness of its experience and the strength of its faith, no message to give to the world on this immediate situation? Does not the testimony we hold lay upon us the responsibility of showing men that the peace they so ardently desire can be won only by negotiation? At present they can see no way out of the mess they are in except the way of destruction and bloodshed. Have we been infected by war propaganda to the extent of thinking that our ministry of reconciliation can best be postponed until victory has been won? If the conditions in Europe to-day—starvation, persecution, oppression—had developed by means other than war, we should not suggest going to war to improve them. That would be a total denial of all we hold to be true. How then can we condone a war supposedly waged for the same purpose?

Ultimate Purpose and Immediate Task

To speak clearly on this immediate problem of stopping the war does not relegate into the background our ultimate purpose. We know as George Fox knew, whence wars came. We know that in our own hearts there are thoughts and desires akin to the spirit of war, but we also know that, with all our imperfections, we have a message to proclaim which if accepted will abolish all war.

There are some who think that we must first and foremost in season and out of season, deliver this message in all its fullness, calling to men to come out of that vain belief and into that spirit which alone is the secret of " Thy saving health among all nations." We agree, but this cannot be regarded as an alternative to facing the immediate problems of the day, much less as a reason for postponing the application of our peace testimony to what we might regard as more propitious times. Worship rightly used as a means of strengthening us to face the problems of life here and now is the very heart of Christianity, but worship used as a means of withdrawal from life become mere escapism.

We are convinced that the healing message which will bring regeneration to mankind contains within it an urgent call to face the immediate problem of this war by endeavouring to bring it to a speedy conclusion by the initiation of negotiations.

What Negotiation Does Not Mean.

This task of ending the war by negotiation does not mean pressing the Government to state the minimum terms on which it would be prepared to agree to an armistice. It might be of some value if the Government appointed a committee now to work out the terms of a just peace treaty irrespective of the military situation at any moment. But the aim in publishing minimum terms would be to justify the war effort and to claim universal support for their determination to achieve victory. We must be quite clear in this matter and hold to our conviction that the method of war is evil, even though it is used for just and righteous ends. Publication of minimum terms would not alter our conviction.

Nor does our belief in a negotiated treaty mean that we are to try to persuade the people to desert what they regard as their obligations. They cherish the illusion that freedom throughout the world will follow in the train of an allied victory and future generations will be saved the horror of war. Some day they may be disillusioned, as they were in the twenties, but the public memory is notoriously short. So long as this illusion is held with sincerity the exercise of the democratic right of petitioning the Government would be of little value, for a Government could not act upon a petition contrary to the conviction of the majority of the people.

What Negotiation Means.

A determined effort to end the war involves creating a public opinion which will press the Government to start negotiations. To do this means that we must succeed in transmitting to the public our conviction that victory will not yield conditions in which their obligations can be fulfilled, either to the present generation or to the next, that all that they hope for, not only for themselves, but for those who they recognise have suffered more severely than they under Nazi oppression, can in the long run be gained only if the war ends on agreed terms.

There must be no illusion of facile optimism. Peace will not drop ready-made from the skies. The hatreds, the fears, the suspicions engendered by the war will carry over into the years following the war. There will be no easy time ahead. Men must realise that a negotiated treaty can set them on the road to peace and freedom from the fear of recurrent war, but cannot transport them like a magic carpet to a destination. They must realise that an imposed treaty can only start them on another arc of the vicious circle carrying them eventually to another war and to the negation of all they hope to achieve.

But public opinion must also be convinced that negotiation is possible. Here we are faced with the objection that " it is impossible to negotiate with the German Government." The past, we are told, is strewn with too many broken promises to make negotiation of any value. Indians sometimes say the same about the British Government. Yet we recognise that negotiation is the only way to a solution of the Indian problem and we are determined to try again.

Negotiation with the German Government is admittedly difficult. The difficulty is not lessened by the commonly held view that negotiation means an attempt to persuade the German Government to give voluntarily all that we hope to gain by victory, ignoring that it involves our giving up much of what we are loath to part with—our imperialism, our power to control the sources of raw materials, our financial grip on many weaker countries. Our failure to recognise the magnitude of our contribution to a negotiated peace is largely responsible for the continued thraldom of the German people to the Nazi regime. Moreover it may be equally difficult to negotiate with other Governments engaged in the war who have declared vehemently that they utterly refuse to negotiate or to yield anything that they hold.

But the difficulty of negotiation is not the major problem. If a " negotiating mind " develops in the public the power of these " no-negotiation " Governments will be undermined. A method of negotiation will be found. Figure heads which stand as symbols of their country's determination to win will pass from the stage to be replaced by men of a more conciliatory mind.

The major problem is how to develop the " negotiating mind." Already certain negotiations regarding prisoners of war have been carried on, but they are too insignificant to have gripped the public mind. They do, however, indicate a method of approach in the first instance; these negotiations are carried on through some intermediary, and in the initial stages of wider negotiations the services of some such intermediary as Sweden, Turkey, or the Vatican will probably be required.

There are certain war problems which are ripe for negotiation and which are beginning to grip the imagination of the public. We must make these the concern of all and show that they can be solved by negotiation. One example is " starving Europe." When it is fully realised that the enormity of this crime against the innocent populations of the occupied countries can to a large extent be laid at the doors of the British and American Governments there will be irresistible pressure to negotiate for their relief forthwith. The structure of war propaganda will topple to the ground when it is realised that blaming the Nazis and vowing that restoration shall be made will not save the life of a single child who is starving now.

Another example is the persecution of the Jews, different in some ways because this inhuman policy is almost wholly due to Nazi philosophy. Is the public satisfied with the threats of vengeance on the perpetrators which have been officially proclaimed? If they are, let them listen to a Jew. Victor Gollancz, in his pamphlet, " Let my people go " says:—

" We may sum up the whole matter by saying that there are two ways of reacting to what is now happening to the Jews of Europe. The one way is mercy—immediate aid to the persecuted: the other is hatred—retribution for the persecutors. And while it is theoretically possible, perhaps, to combine the two, in practice they are mutually exclusive. If your whole mind is filled with an agonised pity for the victims: if you are ceaselessly thinking, devising, planning how even one more child may still be saved; then there is no room in you for hatred and retribution, for your whole being is occupied by charity. But if you fill your mind with hatred and the determination to do evil for evil, they poison you at the very source, and drive out the charity which might bring balm, here and now, to the suffering."

It is our Christian duty to offer hospitality to or provision for every Jew that can escape. Hitler has declared that his policy is to get rid of Jews. Goebbels has said that Germany is in no way opposed to the establishment of a Jewish State. Far more, then, can be saved by negotiating to remove them beyond the bounds of the German Reich and to establish a Jewish State.

The small volume of demand for negotiation on these and similar problems is due to their not having been clearly visualised as human problems. Deep in the human heart there is an irradicable humanity which responds to human suffering. When the human suffering involved in starvation and persecution is presented, not as a political problem, but as a human need negotiations will not be far off. And as negotiations proceed the readiness to negotiate will grow. Recognition of the war as a whole as an offence against humanity will create a demand for its cessation that no Government will be able to withstand.

The task is before us. It cannot be shirked. By our witness we must ensure that the demand for the bloodshed to stop immediately and for a truce to be called wherein negotiations can start in a calmer atmosphere becomes so insistent that it cannot be resisted. Therein lies the possibility of finding the road to peace. A negotiated peace treaty, the result of bargaining, cannot in itself establish peace. Peace can come only when there is reconciliation. The spirit of domination which is fed by victory is impervious to anything higher than thoughts of revenge, the breeding ground of another war. The negotiating spirit is open to the ministry of reconciliation. In that ministry lies a great call and a great opportunity.

"Would that the Society of Friends might become a new postulate all round the world, bringing a new hope, a new way, a new leadership. In the light which springs from the common Father of all human beings we should go to peoples rather than to Governments; to the people who already have the desire to live naturally and humanly. Thus peace might begin to germinate.

Who are we, and what is our Society to feel such a call? And yet the ministry of reconciliation is given to men and there was never greater need than now! We should receive the call in humility but with a sense of God's power."

HUMANIST ACTIVITY

Los Angeles, California.

January 25th, 1944.

My Dear Friend Aldred,

Your most welcome letter of December 30 is just received and I hasten to reply. We wish to congratulate you upon the adherence of the Rev. Charles H. Cole to the Humanist Friends program. Hope other progressive Unitarian Ministers will feel similarly inclined. We certainly need men of the calibre of Cole and the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., in the movement.

I can understand those few Unitarian officials of the medieval priestly mind, who have no real place in the Unitarian Church if it is to live up to its splendid traditions, being opposed to progressives of the type of Lee and Cole. When they accuse the Humanist organisation of being "phoney" or something of that sort, they label themselves as being of the mediocre type. Only men without vision would revert to such priestly nonsense. As a student of law, you will know that we could not use or utter, even to someone in Britain, the Official Legal Seal of such an organisation, without leaving ourselves liable to serve legal penalties. It is true that you receive the letter in Scotland or our friend Cole receives the letter in England; but we post in California, air-mail, registered, and so use the United States' Mails in the first instance. We could not and would not do if we were not a legal organisation. It is quite easy to establish the fact that the Humanist Society of Friends is a religious organisation, according to the laws of California, and therefore according to the laws of the United States of America, by writing or wiring to the State Department, State Building, Sacramento, California, U.S.A. It should be noted that the Humanist Society of Friends enjoy exactly the same status as the Unitarian Church in America. Humanist ministers are ministers to exactly the same extent as Unitarian ministers and the ministers of any other religious denomination. The exact legal status of the Humanist Society of Friends will be confirmed by the State Department on enquiry. I have discussed this matter in the columns of "The Word" in earlier letters, in which I draw attention to the fact that our ministers, like the ministers of all other churches, are exempted from military service; although we believe in exemption of the citizen on ground of conscience only and not because he is a minister.

To repeat: As is stated in my essay, "The Humanist Friends' Challenge," which I have revised, and which is being published by you, I believe, we are incorporated under the Laws of the State of California, exactly as any other Church or Religious Organisation. Usually people of very ordinary intelligence understand these legal procedures and only those seeking to misrepresent the true nature and status of the Humanist Society of Friends are likely to indulge in such irresponsible criticism.

We have several Unitarian Ministers here in California who are also Ministers of the Humanist Friends Society. I am asking them to write to you so that you may be able to inform your readers how closely associated many Unitarian Ministers are with the Humanist Movement.

I send you, for forwarding, the Ordination Certificate of Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., of Coventry. A similar certificate is being sent to that great Unitarian Pacifist and Humanist, the Rev. W. Bottomley, of Melbourne. He is being asked to organise the Humanist Movement in that city and so, through the medium of his journal, "The Beacon," prepare the way for the spread of Humanism throughout Australia.

Fraternally yours,

LOWELL H. COATE.

We have not reproduced the certificate issued to the Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., because that is identical with the certificate issued to the Rev. Charles H. Cole, and to myself, both of which appeared in these columns. The certificate was forwarded to Richard Lee. We publish this acknowledgement.

Coventry.
February 28, 1944.

Dear Aldred,

I have received with pleasure and satisfaction the Certificate from "The Humanist Society of Friends."

It will be my privilege and honour to accept the same and strive to act as a good servant of humanity. Humanism to me means a fundamental belief in the sacredness of human nature everywhere and a will to assert the rights of man to happiness and freedom. When these rights are made contingent on other wordly or supernatural sanctions, the cause of humanity is weakened and goes by default.

As you are aware, I am a firm upholder of Theism but with the writer of the Johannine Epistle, I contend you cannot love God whom you have not seen unless you first love man whom you have seen.

On this earthly planet the only possible way of manifesting one's love of God is by the Service of Man.

It is very significant that the Barthians, the Neo-Thomists, the Neo-Calvinists, the Anglo-Catholics and sundry other sects who have striven to revive the worship of a God standing over against man, helped by action or inaction their various countries to take part in this bestial and inhuman war. They were waiting for their all extra Deity to intervene. The Supernaturalists in all Christian countries back up one or other of the contending hosts, who are out for this war of extermination.

The love of man as man, the faith of Walt Whitman and William Blake, of Tolstoy and Shelley, of Emerson and Theodore Parker, is the only sure basis on which we can rebuild this shattered world and found a World-Society of Friends.

Yours fraternally,

RICHARD LEE.

In November, 1934, as stated in Why Jesus Wept (page 68), we proposed to found a First Humanist Society of Glasgow, in association with our Humanist colleagues in the United States. The time has come to establish the organisation on a broad and useful basis. We should be glad to hear from all Glasgow comrades who are willing to co-operate in this work. The Society will organise regular public meetings. Please write so that our Humanist activity may be organised without further delay.

STANTON COIT.

Dr. Stanton Coit, Ph.D., died at Birling Gap, near Eastbourne, on February 14, in his 87th year. He was minister of South Place Ethical Society from September 2, 1888, to December 31, 1891, and afterwards for many years minister of the Ethical Church, Bayswater, London. The funeral service, conducted by Mr. H. J. Blackham, B.A., Secretary-Lecturer of the Ethical Church, Bayswater, took place at Golders Green Crematorium on February 18.

In the course of his address, Mr. Blackham mentioned the influence exerted on Dr. Coit in his youth by Kant and Emerson. He paid a tribute to Coit's great oratorial power and capacity for organisation. Coit's ambition was to establish an Ethical Church devoted to the ideals of righteousness, truth and beauty. His aim was that such a Church should embrace all branches of religious activity. The address, without mentioning the fact, made it clear that Coit was a pioneer of Humanism.

When teaching English literature at Amherst College, Massachusetts, in 1880, Coit heard from a student about the society for ethical culture of New York City, which Felix Adler started in 1876. Coit responded eagerly to the call of this ethical venture in religion, and gave up his post in order to join Adler. In 1882 he went to Berlin to study philosophy, and when he rejoined Adler in 1886, the influence of three months at Tonybee Hall in the East End of London (to which he had gone after leaving Berlin) led him to start a social settlement in New York's crowded East Side. This modest enterprise developed into the University Settlement which is still active.

Moncure Conway resigned his ministry of South Place Religious Society in 1884 after twenty years during which he had enhanced its strength and reputation. He saw in Coit the man for the position and at his instance, in 1887 Dr. Coit was invited to be minister. He accepted on condition that the Society changed its name to South Place Ethical Society. Coit took up his duties on September 2, 1888. Thus at the age of 31 a fervent dynamic and somewhat autocratic personality confronted a Society with a history of nearly one hundred years, and with an eminently democratic if perhaps slow moving constitution. There was a marked improvement in the attendance on Sunday mornings. Committees were formed to organize new activities. Many individuals were responsive, but Dr. Coit pressed on the Society proposals involving changes in constitution which could not be accepted, and he resigned in 1891.

Thereafter he was instrumental in establishing the West London Ethical Society. In 1909 the West London obtained the use of a disused Methodist Chapel in Queens Road, Bayswater, and under the Ministry of Dr. Coit it became The Ethical Church. It was his aim to make its ideology and ritual a model demonstration of a completely ethical re-interpretation of the Christian religion and the service of the Church, which should win over the modernist movement of liberal Christians.

Coit repaid some of his debt to Dr. Felix Adler by recruiting in England for the American Ethical Movement such conspicuous representatives as H. J. Bridges (Chicago), W. E. Collier (Philadelphia), J. Hutton Hynd (St. Louis) and G. E. O'Dell (New York).

He was the leading spirit in establishing many other English Ethical Societies and in forming the Ethical Union. The latter still exists, but few of the constituent bodies remain.

Coit gave ardent support to the Labour movement and to the struggle for woman's suffrage.

In the year 1935, at the age of 78, he found it necessary to withdraw from his Ministry of the Ethical Church. South Place members recall with gratitude that in 1937, in his 80th year, he delivered the Conway Memorial Lecture when he took for his subject "The one sure foundation for democracy."

GALILEE

By The Rev. A. E. S. RIDDLE

[The Rev. A. E. S. Riddle was ordained by the present Archbishop of York in 1923. The Archbishop was then Bishop of Southwark. Comrade Riddle was appointed to the curacy of Lady Margaret Church, Walworth. He served as a curate in Battersea, Plumstead and Lambeth. He resigned in 1931 from the Church as a protest against the devastating hypocrisy of the clerical profession. Since then, he has been, among other things: a green-grocer; a fishmonger; a teacher of English on the continent; a street-vendor; a tramp-preacher; a caretaker; a gardener; an agricultural labourer; a hospital porter; and a laundryman. Comrade Riddle is now 54 years of age and intends to establish a Humanist Society of Friends Centre in England. More particulars of his activities will be published later.—Ed.]

Deep in the sky the day's magnificence lies slain upon Earth's altar.

Glowing pools of gold and crimson spill the permanence of Beauty in that dying light; yet fools think death is naught but ugliness; and there above that pyre, warm lucent tints arise whose vapoury wisps merge in the upper air of tender vivid green.

Thus orient skies depict the splendour of life's deathless enterprise.

And on the luminous edge of that horizon, with all the gentle peace of Heaven endowed, the crescent moon lies hushed in sleep upon a foamy silken rainbow-tinted cloud.

But how a peasant lad thrills to that beauty! his casement flung wide open to the night!

Almost he hears his heart's intensity through the vast stillness, whilst that glorious sight fills him with overwhelming wonder and delight.

Then slowly the moon slips from her fleecy dalliance to cross the sky. But as she sails unfraught, she weaves a charm of witching silver radiance over the world.

'Tis thus her spell is wrought.

Meanwhile that youth engulfed in her white flame, feels everything pulsate with unseen power.

"Father!" he cries, and all his boyish frame, as if it were a fresh blown upland flower, shakes with the awed and deep emotion of that hour.

But at that instant suddenly a gust slams to an idle door.

And his old Dad calls out in tones of irritable disgust: "That you again, young Jesus, look here Lad, if you don't keep that damn door shut, I'll break your skulking neck, life's no mere mawkish dream."

Quietly the youth replies: "But my arms ache from carrying out that yoke for Nathan's team." And somehow Joseph shrank from that reproachful gleam pouring from those dark eyes.

The lad, however, runs swiftly across the court and bolts the door.

Then to himself, half mazed, "Oh, will Dad ever forget I shocked the doctors of the Law in the Temple Court itself; and even when I dared to criticize some futile point concerning rites, he fumed.

O, why are men so blinded, why are times so out of joint that no one heeds Life's sweet melodious counterpoint?"

Through these unwelcome thoughts that rasping voice breaks in still harshly, but more patriarchal: "Jesus my first-born, how can I rejoice to see your foolishness?"

His small eyes sparkle with righteous anger, then he adds, "My son, it's not as if you do not lark and play like other lads, grabbing your share of fun, but I have heard so many people say they've seen you on the hills, mooning the night away.

"God of our fathers! may it ne'er be said my loins have produced a lunatic, for that were shame to my Hebrew bed. And such a monstrous thought would turn me sick past all endurance were you in that case, since we have sprung from Jesse's root, and thus no hint, no faint suggestion, no dim trace of vile pollution may be found in us. Our's is an honoured name to keep illustrious.

"Meanwhile, my son, the Sabbath lamp is lit, your mother has prepared the Sabbath meals: we'll read the Law awhile, and I'll admit my speech just now was harsh, but then one feels outworn by care at times, and I've my pride, above all else; therefore, my glib young cock, it seemed to me roaming the country side, on Sabbath eves, in an unclean workday smock must ill become a son of David's splendid stock."

At these last words the paternal thunders cease, those clouds with proud resentment charged had spent their force and left behind a moment's peace.

Meanwhile the youthful Son of Man had bent, like some young sapling on a wind-swept plain, before the storm.

But little Joseph knew his child was one day destined to attain not only power to stand, but to subdue, then out of that wreck to re-create this world anew.

"It may be I still lack your self-control," says Jesus then; but Joseph cuts him short. "May be, indeed, reach down the sacred scroll, and learn from that how sons of Israel ought to converse with their fathers.

"Let me see, from Proverbs I read out last Sabbath eve, so we'll continue; its admonitory pronouncements may do something to achieve a humbler temper in you than I could scarce conceive."

But first he calls the family to assemble and then proceeds to read, whilst Jesus notes how his two brothers nudge each other and tremble lest they should make a slip.

Then suddenly floats in at the open window such a flood of purest woodland song that those austere paternal tones are deadened, and the brood of imps infesting that stiff atmosphere is scattered at the sound, and dares not reappear one instant while that nightingale outpours enthralling music.

But, alas, too soon its clear notes cease and Joseph's voice restores a harsher sway.

Till Mary starts to croon the usual hymn one sings on Sabbath eve; then she'll increase the volume of the song till all join in, and come to half believe that even here the heaped-up silt of daily wrong may utterly subside when love flows pure and strong.

Thus, with the ending of the hymn a mood of gentler hue steals down on Joseph's soul; he feels half guilty of an attitude of boorishness, and next tries to console his son in kindly accents.

"Lad," he says, "forgive my petulance, and though I will not have you wandering through the country ways so late, go squat upon the house-top till I summon you below, but let your mind distil less evil thoughts."

"Thank you," the youth replies, then quick escapes from that strange stifling presence on to the roof, to far-flung star-lit skies.

Meantime, his mother with accustomed deference, yet deprecating Joseph's late display of sheer impatience, risks a mild rebuff.

But he retorts: "Do you forget the day when that young whelp with monstrous insane bluff, dared to defy the Law, or wasn't that enough?"

Cut to the quick, "Remember he's my son," she cries, "though woman, yet will I defend his title to respect; he's no rapscallion dragged up in some foul hovel."

"Don't pretend," Joseph flings back, "you care more for our name than I myself, no son of mine shall ever again approach so near to heaping shame on us by daring to insult Jehovah, all for the tawdry show of seeming to be clever."

But Mary replies:

"To me he's like a boulder face—fashioned by the winds to look like God; nor blasphemy is this, for when he's older he'll show his mettle and, in ways untrod as yet by any man, shall he march forth to climb the giddy inaccessible peak of superhuman power, and there the wrath of God's inverted self outface to wreak eternal vengeance on Be-elzee-bub's foul clique."

"Woman I order you to hold your tongue, else will I have the Council punish you for such fresh conduct.

"And though you have wrung this threat from me before, this time I'll do what I have threatened, if you don't stop crowing.

"Remember I am lord, and must defy your rebel outburst." Therefore Mary knowing the rigour of the Law, makes no reply, but with a burdened heart chokes back the question, "Why?"

Meanwhile her prophet son squats out of earshot, upon the housetop, listening to the stars, rapt in deep contemplation. Yet there is not a single soul can feel the petty jars of daily human life quite so intensely as his soul does.

And since there's no increase, no growth for any flower; yea, since each lily unless it drink the morning dew must cease, so he too needs his heavenly cup of healing peace.

Therefore alone upon the flat mud roof he waits, and pondering over his home life, at first resents his Dad's unjust reproof, also his grumbling rough as a jagged knife.

Then with an effort to himself: "What right have I to judge, I who alone should give?

"No, love shall judge, and one day I shall quite well understand, therefore I now forgive him freely too, through whom I have this chance to live."

Thus Jesus on the houstop mocks dismay, and communing with love gags malediction. The silent hills are rapt in mystic sway, and every tree's ahush with benediction.

"Beauty," he cries, "pervades all things, reveal thyself, this is thine hour, thou art sublime. Possess each human soul, and let us feel that woe and pain and every sort of crime, are ebbing surely backward, even in worlds of time."

And musing thus the peasant lad looks out across to Cana's ridge renowned for wines and figs.

The moon sheds silver all about, the terraced hills hang thick with trailing vines.

Then he turns south to view the olive lands sloping away to Esdralon's rich plain dappled with orange groves, and understands, more clearly than the angels could explain, how it is his Father giving again and yet again.

Then for an instant he recalls this scene by dazzling day.

Of vales and tinkling brooks, of woods and meadows where fresh mantling green flows softly down the hills, where shady nooks harbour a wealth of gourds and cinnamon.

Where fields aflush with blades of wheat unfold the mellow ears, till finally the sun, by works of wonder, mighty and manifold, turns them to shimmering seas of red and burnished gold.

Thus noting all this marked pre-eminence of lavish love poured out, how can he aught but marvel at the vain incompetence of men to live love? Can it be that thought, man's greatest gift, is poisoned at the source? If so, then life itself is devil-designed.

But suddenly, as a comet shoots across the depth of space, there flashes through his mind the reason why men live as if they were born blind. Not in the essence of the mind or soul, but in the sheer necessity for growth, for small beginnings.

Yet the immediate goal of social justice here, however loth rich men may feel, should always be fulfilled without delay.

For since no seed can bear good luscious fruit when worthless and untilled the ground it falls on, much more must souls fare unhappily when born to suckle dark despair.

Indeed whenever souls are sown upon this earth they mostly fall on barren soil; on stony ground when nourishment has gone; on trampled ground repaying not one'e toil; or else on ground so cluttered up with thorns no soul could thrive. And there they waste away from ease or struggle or as the mere pawns of cold hypocrisy, each one a prey to a world of maddening chance where chaos holds full sway.

Yet the great Husbandman wills not this rut of wild disorder growing tangled ruth. Lands must give promise not of suckers but of life at one with unfrustrated youth.

One with young children full of gleaming wonder, one with the beauty of a maid in love, one with the deep persistent will of thunder; one with that bracing harmony which can move hearts to a symphony in tune with spheres above.

For God there is, and God is also one, who still creates life one and undivided. Matter and spirit move in unison and do not clash. Though fools have here decided they do; assigning that which has no form to God. As if to say: "Give him the reins of unseen power, let him command the storm and sunshine, since in heaven he ordains his pious will, but here on earth great Caesar reigns."

Thus here on earth misunderstandings loom like a huge cloud, menacing fierce disaster upon the world.

And like a bird of doom, it hatches out a brood of lies which masters all but the noblest. Foul as foetid fungus these lies appear to most men outwardly real and resplendent, holy and virtuous.

But doubly damned are those who doggedly insist these lies are true—that is hypocrisy.

Ah yes, hypocrisy, hell's darkest curse, that fell disease which sheds a thin veneer over men's eyes till truth must seem far worse than any common lie; which makes men sneer even at God himself.

This can entomb mankind alive in hell; this can deny the primal need for making earth's deep womb fit for life's purpose—love to glorify. Therefore is this the devil's devastating lie.

Hypocrisy which breeds sin and divides the realm of men, hacking as with a sabre life into fragments.

Whilst those fond blind guides who preach —first love thy God, then love thy neighbour, yet, in reality, denying both, like slugs must drag their futile forms along through time.

To be more damned for their dull sloth, because they proudly claim—"Thus to prolong our lives compels the weak to own our rights more strong."

Hypocrisy, leaven of every scribe; leaven of bland ecclesiasticism; leaven of priests and all that footling tribe who skunk their share of work. The actinism of anti-light, and therefore thrice as vile as incest even. Publicans suck blood and whores have no shame, yet God has a smile for these far sooner than for that lumbr'ing brood of hypocrites who reap where they have not once strewed.

Thus reigns Hypocrisy; and to defend her, that old barbaric spirit Blasphemy.

Who, like a knell, repeats the blood cry—"Render to Caesar what is his. Our alchemy has made him God."

Yet, in the universe there cannot be but one God.

So wherever the roll of drums, the blare of bugles and the curse of marching troops is heard, there God shall never once deign to sanction Man's presumptuous mad endeavour.

Meanwhile the wise must perish, overborne by that dead weight of blundering refusal to welcome Truth.

Thus hurled headlong to mourn frustrated aims and life's pain-making puzzle, they sink into despair.

But often these, fragile as crocus flame and crystal cool, frail as the fawn; more beautiful than trees draping their boughs across a limpid pool, would exercise full power, but for Man's blind misrule.

Thus Sentimentalism sits enthroned.
At Love's fair court.
Gaudy in tinselled ease, outwardly splendid.
Thus is Truth disowned, and that false queen unconscious of disease, breathes out infection.

Only a few survive, the many fall, whilst others escape to be lost on the moors of lust, unfit to strive.

Whipped by the winds of wild inconstancy or sometimes torn to shreds by passion's immediacy.

This being so, life's but a tissue of false jangled notes, or at the most we hear only faint muffled music.

Whilst true love is tangled in the meshes of that fear which, like convolvulus on every hand, twists its way round men's hearts,

For paralysed even the priests are by convention, and not seldom they, though often unsurmised, by their own humbug are themselves most victimised.

But Joseph suffers also as a victim of their hypocrisy and of his own,

Of theirs, because the wily priests soon tricked him into their trap,

Of his, since he's too prone, though it be for our sakes, to disobey the voice of truth.

Much more then for his sake and all of ours, must I not once give way, nor flinch from following boldly in the wake of all those who have sought to assuage this life's dull ache.

For now this word lies under that dark cloud of dire hypocrisy which often breaks only to fold life's children in a shroud of stinking death.

Whilst ghastly terror shakes the earth, and only here and there escape the ones who make their mates a stepping stone to safety.

Thus we see the hellish rape of Beauty, and Terror setting up his own accursed seat against the one almighty throne.

Yet though, like God, Terror with Beauty vie to be the usurper of full authority over the hearts of men, though he defy her natural right to rule in equity, though he sub-naturally assume the garb and gait of Caesar, gory in lewd disdain of human lives;

His sharp imperious barb shall not avail; God ceases not to reign. Since He is life, Death's power is always on the wane.

Yes, always on the wane, as wanes the night upon the lofty slopes of Lebanon when dawn begins to shed her silver light through dark and serried ranks of pine.

Anon shall Reason too pervade the fibres of each human brain, and blossom into gold of sympathetic sense to bring forth love,

Love merged in truth, truth, truth one yet manifold when the full dawn has spread over a night grown old.

Jesus recalls just then the Sabbath eve, the Sabbath lamp and how the meals are laid.

Yet, though these be but symbols which deceive men now, a time shall come when, undismayed, true worshippers shall worship God, their sins forgotten in the joy of life new-born.

But at these thoughts the young carpenter begins to drowse, then suddenly drops to sleep outworn by sheer fatigue, and dreams how Truth shall bring the dawn.

U.S.M. MEETING

GUY ALDRED speaks at the Central Halls, Bath Street,

On SUNDAY, 7th MAY, 1944

Doors Open 6.15 p.m. All welcome.

RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P., ADDRESSES GREAT PEACE RALLIES

CROWDED NEGOTIATED PEACE MEETING AT MANCHESTER

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT)

As the daily Press will not report any gatherings or speeches delivered by public men and women unless they support the present Government and what is termed "The War Effort," it is well to know that the insistent struggle for Peace and a return to Reason and Decency in international affairs is growing apace. Scores of meetings are now being held all over the country, and reports so far go to show that they are much better attended than at any previous period since September 1939.

We only touch the fringe of this Campaign when we mention a few of these meetings held during March. The Campaign was in full swing and all manner of Peace organisations took a hand in this uphill effort. For instance, Rhys Davies, M.P., during March alone, addressed meetings in Welsh advocating his Peace philosophy at Blackburn, Flint and Denbigh, and was listened to with the utmost respect.

Seventy M.P.'s tabled a Motion on the Order Paper of the House of Commons, led by Rhys Davies, criticising H.M. Government for throwing overboard, one by one, the principles of the Atlantic Charter. The refusal of the Prime Minister to allow a debate on that Motion unless the signatories would agree to move it, as a vote of censure on the Government created a furore through the Press in Britain and the U.S.A. This is the most effective blow yet struck against the perfidy of the British ruling classes, and they have not heard the last of it yet. This was an event the Press could not ignore: the honour of the nation is at stake in this matter.

Rhys Davies, M.P., addressed a very well attended meeting at the Institutional Church, Warley, Birmingham, Friday evening, March 17th, with Mr. Henry Hilditch in the Chair. That, too, was an enthusiastic gathering, and much literature was sold. But the most successful held thus far was at the Bristol Road School in the centre of Birmingham, on Saturday afternoon, March 18th, when chairs had to be borrowed from other rooms to allow the people to be seated. The large attendance surprised even those who organised the event. The Rev. Richard Lee, M.A., and Rhys Davies, M.P., spoke in vigorous terms of the necessity of bringing the War to an honourable end soon. Mr. Henry Hilditch occupied the chair.

The Friends' Meeting House at Nottingham was quite full (with many soldiers in uniform present) on Monday evening, March 20th. Mr. Pennant Phillips in the Chair. Rhys Davies, M.P., spoke on "The Pattern of the Peace." This also was an excellent meeting in every way.

Reg Sorenson, M.P., and Rhys Davies, M.P., had a large gathering of responsible people to listen to them at the Friends' Meeting House, Reading, on Wednesday, March 22nd; there were a few soldiers in uniform there too. The subject at this meeting was "Bombing."

Macclesfield is one of the sleepy little towns of England, but in spite of that there was a good muster to listen to Arthur Mostyn (a soldier of the last War) and Rhys Davies, M.P., holding forth on the causes that made Hitler and arguing that we must, if we are to have an enduring Peace, remove those causes. Mr. H. Pogson (Agricultural Workers' Union) was in the Chair.

Here are some of the pointed sayings made at these meetings by Rhys Davies:—

"This nation is galloping towards economic and financial ruin, and the majority of the people seem to enjoy the fun, witnessing the antics of their spendthrift politicians just as if they were watching the performance of a set of clowns in a circus."

"Those who are now supporting the War will wonder in 1950 why they did not take a hand at the agitation for a negotiated peace in 1944."

"Who would have dreamt five years ago that Stalin and Churchill would in 1942 be drinking vodka and smoking cigars together in the Kremlin? And as Stalin, the Archbishop of Communism has now seen fit to make friends with Badoglio, the Fascist General, there would be nothing incongruous to see Churchill and Hitler dining and wining together very soon."

"Its supporters claim that the Coalition must be maintained in order to carry on the War. It looks on occasions as if the War is being continued in order to maintain the Coalition."

There have, of course, been many other meetings of a similar character held all over England and Wales. It was thought that it would interest readers of "The Word" to know what is transpiring during these ugly times in the history of the people of these islands.

The Bull Ring is the "Hyde Park Corner" of the City of Birmingham; it is the tradition there to speak on all manner of subjects in the open air without any ado. It is interesting to note that the Peace Movement in the City has held, without interruption, a mid-day meeting lasting for over an hour, every Wednesday, since November last, advocating an end to this infernal struggle between the nations. There will always be an average of about 300 of an audience to listen to the speakers, and apart from a little banter during the first few meetings there has not been the slightest objection from the crowd to what the speakrs say. Other towns, please copy.

MANCHESTER PEACE MEETING.

The most successful and enthusiastic meeting of its kind in Manchester since the War began was held in the Friends' Meeting House, in the centre of the City, on Friday evening, March 10th, 1944. The Hall was crowded long before the time of opening; seats had to be placed in the corridors and the doors left open so that those who could not gain admission to the hall could listen to the proceedings.

Mr. Douglas J. J. Owen was in the Chair; he explained that the gathering was held under the joint auspices of the Society of Friends and other Peace organisations in the City.

Mr. James Hudson, M.A., was the first speaker and argued that it was strange that those who were very anxious to see a negotiated peace being concluded between Russia and Finland stood aghast when it was suggested that the same proceedings should be opened up between Britain and Germany. He protested against the suggestion now current that patches of Germany were to be wrenched from her to compensate Poland without the slightest regard for the feelings of the peoples inhabiting those territories.

Mr. Rhys Davies referred to his Motion in the House of Commons, signed by 70 M.P.'s urging the application of the Atlantic Charter to all nations, and stated that Mr. Churchill's declaration that it did not apply to either Germany or Poland had done immense harm to the national honour and to the reputation of the Government. The Government was losing its grip upon the House and, indeed, upon the country.

The sponsors of the Motion proposed to ask the Government for a day to debate the issue. He wished to protest most strongly against the abandonment of the Atlantic Charter which destroyed any moral basis for fighting this war at all and also to protest emphatically against the proposed cession of German territory to Poland. Peoples must not be treated in this way as mere chattels. Such a settlement would make another war inevitable. Mr. Davies said that in travelling about the country during the last few years he had seen an immense change in public opinion, which was not adequately reflected in the Press. If necessary, he believed that a new Government, as good if not better than the present Ministry, could be formed at any time from the Private Members in the House of Commons. "THE TIME HAD COME WHEN THE GOVERNMENTS OF ALL THE BELLIGERENT POWERS SHOULD RESIGN IN SHEER SHAME." There had recently been much criticism of "Unconditional Surrender" in the Press but it should be realised that the only alternative to that policy lay in a negotiated settlement. "Unconditional Surrender," as was increasingly realised, could only stiffen the German will to fight on and, if persisted in, would result in the needless loss of hundreds of thousands of our men.

Mr. Rhys Davies, M.P., debunked a number of the statements made during the War by our own statesmen. He heard the Prime Minister telling the House of Commons, "Let the Italians stew in their own juice." Now, however, our Fifth and Eighth Armies were stewing in the very same Italian juice.

He suggested that the Allied Powers should offer to make peace with a new government which might merge in Germany; and, if the Germans demanded as a quid pro quo that we should follow suit by throwing up a better government ourselves,

In 1916 when the Asquith Government had considered making peace, Lord Haig, asked his opinion, said "there might be a chance of victory if they were prepared to face the likelihood of a million casualties." Mr. Davies thought "we may very well be near that point now." If a negotiated peace had been made in 1916 it was quite probable that the coalmining and shipbuilding industries would not have suffered the collapse which was their fate between the two wars." If a reasonable offer were made to the German people the present German Government could be overthrown. "If in response they demanded that another Government should emerge in Great Britain he would have no objection to that. People did not realise the power of propaganda. He was willing to wager that if Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin decided to end the war to-morrow the people of this country could be convinced within a week that Hitler was quite a decent fellow and the same went for Germany and Churchill. Concluding, Mr. Davies said he was "a wee bit afraid" that the Labour Party might be "slow on the uptake" in regard to negotiation and that the Conservatives would steal a march on them.

In closing the Meeting, the Chairman, Mr. Douglas J. J. Owen, expressed pleasure at the record attendance and hoped that it would be an inspiration to all in Manchester and district to renew their efforts in favour of a negotiated peace. He heartily agreed with Mr. Hudson that pacifists had an especial responsibility in this matter.

After the Meeting P.P.U. Members distributed leaflets to those leaving the building. We understand that Mr. Henry Hildich, National Organiser of the Negotiated Peace Campaign, is shortly to visit the Manchester Region at the invitation of Manchester P.P.U. and high hopes are held for the success of his tour.

Rhys Davies's splendid speech on Peace Aims will be published in an early issue. We were unable to publish it at its time of delivery in the House of Commons, but it proclaims fundamental principles clearly stated and so, therefore, will not go readily out of date. .....

The persistent questioning of Ministers by Comrade Davies, in defence of miners; of young girls being sent miles from home to work under bad conditious; of conscientious objectors; and of all the oppressed workers in society is to be noted and applauded. To the best of his ability, our Comrade untiringly endeavours to make the House of Commons serve as a sounding board.

In the press, also, our Comrade is active; and we have a collection of published "Letters to the Editor" from his pen for early summary and release.

THE MEANING OF TOTAL WAR

BY FREDERICK LOHR

The present world conflict is generally descibed as a Total War. Total War means that the demands of war prosecution dominate and direct all social activity. It means that war comes first in the list of an individual's social obligations. All the many sided occupations and diverse vocations which go to make up the sum of human relationships called society, are subordinated to the efficient conduct of the enterprise—that of making war. So war becomes the primary purpose of human existence, and at least for the duration of the period of Total War, it can be said that human life has no significance outside its own destruction.

This dreadful contradiction of life which is implicit in the phrase Total War, cannot truthfully be said to be fact now. Society has not yet reached that degree of insanity, so that the present war is not actually a Total War. But the term Total War, applied to the present world-scene, does possibly contain truth in prospect. It does appear that we are being driven by the very exigencies of modern, mechanised warfare, to a situation bordering upon Total War. Total War is to-day a potentiality. It can become a fact. If it does, it will mean that by waging Total War, society itself becomes Total, for it is obvious that a genuinely Total War cannot be waged only by a genuinely Total society, having a genuinely Total social basis.

Now the basis of any society is its economy; the way in which its members obtain their livelihoods. What people actually do determines what they make, and what they make and how they make, determines their social structure, determines their customs, laws, institutions and recreational amenities. In short, it determines what we call culture, and social culture in turn creates the ether of the community which shapes the character of the individual within it.

Thus Total War implies many things. It implies a totalitarian economy, and a totalitarian economy means the elimination of competition from making and producing, and this carries with it the abolition of the free market, which means of course, the destruction of what we call commerce and trade. No society can prosecute a Total War whilst such activities remain in being. Firstly, then, any country engaged in Total War will require to abandon the competitive method of wealth production in favour of a planned and co-ordinated economy.

Now such a radical change in the mode of social economy necessitates a similar change in politics. A totalitarian economy obviously demands a cohesive political administration free from representative opposition. Hitherto, politics has provided the arena for waning economic factions within the national society. Competitive economic interests throw up a representative political legislature. This is what we call democracy; but a totalitarian society would need, as indicated, a planned economy, and a plan could not function if society contained conflicting economic interests. Thus Totalitarianism would mean the suppression of democracy in favour of a political legislature which could guarantee the State Executive a monopolistic control over the means of production. Secondly, then, any country engaged in Total War requires to throw overboard political democracy.

The above sketched revolution in economico-political conditions would obviously entail a similarly revolutionary change in cultural outlook. Our present cultural outlook, despite our individual beliefs and opinions, is a traditionally Christian one. Whatever we may think of the cultural development of the past two thousand years (generally designated as the Christian era) and no matter how much we may condemn the brutality and exploitation contained in it, we can see that the underlying motive of Christian civilisation is a regard for the idea of personality; a respect for the individual as a person, an entity worthy of respect. The traditional morality running through this cultural development has been based upon this respect for personality. It has sought to protect the individual principle; the principle of personal freedom or freewill.

The passage of society into Total War would mean the substitution of the individual principle of personal volition, by a totalitarian principle of collective coercion, for we must see that a Total War economy leads logically to a totalitarian morality. Thirdly, then, any country engaged in Total War would require to renounce the individual principle of social culture, and this would entail the renunciation of Christian ethics and the Christian world-view.

Now in view of the bloodshed and the inhumanity revealed by the record of Christian civilisation, and because of the ravages perpetrated by the acquisitive individualism of the Capitalist Order (which is itself a by-product of Christian endeavour and which rose to power mouthing Christian morality) it may be that the passing from social life of the individual principle would be a good thing in itself. But we must remember that in repudiating the individual principle, as a not altogether unwelcome price to be paid for the waging of Total War, we accept in the resulting totalitarian society a collective civilisation that is without culture. It is hardly possible that there could be a social culture based upon the collective principle, because cultural growth requires a very large measure of individual liberty. Nothing is more ludicrous than the idea that the tree of culture will flourish in the soil of authoritarian compulsion. Freedom is essential to creative work, and freedom is an inseparable concomitant of the individual principle. In fact, the individual principle is culture. Notwithstanding the acknowledged fact that the principle of individual freedom carries with it the potentiality for incalculable social damage, it still remains that it is the individual principle operating within society which insists upon and safeguards the cultural spirit. Also, we must face the fact, that the destruction of Christian morality, and the extinction of the Christian world-view of the universal brotherhood of man in the Fatherhood of God, would also cut away the foundations of ethical intention from all humanitarian social ideologies, such as Liberalism, Socialism, Anarchism, etc. And it is no light responsibility that men shoulder when they contemplate a complete break with the traditional ethical continuity of many centuries.

We see then, that the present drift of society towards Total War, carries implications which are of grave social significance. The period of warfare, if it carries us on, as looks most likely, to a third world war and to Total War, and to a totalitarian society, will prove to be the most momentous period known in history. I believe that it implies in the end, either the establishment of a world-totalitarian state, or else a confederacy of totalitarian units, which will inaugurate a way of social living so divorced from traditional values as to be positively non-human.

Of course, I am not suggesting that this World-Totalitarian Confederacy is likely to develop immediately out of the present conflict between the Allied and Axis Powers. This particular rivalry must be seen in long range perspective as but part of an underground process leading towards this end. It forms part of the meaning behind capitalist development. The beginning of this process towards World-Caesarism is rooted in the change of philosophic outlook that separated the modern age from medieval times. The history of the past five centuries can be seen as an accelerating movement attempting to break free from the religious conceptions and philosophic values which inhibited human conduct within the narrow conventional limits of medieval society, and which bound that society into a rough unity.

This movement was in itselef necessary and wholesome. In principle it was a desirable liberation from rigid caste categories and corrupt authority. But unfortunately it went forward harnessed to greed, and with ambitions inspired by a philosophy of false individualism. This exploited the discoveries of science and the advances of technics for selfish material ends. Wealth production for individual enjoyment was regarded as an end in itself. The inevitable consequences was the dehumanisation of the working classes and the demoralisation of the ethical content in community association which alone can give integrity and vigour to any society.

We are to-day witnessing the advanced stages of this rabid and selfish individualism. Its final phase will engender a reaction which will end in the enslavement of the individual to a social form far more rigid and despotic than that of medieval times.

The present war is part of a terrible judgment upon the shamelessly puerile philosophic values of modern society. Notwithstanding the ideoligical slogans of the political "Left," and the hypocritical affirmations of the political "Right," these values have so permeated all stratas of the social structure as to make party contentions of no consequence. These values state that the production, accumlation and enjoyment of wealth is the be all and end all of human existence. That life has no greater meaning than the cultivation of the senses and the gratification of appetites; that ambition for social prestige and power over others, is the only worthwhile aspiration and the only practical evidence of virility.

It is idle, however, to moralise on this scene. We can only note the developments and try to discover ways and means by which the values of true individualism, true humanism, can be affirmed, and preserved to be affirmed, in the future.

It cannot be doubted that the continuance of this war will accelerate the drive for economic planning and for greater concentration of political power, no matter which side wins the military victory, and these tendencies imply changes in social habit and custom of such a nature as will preclude a return to an individualistic and competitive way of living. This should give us cause for rejoicing? But I fear not. The mere removal of individualistic capitalism is no guarantee of social welfare, of human equality and personal freedom. Rather can it bring even wider disparity of economic reward between classes of workers, and even harsher restrictions upon personal liberty between individuals. Russia to-day examples this.

Economic classes can continue in distinction even though the private ownership of reproductive property is liquidated, and the private profit motive taken out of social economy. Also it is possible for envy and hostility to foster between national and territorial groupings in spite of the similar totalitarian basis of their respective units. It can be suggested that in the immediate future there will be an aggravation of the totalitarian tendency by further wars between even larger units, culminating finally in a world-State-Caesarism, or a confederacy of totalitarian Ruling Elites. Or perhaps, the eventual breakdown of civilisation through Total War.

Seen in class terms, this totalitarian process increasingly takes on the lineaments of Counter-Revolution. Even in this phase of it, during this present war, the initiative seems entirely on the side of the Authoritarians. More and more internal competition is being removed from the national economy of each State, and more and more are the weapons of working class international action rendered impotent. To believe the hoary superstition, handed down to us from an analysis of nineteenth century capitalism, that victory will ensue to the workers through the inevitability of capitalist self-destruction, seems to me romantic in the extreme. To be sure, the capitalist class has been unable to avoid conflict within itself, but every day witnesses a growing metamorphosis of capitalist from a class into a caste. Every day evidences the growth of international co-ordination of the Ruling governmental systems, and every day reveals the demoralisation and frustration of working class ideologies. We should not be too optimistic in our interpretations of current strike action, nor of colouring the happenings in occupied territories with revolutionary significances. The material economic tendencies do not favour the ideological aspirations of "Left" theoreticians. The social revolution so ardently desired, following these material changes, may prove to be in result merely a sweeping away of the clinging brushwood of individualistic capitalism, to prepare the way for the establishment of State Capitalism, and through State Capitalism to World Caeserism. There would appear to be grounds for the suggestion that the imperialist war may be converted into civil war, but not on behalf of the proletariat, but on behalf of a rising new Ruling Elite. Not prosecuted by revolutionary workers, but by counter-revolutionary politicians.

But then even a spontaneous proletarian revolution, should it occur, in no way indicates any change in the totalitarian tendency. For it must be recognised that any new form of society coming into being as a result of popular demonstration, must in large measure satisfy the immediate demands of the agitation. It must, in a sense, bear the imprint of the main ideological current which animated the change. That current to-day is almost wholly expressed in economic terms. Its demand is for a collectivist social organisation, a collectivism that can guarantee economic security to all. Naturally its political orientation would be towards the Total State, and so totalitarianism moves into position to meet this demand. We should be obstinately prejudiced if we insisted that there also existed, as a corollary to the economic demand, a similarly strong agitation for political freedom and personal liberty. The tide of popular enthusiasm is not at present running in the direction of ethical values. It is canalised into the desire for a multiplicity of material goods. It is, of course, true that many people are hoping and striving for something more revolutionary than bread and circuses, but it would be false to daily evidence to say this were true of the major part of society. It is the peculiar tragedy of our time that it cannot produce a social philosophy superior to the one now dying with the Capitalist Order.

It seems to me that there can be no revolutionary society of a libertarian character for many years to come, unless certain inspirational ideas quickly penetrate the millions of workers everywhere. These ideas must be animated by a strong desire for personal responsibility in vocational work, and would represent a swing away from the current belief in the happiness to be obtained from "a chromium-plated civilisation." I fail completely to see how this necessary idological impetus is to be given us. Some ideal conception of the meaning and purpose of human life, beyond the quest for comfort and pleasure, must be generously realised. However, on the practical side, it is evident that any libertarian trend must express itself for drastic de-centralisation of political and economic controls. It cannot fail to be anti-State and anti-collective, so that it would stand in direct opposition to the actual trend of economic and political development. Judging by the general approval given to the Beveridge Report, and estimating the future possibilities of Party collaboration, and adding to these the slavish and visionless allegiance of all so-called "Left" wing political groupings to outmoded economic doctrines, it would seem that there is little justification for any belief that we move towards a libertarian revolution of society.

The great French Revolution was pioneered by the ideas of personal freedom and the equality of all men. These ideas powered the material forces which were in action at that time. We cannot draw any parallel to-day. Nor can we even with the other great revolutions, Russia of 1917 and Spain of 1936. The conditions are not comparable. The idea of Freedom is still potent, but men are sadly and bitterly disillusioned. We have to face the fact bravely, that the workers as a class are more interested in security than in liberty, and notwithstanding the fact that the one is ultimately dependent upon the other, they do not seem to think so. It would appear that revolutionary hopes have reduced themselves to a despairing belief in the inevitability of worsening conditions provoking reaction and rebellion. Yet, quite apart from what I have already said of the indifferent value of such a rebellion at this time, so far as given tendencies would suggest, it looks as though this possibility is also foreseen by the politicians. In these days it is a very unimaginative and optimistic social analyst who would declare that despite all that can be done to the contrary, the ruling governments of the world cannot avoid revolution. Whilst it is true that historical and economical forces are to some extent blind in this operation, we must never forget that in the last analysis Man is governed by man.

The conclusion to which these reflections would appear to point, is that all so-called revolutionary ideology and intention can be embraced and re-shaped by counter-revolution. This, I maintain, is proceeding apace now. Only a political or social faith which runs boldly counter to all present economic and political trends can hope to offer effective resistance to the movement towards a totalitarianism of one kind or another. We shall claim that Anarchism can do this, and in so far as this is true, my pessimism stands condemned. But we must not make the mistake of believing present practice must fit theoretical principle. A free society must equate desires with needs, and since this is true, the workers in their struggle for Peace and Freedom must eventually vindicate Anarchist propaganda. But there is no inevitable logic in history which will do this. There are many superstitions which men can build upon their economic activity, and there may be many blind alleys down which man may wander before he reaches a realisation of his real social needs—the free association of himself as a worker, with other workers, considered and related as individuals and as persons, all organising consciously and deliberately for the good of one and another, and for society as a whole.

of activity, and, if any one wants it, freedom to oppose Socialism, these must all be stated as rights in the Socialist constitution. The species which has advanced from burning heretics and scientists to tolerating conscientious objectors in time of invasion, is surely capable of controlling its own destiny. The economic system must be changed and made to serve mankind instead of being a kind of treadmill from which there is no respite. In the words of the poet:

SOCIALISM AND MONEY

BY J. I. CRAIG

PLANNED ECONOMY?

The three great streams of Socialist thought, Utopian, Anarchist and Communist or Marxist, to give them their historical order, do not provide all the essentials of a plan for practical Socialist society. Utopian thought had the merit of focussing attention on the goal but did not attempt to describe practical methods of achieving it. Marxism on the other hand, concentrated entirely on the practical method of achieving the change and did not give a thought to the necessity for a planned reconstruction of society. This followed naturally from the doctrine of economic determinism which is the religious belief in predestination transferred to the political sphere. Marx was right in insisting that the change must come from the proletariat itself but wrong in assuming that the problem of building and maintaining Socialism can safely be left to "history." Anarchism comes closer to providing the answer to both fundamental questions which are, simply, how to bring it about and how will it work.

Marxism killed Utopian speculation. That represented progress, but Marx's scientific criticism of capitalist society was "sicklied over" by his metaphysical approach to the problem of changing that society. If Socialism is inevitable as a result of certain economic factors existing in the present system, no special constructive effort of will or mind is necessary to bring it about. The disastrous result of this false approach can be traced from Marxism, through Leninism to Stalinism and the fully developed power politics of the Russian state. This state, we are told, has achieved Socialism or is achieving Socialism. New rouble millionaires and poverty make an unpleasant contrast.

Thomas Henry Huxley said that the history of civilisation details the steps by which men have succeeded in building up an artificial world within the cosmos and that this has been done by combating the cosmic process. In other words the cosmic struggle for existence is more and more restrained by the process of moral evolution in mankind. Progress sprang from the restriction of extreme competition and the increasing recognition of each other's rights. We have now accumulated a vast store of knowledge, the common fruit of countless interacting intellects, which enables us to say that the struggle for mere existence is obsolete. The forces of nature have been so harnessed that all could live in comfort and well-being. The distribution of this wealth awaits the solution of the social problem. The intellectual power which produced the wonders of radio transmission is surely capable of solving the bitter anomaly of wide-spread poverty amid plenty. Our stupidity mocks our ingenuity.

"An engineer desiring to convert a given form of society into a more satisfactory one, would begin by making a very rough outline of the kind of society he proposed to build," says Max Eastman in his recent book, "Marxism, Is It Science?" It would be foolish indeed to attempt to create a detailed or inflexible framework for the future but every necessary corporate activity should be covered by Socialist proposals which can be hammered into shape in open debate and finally tempered in the fires of practice. The Socialist Movement must be rebuilt. The ideal must be presented anew. The harm done to the ideal by fifty years of parliamentary futility, both local and national, must be undone. Electioneering, labour state-craft and the twists and turns of power politics as exemplified by our tumbler friends the Communist Party, have destroyed much of the constructive work of the Socialist pioneers. Marxism, viewed as a philosophy, is only another dead dogma which must be shaken off. It was not the materialistic conception of history which inspired Marxists to go to Spain to defend Spanish Socialism.

THE MONEY QUESTION

The question of the function of money in a Socialist economy has been largely neglected by Socialist writers. Yet any attempt to create a Socialist economy involving the use of money as we know it, is fore-doomed to failure. This follows from the fact that the possession of money confers permanent and absolute title to all types of property and this is antagonistic to the common ownership of the means of production and distribution. In other words, re-accumulation and the re-introduction of capitalism would be facilitated.

Many Socialists simply ignore the question leaving us to wonder whether the workers will sell their own produce back to themselves, thereby transferring cash from their right hand to their left hand. The Anarchists on the contrary say that when private property in the means of production has been superseded, money, which is the medium of exchange of land, buildings, machinery and so on, will no longer be required and should therefore be abolished. This is theoretically correct but leaves untouched the problem of distribution. At present, money, apart from its services to the owning classes, performs a real and necessary function in our complex modern society, the function of distribution. That is purely incidental, springing from its main function as the medium of exchange. The bank-note we might say is gregarious and therefore happiest in company. The capitalist has to exchange it for labour power in the labour market and it finds its way into the poor man's pocket. It pines there, however, longs for company and its wish is soon granted.

The Anarchist conception of free distribution appears to be based not on the needs of modern complex society but on the methods of the village commune where the members were supplied freely from the common store, the point overlooked being that the storekeeper knew each individual and knew that he had contributed by his efforts to that common store. Socialism must be capable of functioning tomorrow and certainly long before we have all developed the complete social conscience.

Just as certain administrative functions of the state will be carried on under Socialist auspices (Marx taught that the state would progressively wither away), so we need an instrument of distribution which is as flexible as money, which will provide the necessary information on which future production can be based and which will ensure the efficient and equitable distribution of all types of goods and services. Such an instrument could be defined as a general purpose ration coupon bearing a fixed expiry date. The life of the coupon, let us call it the Socialist note, could be, say, one year, thus automatically cancelling out all surplus purchasing power. Surplus purchasing power in the wrong hands is one of the features of the recurring failures of the capitalist system known as slumps. When the production of the mainstays of life, food, clothing and shelter, ceased to be determined by geographical or technical factors, it would be determined solely by consumers orders and these commodities could be issued merely against a book entry for check purposes, to avoid waste and to provide statistics on which to base future production. The Socialist note would still be necessary for the distribution according to individual taste of articles seldom in demand or difficult to produce.

The workers physical condition suddenly becomes the vital concern of the state in time of war and rationing is introduced alongside the money system, to prevent the well-to-do depriving others of the means of life. The principle could be used to give effect in times of plenty to the Socialist dictum—from each according to his powers, to each according to his needs. The changes outlined represent a process of "withering away" of money.

THE LABOUR THEORY OF VALUE

Critics have said that Socialist economies stand or fall with the labour theory of value. This is undoubtedly true. Incidentally, this theory was formulated by Petty, Thompson, Hodgskin and others and Marx adapted it from these writers. No serious challenge has been offered to the statement that the intrinsic value of a commodity is measured by the amount of socially necessary labour-time embodied in it. By labour is meant any expenditure of brain or muscle which contributes to the final value of the product. A prominent critic of the theory, F. C. Hearnshaw, wrecks his long attack by stating "It is not true that labour—however the term may be defined—is the sole creator of wealth or the sole source of value: much wealth of inestimable value (e.g. coal) is the free gift of nature . . ."; an unfortunate remark for one who believes in private ownership of these resources! Later he has this passage: "Scarcely less ludicrous is it to regard the natural increase of flocks and herds as in any real sense the product of the labour of the shepherd. He sits and contemplates the stars. Nature does the rest; and he is rich." This sounds more like Palestine than Scotland!

The labour theory of value has led some Socialists to propose a currency based on labour-time and known as the labour note. But prices are determined by the interaction of supply and demand no matter what type of currency is in use and the labour note would therefore lose its meaning. The issue would not be self-balancing as its advocates suppose. The labour theory of value is not a theory of price. With a rationing system, of course, the number of coupons sought is arbitrarily fixed according to the available supply of the particular commodity.

THE "SOCIAL CREDIT" APPROACH

Major C. H. Douglas in one of his few lucid moments says (Social Credit, page 62), "The proper function of a money system is to furnish the information necessary to direct the production and distribution of goods and services." This is excellent but Douglas appears incapable of developing his idea logically. His next sentence is "It is, or should be, an order system not a reward system." So near and yet so far! This is the same as saying that a horse is, or should be, a quadruped. The intended meaning of these statements is excellent and if the argument were developed it would lead Major Douglas directly to planned distribution and the abolition of the money system. But he does not wish to relinquish the money system. Far from it. He approves of the profit motive, capitalism and interest and so the idea was still-born. It was just a gleam of light in a dark volume.

The January 1944 issue of the Social Credit weekly Reality, quotes a Russian writer, Kiril, as saying, ". . . rouble notes received by the worker are in effect little more than vouchers entitling him to a corresponding share in the total volume of consumers goods and services available."

The advantage of using currency rather than vouchers is that "It enables the recipient to make his own choice within the limits of his income among the various goods offered for sale—or to save part if he chooses." The rouble is, of course, very far from being a coupon. It bears interest when invested in Soviet state securities, is passed on by inheritance and functions to some extent as a measure of value; but the statement is interesting since it indicates the direction in which money must develop in a country where the major industries are state owned, that is, in a country where state capitalism flourishes.

THE FREEDOMS

The conquest of social security at the expense of the freedoms, some of which we have already attained in part, would be a worthless victory. Freedom of opinion and freedom of the press, these go without saying, freedom to own and dispose of a sufficiency of personal possessions, economic independence for all women, freedom to choose one's sphere

BOMBING PROTEST

We have been asked to give publicity to the appended signed protest against the bombing policy involved in the pursuit and conduct of total war :—

TOTAL WAR: BOMBING POLICY.

We, the undersigned, regard with growing disquietude the wanton destruction of civilian life and national culture by the Government's policy of aerial bombardment, which seems to us to imitate in an aggravated form the example of the Nazis.

We do not accept the denials issued by the Government of the charge that such bombardment is indiscriminate; and we feel it to be our duty as writers, artists and musicians to protest against it in the strongest possible terms, as an offence against humanity.

In this view we have the support of the International Red Cross Committee, which has recently issued an appeal to all belligerent powers. ("The Times," Jan. 8th, 1944.) After stating that the principles of international law for the protection of lives and property of a non-military character are being relegated more and more to the background in favour of the unreserved pursuit of total warfare, the appeal continues:—

"The International Committee observes with great and increasing disquiet the steady aggravation of methods of warfare affecting civilian lives and property devoid of military importance, but the destruction of which is an irreparable loss to civilisation."

CIVIL SERVICE PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP.

The Annual General Meeting of the Civil Service Pacifist Fellowship was held at the Kingsway Hall, London, W.C.2, on Friday, April 21, at 6 p.m. An address was given by Mr. F. Marcus Arman, Staff Side Secretary of the Assistance Board Whitley Council and Member of the National Staff Side. His subject was "Social Responsibility in the Civil Service."

The evacuation of Civil Service Departments from London ended the lunch-hour gatherings at the Cafe Embassy, Theobalds Road, London, W.C.2. Now that a number of Departments have returned, the A.G.M. proved a good opportunity for London members to meet again in fellowship. The date was fixed for the Friday before the P.P.U. A.G.M. so that provincial member could attend both gatherings during the same week-end.

The Civil Service Pacifist Fellowship was formed in October, 1939, and since its inauguration, over 800 Civil Servants have asked to be associated with the movement. At least a third of this number has now left the Civil Service because of tribunal direction, resignation or dismissal.

The membership of the C.S.P.F. is widely scattered over the country and one of the main objects is to strengthen its witness through fellowship. By means of the Bulletin and individual correspondence, information and advice is given on the special problems relating to the Civil Service C.O. Through the Maintenance Fund, assistance is rendered to members in need arising from their pacifist stand. Recently, a Post-War and General Reserve Fund has been established to build up a Reserve to help those who will not be reinstated after the war.

Any interested Civil Service pacifist, whether in an established or a temporary grade, will be welcome to join the Fellowship. Enquiries should be addressed to the Secretary, Mr. S. G. Cornish, 38 Rancliffe Road, London, E.6.

MAN IS TOO GOOD TO FIGHT

BY THE REV. RICHARD LEE, M.A.

(Minister, New Great Meeting House (Unitarian), Coventry)

My thesis is a very simple one, and may be stated very briefly : Man as he is, not ideal man, but man with spots, blemishes and imperfections, is far too good for modern war. Consider what war is and what man is, and you will see my meaning. Of all warriors you may use Maxim Gorky's phrase,

"Creatures that once were men."

Let Lord Fisher describe war :—

"The essence of war is violence. Moderation in war is imbecile. Hit first, hid hard, and hit anywhere. The humanising of war!!! You might as well talk of the humanising of hell. Kick your enemy when he is down. Hit him in the belly and boil your prisoners in oil (if you take any) and torture his women and children; then people will keep clear of you."

This is not from Mein Kampf or from Goebbels or Himmler, but from that fine British Admiral, Jacky Fisher.

Here is another description of war from the pen of an English bishop:—

"Christ declares the Fatherhood of God. War blasphemes God. The Gospel of Christ is salvation : War is destruction. The Gospel affirms community : War denies it. The Gospel stands for the imperishable worth of the individual personality : War shows the individual as an isolated, helpless, powerless atom in a world of irrational monsters. Modern war is the demon that not only kills human lives but, by its awful unreason, its organisation and invention turns the individual from a person into an unmeaning thing."

If these statements of the Admiral and the Bishop are true, my proposition is this :

The worst man, thief, prostitute, drunkard, or even a politician is too good for war.

My thesis can only be properly understood when you consider the antithesis.

The commonest assumption made particularly by the religious dogmatists, the moral exhorters, and also by spiritually-minded pacifists, is that before you can end war you must make a radical change in human nature.

I am not opposed to a radical change in human nature. But I do not see why we should wait for some Utopian change, before we revolt against the brutality, the stupidity, and the utter futility of war.

What the French call the homme sensuel is too good to fight and he can be made to see it.

This cowardly fallacy that war is due to some radical defect in human nature is proclaimed by militarists and pacifists alike.

In fact one reason why the peace movement lies down to the falsehood and deceit of the militarists in war-time is that we imagine salvation from war can only come when the super-saints rule the world.

The time may come when the saints will rule the world. But the first step in that direction will be to get rid of the humbug, the hypocrisy and the murderous violence of war. In this task any man is good enough, potentially, to lend a hand.

There are three forms of the fallacy I am trying to destroy :

(a) The fallacy of original sin.
(b) The fallacy of the fighting animal.
(c) The fallacy of the unenlightened mind.

(a) The religious dogmatist, and his name is legion sets down as the cause of this war, the corruption of human nature.

In a Catholic Catechism I came across the other day the origin of all our woes lies in the sin of Adam. The author draws a distinction between the sin of Adam and the sin of Eve.

Eve did not pass on her transgression but Adam did.

The mythology of other religious dogmatists is not quite so naive as of this catechism, but the vast majority of religious folk believe that the root cause of the war is a corrupted and unsanctified human nature.

One writer of repute says that for hundreds of years the people have been leaving God out of their lives and this world tragedy is the result.

Even so enlightened an Archbishop as William Temple takes this standpoint in his war-time exhortations.

It is the main theme of writers like Berdyaev, Dr. John Whale, Christopher Dawson, and Dr. Micklem that a spiritual revolution is needed before you can abolish war.

There are two comments to be made on this putting down the blame on a corrupt human nature.

In effect, the corrupt human nature is that of the enemy. Though it may be admitted that our dose of original sin exists, it is never reckoned as a vera causa of this war.

The Germans are always assumed to have had a double dose of original sin.

This is really as violently heterodox as Pelagianism.

The other comment is this :

If corrupt human nature which inherits Adam's taint bears the guilt, why do the same people assume that Hitler was the main sinner and to knock him out the primal aim of all the slaughter?

I am no believer in human perfection, but it is not Sin in General which has caused this war, but some particular sin with which neither Adam nor Eve had much to do.

Admitting, for the sake of argument, we are a tainted race, war will not take away the taint but manifestly will add to it and make man viler still.

(b) A Unitarian Lieut-Colonel who pretended to be a Darwinist once attacked me violenly when I contended man was too good to fight. He brought in Darwin and the survival of the fittest. Man belongs to nature, red in tooth and claw, and he must join in the struggle.

Sir Arthur Keith, the eminent Rationalist, once put forward the same argument.

Sir Chalmers Mitchell and Leonard Hobhouse have exposed the fallacy.

They have shown that the noblest qualities in man survive by some other kind of selection than that of the blood-feud.

It is a proved fact that the last war killed off the fittest.

If man, at his best, is to survive, he must be good enough to find some moral equivalent of war, without its bestiality and ruthless destruction.

(c) The third fallacy is a more subtle one found very often among pacifists and conscientious objectors. I will not venture to mention any names because those who perpetrate the fallacy and delude others, often give away their own case. Peace-makers who will ask all and sundry to join in an effort for stating peace terms, and being willing to negotiate on them now, are warned. "No, now is not the time." "You do not understand the depth and extent of the spiritual evil and of human deterioration."

Our chief business is to deal with this human deterioration. "We must get together in little groups for mutual purification and enlightenment."

The unregenerate, unenlightened man can do little or nothing to do away with this evil of war. War has its roots in soul-deterioration on a wide scale.

According to this theory the war-making units are the ignorant masses of the common people filled with nationalistic pride, vanity and hatred.

Even among those who have discarded the myths of original sin and of the fighting man, who kills off the lower breeds, it is thought that man, as he is, cannot get rid of this brute monster which devours him. For his consolation, politicians like Malcolm Macdonald far off in Canada, assure him that bombing is good for him, and out of the welter of the blitz, he will emerge a nobler and purer kind of being.

As against these theological, scientific and moral dogmatists who affirm that man must be made over again in order to end war, my affirmation is that man can be made to see what war is and how he can end it without any supernatural birth or intellectual revolution.

Jesus said to the common people of his day: "Ye yourselves judge what is right."

Wars are not made by the deliberate wicked acts of the peoples. The Powers declare war and men invent some untruth in order to drag at the heels of the war-chariot the people whom they have deluded.

It is neither the sin of Adam, nor the fighting instinct, nor the low moral level of the people as a whole which causes modern war.

The root cause is the economic rivalry of the Powers and the classes who benefit by war. The people are pawns in the hands of the real war-makers.

The only remedy for war is for the people to find out how they are deluded and how they can get rid of their evil counsellors. Guy Aldred calls his paper The Word, and for the most part, it is an unimpeachable record of facts about this war and other wars.

"Things are what they are," said Bishop Butler. One common man has some sense.

These are some facts, negative and positive, about this war which the common man has got to learn. He will learn some by events, he will learn others by the filtering through of the Word The word of Aldred and Emrys Hughes, and McGovern, and the Duke of Bedford. Here are a few facts:

This is not a war against Hitlerism. Half the Cabinet share Hitler's philosophy.

This is not a war for Freedom. Out of 500 million odd in the British Empire 400 million have no freedom.

This is not a war for Christianity. Ask Ernest Thurtle.

This is not a war to enforce the fulfilment of the pledged word. Churchill has forsworn the Atlantic Charter and will forswear any mortal thing.

The dictated peace will be a bigger swindle than the Brighton election.

No dictated peace has any moral foundation.

The Second Front is on the way to win this miserable swindle.

You can pick out a dozen men or women anywhere — except perhaps in an ecclesiastical assembly or a company of war-profiteers—in a village inn, in a soldier's guard room, or a youth group, or a women's guild, or at the street corner, and expound these propositions.

Your audience may be any religion or none, of high morality or low morality, Yoga initiates or Inebriated Guinessites. They will begin to lose confidence in this Holy war.

When you explain how the statement of decent terms and the promise of economic co-operation would shorten the war, you would have little opposition. If you could spent an hour in a round-table discussion, you would have the heartiest co-operation. I am not speaking of something which is a matter of doubt.

There is little opportunity to speak to groups and tell them the real facts. But such opportunities as come, I take them. My testimony is that the common man or woman has no case for this war. They can be made to understand that there is only one way to end it, for the peoples to throw over their present leaders and get together in every country to save the destitute and rebuild the ruined habitations.

Only in co-operation for life can we do away with the strategists of desolation and death. I have spoken this word of reconciliation to miners' wives in a ctiy which has felt sorely the coward blows of the three-mile-high workers. Suppose, I have said, there were a calamity in your mining village. Some men entombed needed rescue. On whom would you call to do the work of salvation?

You would not ask a man's religion or morals. The worst rapscallion might respond and give his life for his mate.

To-day Europe faces a catastrophe to millions of lives. The call is to stop this futile and unholy destruction and rescue from perishing millions of men, women and children.

Surely to that call every decent human being will respond. We may desire a world of Christ-like men and women without spot or blemish or any such thing. Let us begin by doing what we can to wipe out this blot, this monstrous orgy of falsehood, humbug and unholy slaughter which we call war.

Be you rich or poor, high or low, bond or free,
A stainless Stephen or a sinful Simon,
A sober Pharisee or a wealthy Sadducee,
A charming Marquis, or Cobbler's son,
A recreant Pacifist or a disillusioned soldier.
The call is to you.

Arise and conquer while you can
The foe which in your midst resides,
And win you with the will of man
That kingdom which abides.

Guy Aldred writes of this booklet: "This magnificent and invaluable factual exposure ought to be read by every citizen. It is written soberly and wisely, not to indict but to amend, not to expose sensationally, but to serve usefully. In this spirit of public affection it ought to be studied and acted upon."

Every Socialist and every student of what is termed criminology should secure and study this practical exposure of the prison system. Prison is the secret slavery condoned by authority and callous casual indifference by a complacent cowardly civilization. From the same complacent acquiescence of the dulled majority wars arise and with them the destruction of mankind by violence and disease. Buy and read this work.

THE QUESTION REMAINS UNANSWERED.

Dear Sir Stafford Cripps,

I have just been reading your address entitled "The Kingdom of God on Earth," which has been reprinted in a book called "In Search of Faith." The general argument of the address seems in reproof of Christians for not acting according to the teachings of Christ. The address ends:

"We must not be ashamed or half hearted in our convictions, or apologetic in our advocacy of Christ's way. We know God's purpose from the very lips of Christ Himself: in that purpose we go forward to conquer evil and to establish His kingdom of love and happiness here in our troubled and tragic world."

The question I should like to ask is, how you reconcile this statement with the position you occupy in being Minister of Aircraft Production, organising the production of aircraft which are being used for the systematic destruction of the civilian population in the cities and town of Germany and elsewhere by concentrated bombing. If you reply that the German Government would do the samething, I suggest (1) that is irrelevant on theargument of your address; (2) in fact the German Government did not do so in 1939-1940, when it had the ample means of laying waste English cities (which were quite unprotected then) but refrained from using those means.

Yours very truly,
C. H. NORMAN.

This letter of enquiry, putting a perfectly fair question, elicited no reply. Perhaps the question is too much of a poser even for the certainly acute brain of Sir Stafford! Anyhow, people who talk to others like Sir Stafford did and then do what Sir Stafford is doing by virtue of his office should be tackled whenever possible.

PRAYER FOR FIGHTING PEOPLES

Lord, stop our ears; lest we might hear
The voices of hypocrisy
Beneath the propaganda streams
That issue from the B.B.C.

Lord, close our eyes; lest we might read
Between the lines, and make a guess
At motives which may underly
The statements in the daily Press.

Lord, dull our minds; lest we might start
To understand just what we do;
Lest, 'mid the fog of hate and lies
A gleam of truth should struggle through.

Lord, steel our hearts; lest we might feel
Some pity for our tortured time,
And, horror-struck, in sudden shame
Turn with revulsion from our crime.

AN ASTOUNDING INTERVIEW

BY E. E. BRISCOE

I had been sent by the Editor of "The Word" to obtain an interview with the Minister for Destruction. As I sat in the spacious anteroom, gazing around, I was struck by the strange contrast of theme among the pictures on the walls.

Over the imposing oak mantel, heavily carved with emblems of War and Peace, hung, on one side, a large reproduction of Holman Hunt's beautiful picture—"The Triumph of the Innocents": on the other side, an engraving, ugly and cruel, entitled—"Mars Triumphant." On the wall opposite, occupying nearly the whole of its space, was a huge allegorical composition, garishly painted in oil colours. The title was "Empire"; and the conspicuousness of the Union Jack left me in no doubt that it was British. The two remaining walls were covered with framed photographs. Those on my right were entirely Naval and Military in subject, representing battle ships, submarines, various big guns, tanks, and bombing planes, accented, here and there, with portraits of "great" men of War.

The photographs on my left were devoted to apparently peaceful subjects:—views of cathedrals, scenes at past Peace Conferences, with portraits of Church dignatories, and other champions of War for Peace.

From the pictures my eyes wandered to the furniture: and I was amazed to see that the legs of the chairs were highly polished bombs, and their backs portions of the wings of aeroplanes. Inspecting them more closely I saw that, in the centre of each back was a panel containing a scriptural text relative to Peace. Mystified and perturbed, I rose hastily from my seat and examined it; to find that its construction was uniform with that of the others. However, my agitation was somewhat allayed when I read in the panel—"Peace be unto you. Be not afraid."

At that moment the door opened, and the Minister for Destruction entered the room. "Good morning Mr.—er—er" he said, scrutinising my card, which he still held in his hand. I hastened to tell him my name. "Precisely", he replied: and proceeded rapidly:—"Well, Mr.—er—er, I see that you are a representative of "The Word",—an excellent periodical, but, if you will pardon my saying so, too positive in its attitude against war. Some time ago I purchased a copy, and read it. The result was, I suffered from insomnia for a fortnight, and became so unbalanced that I even began to think of resigning my post as Minister for Destruction. Thank heaven I am now quite well again, and working more vigorously than ever at our War for Peace programme." He paused a moment; and I seized the opportunity:—"Is this the War Department?" I asked.

"Yes", he replied: "although, strictly speaking, it is and it isn't. Ha, Ha. You may call it either the War Department of the Peace Office, or the Peace Department of the War Office. You see we interchange the terms whenever we find it advantageous to do so. How do you like the furniture? It is my own idea, and design:—an expression of the psychology of my department. You come in, and sit down: and then you know exactly where we stand. Ha, Ha."

He hurried on:—"Now Mr.—er—er, I understand from your editor's note, that you want me to tell you something about my War for Peace plans. Let me see; (he glanced at his watch) I can spare you just four and a half minutes, which should be ample, if you allow me to talk without interruption.

First of all, you should know that our War for Peace programme has the approval of the Archbishop of Canterbury:—in short, the blessing of the Church. I will not say that I fully comprehend the Archbishop's point of view: but it certainly suits our purpose. Ostensibly, from his pronouncements, he considers that sin, and, of course sinners, are the enemies of Peace: and that until they are exterminated the world cannot become peaceful and Christian:—that we must therefore exterminate the sinners, which I can only suppose (believing, as he does, that all have sinned) means everybody, excepting, of course, those who are sufficiently rich, and "privileged", or shrewd enough to save themselves. Then, apparently, having cleared the world of its sinful contents, the Church will be able to imbue it with the true spirit of Christianity and Peace. That may not be a perfectly logical argument: but it is not for me to contradict the Archbishop. My province is to activate the Military machinery that is necessary for the practical application of his commonly accepted theory:—as the airman said, when he dropped all of his bombs on a cathedral! Ha, Ha, Ha!"

His insouciance roused my anger. Facing him fiercely, I said:—"This is heartless cynicism. Have you no consideration for the common people?" "Don't interrupt," he retorted. "The common people are relatively unimportant, Imperial Interests and Property with a big 'P' are the only things that really matter, and must be protected. The common people must protect themselves, if they can. If they are too stupid to do so—well, I ask you, are they worth protecting? However, most of them seem to be satisfied with their air-raid shelters, gas-masks, buckets and spades, Ha, Ha: so why disturb them, make them fretful, and possibly disorganise everything? Surely you realise that if they wake up, and become aware of their potentialities, they will make it impossible for us to carry through our War for Peace projects. Think of the billions of pounds we have already spent! All would be utterly wasted! It is positively outrageous to imagine such an absurd state of affairs."

He pulled out his watch spasmodically, and up went his eyebrows. "Ah!" he exclaimed, "Over five minutes! I'm afraid I have said too much."

"You have." I speedily interpolated: but he ignored my remarks, and hurried on to his conclusion:—"Tell your readers to trust in the 'old firm'. Trust till you bust—tell 'em that—very appropriate, O, very. Ha, Ha, Ha, Ha. Good-bye, Good-bye."

He rushed away, laughing raucously. I put my fingers in my ears to shut out the excruciating cacophony: then suddenly became aware that————the alarum clock beside my bed was harshly rousing me to the commencement of another day.

DEFAULTER'S CAMPS FOR C.O.'s IN NEW ZEALAND

LABOUR GOVERNMENT ENTHRONES PRUSSIANISM

BY THE REV. CHARLES H. COLE

(Ex-Secretary, No More War Movement, New Zealand; Minister, High Street Unitarian Christian Church, Portsmouth; Chairman Portsmouth P.P.U.; Minister Humanist Society of Friends)

From a letter written to C. H. Cole by the Duke of Bedford on the New Zealand Government's treatment of C.O.s.

It is really disgraceful the way the Labour Government has treated them and I am extremely glad that I pilloried these pseudo-Socialists in my speech in the Lords! Although I was told afterwards that it was "not done" to criticise one of the governments of the Dominions, I remained completely unrepentant."

The Rt. Hon. Peter Fraser, P.C., M.P., who received the Freedom of Edinburgh in company with Thomas Johnston and Sir John Anderson, on Friday, May 12, is New Zealand's Prime Minister, and leader of a Labour Government which is piling up a disgraceful record in its shocking treatment of C.O.'s. Mr. Fraser was, before his elevation to power, a champion of liberty of conscience, and during the last World War was Secretary of the Anti-Conscription Conference; and suffered arrest and imprisonment because of his anti-war attitude, and as the result of his courageous advocacy of the right of men to determine whether or not they could conscientiously perform military service.

On one occasion, when speaking in the House of Representatives on the question of the punishment of C.O.'s he appealed for the widest possible tolerance and for an effort on the part of members to understand a point of view foreign and antagonistic to their own. By no stretch of the imagination, he said, could the punishment of C.O.'s be of any use to the State, but by persisting in its legislation the members of the Government were providing that while they professedly set out to defeat Prussianism in Europe, they were enthroning it in New Zealand. The whirligig of time has made Mr. Fraser Prime Minister in this war, and now, as the following record shows, he is responsible for the most intolerant and vindictive treatment of C.O.'s which has no parallel in any other country of the British Commonwealth. In other days, Mr. Fraser supported his then anti-militarist leader of the Labour Party, Mr. H. E. Holland, who declared that the vital principles of liberty for which Labour stands, and the Party's conference decisions, "imposed on us the obligation to fight against any intensification of militarism," and who regarded C.O.'s as men with a high sense of personal responsibility as citizens of the world to be reckoned among the nation's best assets. But in these days this erstwhile friend of C.O.'s is their implacable enemy and apparently has such a low opinion of them now that he allows them to be treated even worse than criminals in Civil prisons are treated.

History will judge whether Mr. Fraser was right or wrong in his attitude and actions towards C.O.'s in the last Great War or in this. For ourselves we have no hesitation in saying that just as he accused the Liberals in the 1914-18 War Cabinet of abandoning their Liberalism in their cruel punishment of C.O.'s, so he may be justly accused of abandoning the true spirit and principles of Labour in the attitude he adopts towards C.O.'s to-day.

The following notes are from a letter just received from Lincoln Efford, who was one of the four Pacifist candidates in last year's General Election in New Zealand, Secretary of the National Peace Council, and well-known in Christchurch for many years in Pacifist and Labour circles.

In New Zealand there are six Defaulter's Camps, where C.O.'s who have been refused exemption by the Appeal Tribunals and who continue to resist military service, are sentenced to be detained for the duration of the War; after having served a prison sentence in most cases of from one to three months for their non-compliance with the law, they are under the control of the National Service Department. The larger camps have huts in compounds surrounded by twelve feet high barbed wire fences. In some of them there are an inner and outer fence of this dscription, and the compound itself is divided up into compartments with barbed wire. The Shannon camps, from which there have been a good number of escapes, are strictly guarded. The area is floodlit during the night, and there are several roll calls. during the evening, and all detainees have to be in their huts by eight o'clock, thus preventing any social activities.

In one camp at least in the South Island the men have been saved from the degradation of being confined behind barbed wire, because the State Forestry Department official who is responsible for the direction of the men's work there refused to allow it. He said he had fought in the last war and had seen too many German prisoners behind barbed wire to want to see any men he had anything to do with treated in that way.

Competent judges consider that most of the work that is being done in the North Island Camps where men are engaged for the ostensible purpose of breaking in land for settlement, is wasteful and will lead to nothing. and the men themselves, many of whom are skilled tradesmen and men with academic qualifications, feel that they are being wasted. Their offer to perform useful service outside the Camps has been repeatedly refused. The men receive no wages—but there is a system of good conduct marks—each mark is worth ¾d.—and the maximum amount a man may earn in this way is 1/3 per day. Dependents of the men receive nothing—except 5/- per week which the detainees may send them out of their good conduct pay. Wives and children are treated in the same way as ordinary prisoners' dependents and receive certain mimmum allowances from the Social Security Department—e.g., a wife without children, if she is capable of working, gets nothing at all; or if she has children she is given £1 for herself, 10/- for each child up to three, five shillings for others, per week. If they have savings in the Bank, this must be used up before these allowances are paid. Many women are having a hard struggle. In many of the Camps there were educational classes and debating groups conducted by qualified C.O.'s, with the assistance of the W.E.A. But when the authorities learned that discussions were taking place on the Christian attitude to politics, conscription, etc., they banned them, and some of the men responsible for organising them were sent to prison for the duration of the war. There is now very little going on in the way of combined social activity or study, and as a consequence the men are becoming extremely depressed and feeling the effects of their long confinement in irksome mental surroundings. Those confined in these Defaulters' Camps are in a worse position in this respect than those in ordinary prisons where the W.E.A. and other recognised educational bodies are allowed to conduct classes, letcures, etc. Censorship, too, is far stricter than that imposed in ordinary prisons. Letters must contain no reference to the Government or politics or conscription or pacifism, or anything to do with the Camps or the administration or control of them. They must be confined to "domestic and personal matters only." It makes letter-writing very difficult, as many of the men have been accustomed to discussing philosophical matters, politics, religion and social affairs, and are, of course, still keenly interested in them. The censorship cuts the men off from the outside world, and its effect is heightened by the limitation on visiting and owing to the isolated location of many camps, the great difficulty imposed on intending visitors. Books are censored in such a way that not only are books on Pacifism, Socialism and kindred subjects refused admission, but also books on psychology which may refer to sex questions when dealing with psycho-analysis. "Someone sent in one of my election leaflets" (says Mr. Efford) "and all the detainee received was the least important part of it—my photograph." No ordinary leave is granted for the men to visit their homes. They are kept in strict confinement, and many of them have already been so confined for periods up to two and a half years—some for a longer period.

Special leave passes may be issued in cases where members of a man's family are gravely ill, and when a medical practitioner certifies that death is practically certain. The responsible minister has stated that the prime purpose of the Camps is to segregate the defaulters from the community and keep them from any opportunity of spreading their views, and it is the Government's policy to make this segregation as complete as possible—hence the barb wire, isolation, strict censorship, refusal of leave, the ban on educational bodies to visit Camps, etc., etc. Discipline is maintained in much the same way as in ordinary prisons, except that for offences regarded as serious, the men are taken before a magistrate and may be and often are given prison sentences for the duration of the war. This sentence can be imposed for any offence deemed "prejudicial to the good order and discipline of the Camp"—a very hazy term—and is usually given for "Refusing to co-operate"; which means that a man has refused to obey an order to work or something like that, and quite a large number of men are in prison because they have deliberately refused to continue to work in the Camps as a protest against the whole conscription system and the Defaulters' Camps themselves. Others have been sent to prison for the duration, because they held meetings at which political matters were discussed. There is an irregular flow of detainees to prison from the Camps in protest against the system, and it will continue. With some of these men, transferred from detention to prison, the magistrate did not even see them. In these cases his power of commital is more of an administrative nature than anything else. He simply commits at the request of the Camp supervisor.

For a long time no provision was made for Chaplains to visit the Camps. In fact no outsiders who might be considered sympathetic to the men were allowed in. But the Returned Soldiers' Association who have consistently urged strict and vindictive treatment for the men, was allowed to send representatives to inspect the Camps in order to see that the men were not loafing and having too good a time. However, after a good deal of public agitation, Chaplains have been allowed in, subject to strict Regulations. They are only permitted to see members of their own faith; are not allowed to conduct preaching services—only Communion services at which they may be permitted to give an exposition or such comments as are appropriately associated with that service; are not granted the liberty of the Camps, but confined to special allocated quarters; and their interviews must take place in the presence of an officer. An officer may also be present at any of the Communion services. They have no real right of entry to the Camps, and are usually confined to a hut at the Camp entrance.

That the treatment of these C.O.'s is unduly harsh and wrong is suggested by the fact that it is impossible to get decent types of men to accept positions as Overseers and Patrolmen in the Camps; or if any are engaged they soon resign because they find themselves unable to carry out the obnoxious duties assigned to them. Those who do retain their jobs are on the whole, crude, ignorant and obviously hostile to the men in their charge. Some of the Overseers seem to take pleasure in "driving" and behaving unpleasantly, and there are many examples of unnecessary pin-pricking. It has been said that on some of the jobs new overseers with reputations as "drivers" have been engaged to get more work out of the men. But in some cases the men have managed to resist the compulsory output per man per day being raised above what they consider a reasonable amount.

There is no provision made as in the ordinary prison for visiting justices to interview men who may wish to make requests or ventilate complaints, etc.; although the Government has been pressed to make provision for this to be done. If visiting Justices were given the right of entry to the Camps it might help to prevent the petty abuses of authority that are always found in such institutions, and which cannot be combatted unless there is publicity, or at least contact with people outside. It is small wonder that many of the men are showing signs of mental strain, and that the natural result of their long continued confinement under unnatural conditions is depression and discontent. One of these men, a barrister and solicitor trained in England, who had had experience of military and civil prisons before going to a Defaulters' Camp, and who is now back in prison after refusing to work, has said that he can maintain his self-respect better in prison than in detention; and he bitterly contests the legality and justice of the methods of the detention system.

There has been much agitation for an improvement in the system—particularly for the setting up of Appellate Tribunals as in England; and for sentences of imprisonment or detention to be given for a definite period instead of as now for an indeterminate one—the duration of the war. But so far the Government has refused to make any alterations.

The New Zealand C.O. has few friends outside the Peace Movement to support his claim for fairer and juster treatment. Labour M.P.'s will do nothing that might endanger their positions. The Government would not allow a body like the C.B.C.O. to function. There is far more unreasoning antagonism to C.O.'s than in England, and Labour and Trade Union bodies will do nothing that might embarrass Peter Fraser, the Labour War Lord and Leader of the Labour Government.

We know that our comrade-readers in Britain will have thoughts of fraternal sympathy and solidarity with the 664 C.O.'s who are confined in the Defaulters' Camps described in this article; and we suggest that they might give a practical expression of this by writing to Fraser whilst he is in London, protesting against the harsh and vindictive treatment of New Zealand's objectors to military conscription.

After the last World War had ended, the first leader of New Zealand's Labour Party, H. E. Holland, wrote: "The greatest victory—the real victory—of the war years was won by the C.O.'s of all countries. The Labour Movement acclaims their courage and honesty. The Labour Movement denounces their persecutors."

If Labour Prime Minister Fraser truly honours the memory of his late Leader, he will reverse his present attitude, and admitting, as once he did, the courage and honesty of the C.O., will refuse any longer to be a party to their persecution. If he refuses to do this, he will condemn himself as a shameful betrayer of the spirit and principles of the great movement he was elected to serve.

BOROUGH OF AYLESBURY

At a meeting of the Town Council held in the Council Chamber at the Town Hall, Aylesbury, on Monday, the 8th May, 1944, at 6 p.m., the following Resolution, moved by Councillor W. A. Narbeth, was approved and carried:—

This Council being desirous of proceeding at the earliest opportunity with its Post War Housing scheme, and wanting to be able to let these new houses at a rent comparable with its existing estate, and within the amount its Ratepayers will be able to afford, request the Government to lend them the necessary capital free of interest.

The Council desire to suggest that the Government could do this by issuing Housing notes, free of debt and interest: or by taking such steps as are necessary to restore to Parliament the sovereign authority over the Monetary system which was taken from it in 1694.

This Council calls upon the local Representative in the House of Commons to press for the introduction of such measures as are necessary to secure the aforementioned objective, and to support His Majesty's Government in the matter of any relative legislation.

It was further resolved that copies of the above Resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to the Members of Parliament for North Bucks. and South Bucks.

DODGING THE ISSUE

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

In some of my speeches and writings, I have drawn attention not only to the manner in which the London Daily Press is controlled by the financiers, but also to the dishonest and evasive replies made by Chancellors of the Exchequer and other Government representatives whenever they are questioned by the few Members of Parliament who understand the Finance racket.

The following is a quotation from Hansard, from the proceedings of the House of Commons of the 18th April, 1944:—

Mr. Stokes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will in future have recourse to the creation of new money without interest, instead of adding to the volume of bank advances to the Treasury, as this would be no more inflationary and would cost the country less (because taxpayers would not have to find the interest).

Sir John Anderson: No Sir.

Mr. Stokes: Will the Chancellor explain why it is preferable in the national interest to create new money with interest rather than create new money without.

Sir John Anderson: "My hon. friend knows very well that I do not accept his monetary theories. He really cannot expect me to argue the matter with him at Question Time.

This is no isolated example of the stone-walling tactics adopted by the Government, whenever the question of monetary reform has been raised. Mr. Stokes has experienced such treatment again and again, and so have the few other Members who have asked pertinent and intelligent questions on the same subject.

Not a word, however, of these exchanges ever appears in the National Press. Oh dear, no! If they receive any publicity at all, it is only in the monetary reform publications which unfortunately are not seen by the ordinary citizen.

Readers of The Word may remember that Lord Bruntisfield, in replying on behalf of the Government to my last speech, made an attack on Social Credit, which was not only bitter but also somewhat uncalled-for, seeing that I had neither mentioned Social Credit nor advocated the adoption of its distinctive reforms. He referred to the contempt felt for Major Douglas's scheme by all economists of national repute, not a very surprising state of affairs, as I think I pointed out in a recent article, under a system which takes care that no one shall be appointed to a post which will give him a national reputation as an economist unless he is known to be more or less in sympathy with the existing financial order, or can be relied upon, from a too narrowly orthodox "Left" angle, to keep people barking up the wrong tree at "Capitalism," "profit," or "private ownership"!

I wrote to Lord Bruntisfield in regard to the economic issues raised in his speech, and a little later asked him if some of the "experts" on whose unfavourable opinion of Social Credit the Government relied, could explain to me why "Salute the Soldier" was anything better than a clumsy anti-inflation tax, levied in a manner lacking in dignity and sincerity, because soldiers were likely to derive benefit from it less than almost any other section of the community.

Lord Bruntisfield made no attempt to deal with the points raised in my first letter and said that he had passed on my second to the Treasury. The Treasury, by way of reply, in due course sent me a speech of a member of the Government commending "Salute the Soldier." I pointed out that this speech, while it had the merit of being free from the customary attempt to deceive the public into thinking that the output of munitions depended on the sum subscribed, in no way answered my main objection. A formal acknowledgment of my letter was, however, all that I received from the Treasury in return—the old story once again!

Soon afterwards I was interested to see that even the more or less orthodox editior of the Economist had been moved to adverse comment of the latest war finance ramp:—

The target has once more been raised, and will no doubt once more be triumphantly attained. But what do these gigantic figures mean? They mean for one thing that there is no call on the banks this week to lend money to the Government against Treasury deposit receipts at 1½ per cent. in order that they may increase their subscriptions at higher rates of interest. They mean, for another, that all sorts of industrial and financial institutions are put under pressure to invest in the course of a single week funds that would have been invested in any case over a longer period.

Nobody nowadays believes that the amount subscribed will have any effect on the production of munitions or on any other physical aspect of the war effort.

The official defence is that the Weeks (Salute the Soldier) are a necessary part of the whole campaign to persuade the public to reduce its consumption. It is true that this method of restricting consumption, having been entered upon, cannot now be abandoned or even relaxed. It is true that, if the soldier is to be saluted, he had best be saluted with full success. But the object of the whole procedure—it cannot be insisted upon too often—is to persuade people to consume less and the degree of success attained will bear no ascertainable relation to the £165,000,000 collected. (Because no ordinary person knows what percentage of the total is either new money created by the banks or money which would have been invested in any case, though over a somewhat longer period).

It is impossible to fight down the reflection that this result could be better achieved by methods that were more direct, less ambiguous and less charged with pure illusion."

The conspiracy of obstruction, evasion and silence which meets every effort by a member of either of the Houses of Parliament to obtain an honest answer from the Government in regard to any question bearing on monetary reform, is highly significant and is especially worthy of more serious consideration by those who have hitherto been so obsessed by the evils of Capitalism that they have failed to pay adequate attention to the very distinct and much more important evil of Finance.

FINANCE AND FREEDOM

Duke of Bedford's Activity Valued.

The Duke of Bedford's "War Aims" speech should be read and circulated by every Socialist and Pacifist.

"Reality" the Ambleside weekly news letter edited by our friend, G. Hickling, in its issue for April 7, published several excerpts from the Duke's speech. Mr. Hickling comments:

In reply to a speech in the House of Lords on March 8, 1944, by the Duke of Bedford, a diatribe against Social Credit was delivered by Lord Bruntisfield speaking for the Government

Careful checking by the light of factual happenings, the evidence of which is indisputable, the Duke's speech displays courage, sincerity and good faith; whereas the Government reply relies on insidious assumptions, false labels, vain imaginations and pie-crust faith.

It need not surprise readers of the Hansard report to find that the Duke made no mention of Social Credit. Incidentally, the whole business affords an illuminating sidelight on the campaign against the Duke that the press and certain politicians have waged since the war began. The line of attack is usually abuse of his "pacifist" views but this is merely the opportunist tactic, it is not the real reason for the attacks. Yet there must be a reason. . . .

Most enlightened Social Creditors have first-hand evidence of their own of suppression of, and opposition to, the knowledge they hold. This being so, how foolish it is to accept the press reports of the Duke as any more reliable or honest than the treatment of Social Credit. . . .

Regarding the Duke, it is revealing to remember that over twelve years ago he plainly expressed at a public meeting in Glasgow his opinion that the property right of the nation's credit should be restored to the nation, and not borrowed from a private banking firm. He said, too, that he favoured Compensated price and the distribution of the National Dividend. It is reasonable to believe that this declaration would be noted by the Power-Finance interests, and that whilst he continues to hold those views, attempts may be expected to discredit him by any means and on any excuse, provided they could be devised in such a way that their real source is obscured, and the true motive of attack concealed.

Wars are Power-Financiers' harvests, providing periods flush with opportunity. Only during a war, or under threat of war, could the Duke be attacked as a "pacifist."

REGULATION 18B.

When the Duke of Bedford raised the question of the 18B Regulation in the House of Lords on January 28 last, the Lord Chancellor resented his suggestion that certain Judges showed a greater regard for the wishes of the Government than is compatible with Christian standards of justice. Seeing, however, that the Supreme Court has agreed to invest the Home Secretary with the powers of a dictator by laying it down that he need only say that he thinks he has reasonable grounds for doing so when detaining people without charge or trial, it seems obvious that, either there must be something very wrong with the law, or there must be something very wrong with the judges. From this dilemma there is no escape.

The character of some of the charges and the far-fetched nature of the arguments employed in the effort to substantiate them; the character of the persons whose evidence was accepted; the unnecessary and prolonged hardship of the conditions of detention; and the inconsistency displayed in arresting persons who, in different ways, had made themselves obnoxious to the Government, while others who expressed similar opinions were not detained, all point to malice and spite on the part of some person or persons in authority. These people may be only subordinate and the Government may shield them only from unwillingness to have its efficiency questioned. The results, so far as its victims are concerned is the same. In the charges brought against Captain Ramsay it was suggested that because he was anti-Semitic and anti-Communist, he was anxious to help a German invasion. This kind of reasoning, to quote the Lord Chancellor's words, is certainly one which "leaves all canons of good sense." It is hard, indeed, to find an explanation creditable to the Government. Captain Ramsay's case is anything but an isolated example.

As for the Duke's suggestions of influence being used possibly by financial interests to cripple, by any and every means, a political group which has monetary reform as one of the main features in its programme, while Lord Simon may find the idea incredible and even ludicrous, no one with experience of the battle against vested interests and of the tactics employed by entrenched finance will see anything ludicrous or unexpected about it.

With regard to the Duke's statement that Mr. Greene was "compelled" to withdraw his case when Kurtz repudiated the statements he had made in Mr. Greene's solicitor's office, there would seem to have been some misunderstanding on the Lord Chancellor's part in regard to the Duke's use of the word "compelled." The Duke meant that Mr. Greene was then compelled by circumstances to withdraw his case based on a charge of bad faith against Sir John Anderson, as a Judge would hold that a Home Secretary was not acting in bad faith in believing his agent if what the latter said was, after all, declared by him to be true.

The Duke's alleged failure to make himself familiar with all the facts relating to Mr. Greene's case is nothing like so extraordinary as Mr. Greene's release if it were really true, as suggested by the Lord Chancellor in maintaining Kurtz's veracity, that Mr. Greene had been associated with, and offering to assist, German agents in Great Britain; not to mention desiring to set up a National Socialist regime in this country with the assistance of the German armed forces!

The Lord Chancellor's words:

"It is not a crime to profess political opinions which appear to me to be the height of folly, or to support a reform in our finances which I, at least, am unable to understand. These are not crimes. None the less, these people in the crisis of a war, although they are not criminals, may be capable—some of them at least—in doing an infinite amount of mischief."

seem rather to contradict his earlier view that it was preposterous to hint that people had been interned for advocating financial reform and rather appear to suggest that the internment of monetary reformers might, after all, be in the public interest!

With regard to the Lord Chancellor's rather lengthy explanation that 18B detainees are not criminals and that their treatment is preventive and not punitive; if the Government had from the start treated all detained persons with the utmost humanity and consideration that circumstances allowed; if, after the first emergency (?), they had quickly moved all who might have had to be lodged temporarily in prisons to ordinary buildings; if they had provided them with good food and proper medical attention, especially in the case of women with young children; if they had made adequate allowances to the families of detained persons and seen that proper compensation was paid for the destruction of businesses; if a public pronouncement had been made by the Prime Minister, emphasising the fact that those detained under Regulation 18B were not criminals and should not be regarded as such; and if the war-time control of the Press had been utilised sternly to discourage attacks on detained persons as traitors, then Lord Simon's "defence" of the characters of the victims of Regulation 18B might have been studied with respect. In view, however, of all that has really happened, it is little better than hypocrisy. Because we are opposed to hypocrisy, no matter who may support it, and no matter what opinions may be held by the people who are victimised by it, we are opposed to Regulation 18B and plead the cause of those who suffer under it.

MORLEYS AGAIN SENTENCED

Dear Comrade Aldred,—My son Alan was arrested on April 25, 1944, on a warrant which was issued on December 29, 1943. He had been summoned to appear at the Moot Hall Police Court on that day to answer to a charge of refusing to obey a "direction" to take up forestry work. As this charge was concerned with regulations to assist in the prosecution of the war he felt that as a matter of principle he should not voluntarily submit to such regulation.

He was brought before the court on April 26 when the solicitor acting for the Ministry of Labour asked that he should be remanded in custody for a week to enable him to produce the necessary witnesses. In spite of the fact that Alan had pleaded "guilty" and admitted that he had failed to report, the bench agreed to remand him in custody and refused to agree to bail, although both he and I applied for it and we could have produced adequate securities. He appeared again at the Moot Hall on Wednesday, May 3, when he protested that as a sincere anti-fascist, he felt that he must refuse to obey a fascist direction from whatever source it originated. He was sentenced to three months imprisonment.

On March 29 my son Robert was summoned to appear at Moot Hall Court on a similar charge for failing to obey a "direction" for an interview. He likewise did not present himself and a warrant was issued for his arrest. This was executed on Tuesday, April 4. He was brought before the court the next day, when he said he was proud to plead guilty for he felt that he was thus in the line of men who had won our liberties in the past by refusing to submit to bad and repressive laws. He was given three months with hard labour.

Alan and Robert are serving their sentences in Durham Prison. I am confident that they will both emerge from prison without serious hurt to body and mind for they will be sustained by the conviction that they are most effectively preserving their liberty and self respect.

With all good wishes in the great struggle.
Yours fraternally,
JOHN MORLEY.

ALBERTO PACITTI

In our April issue we directed attention to the internment under 18B of Alberto Antonio Pacitti and Gino Bertolini. The Duke of Bedford mentioned these cases in the House of Lords. These young men have been interned since June 1940.

The order for the detention of Alberto Antonio Pacitti was made because the Secretary of State held that he had reasonable cause to believe the said Alberto Antonio Pacitti to be of hostile associations and that by reason thereof it was necessary to exercise control over him.

The particulars related the following facts:

(1) Has been for some years a member of the Glasgow Branch of the Italian Fascist Party.

(2) Was Secretary and Political Secretary of the said Fascio di Glasgow, and also Secretary of the National Fascist Recreation in Glasgow, and Commander of the Italian Fascist Youth Abroad in Glasgow.

(3) Was extremely active in organising Italian Fascist activities in Glasgow.

Whilst we are and have ever been opposed to the Fascist movement in all its activities, since its inauguration, we believe in recognising the fact that Mussolini was eulogised by the present Prime Minister, visited and honoured by the late Ramsay MacDonald, and visited by the late King George V. These activities charged against Pacitti, therefore, do not argue anti-British feelings or activity.

It can be said that since 1923, in some way or another, Pacitti has been associated with Italian youth organisation in Glasgow. This fact does not indict Pacitti or justify his internment.

In September 1940, Pacitti had the honour, as he deemed it, of being the first to appear before the Anglo-Italian Advisory Committee. In a kind of braggadocio, he declared to his friends that it was logical to assume that he would be the last Anglo-Italian to be released.

Writing to a friend sometime ago, Pacitti explained his position:

Fascists are painted as double dyed villans, intolerant, narrow, bigoted, oppressors of the rights of man and bad eggs generally. I can truthfully state that I have never been taught to shout the other man down when he disagrees with me. Too often it has been found that all the rights do not belong to one group or party.

I have spent the past thirty-eight months as a detainee and all things considered it has been a very valuable experience. I have come across a fairly wide and representative cross section of society. Above all I have been convinced that "we're a' Jock Tamson's bairns." In the most trying and difficult conditions, Scotsmen, Englishmen, Irishmen, Italians, Germans, Welshmen, Dutchmen, etc., have shown that although their countries are busily engaged in the desperate strife now raging, they have been able to live together and pull together here inside the wire. This they have been able to accomplish not because they share the same political creed (hardly 40 per cent. of them are fascist) but simply because the vast majority of them realised that a man was a man before he was an Englishman or a German or an Italian. Although the national characteristics of each of us were and are fairly sharply defined, this barrier has proved to be most easily surmountable.

Why is it, that left to themselves, various nationalities can get on so well together?

I detest and abhor war—as I've always done. I have no hate in my heart for any people. In birth, manners, customs, education, even speech and thought, I am more English or rather British than Italian. I want to be allowed to live my own life in peace—to settle down and raise a family and be decent to my neighbours.

It must be remembered that the fathers of Alberto Pacitti and Gino Bertolini went down on the "Arandoro Star." The story of that ill-fated ship has been told well by Mr. F. Laffite, the adopted son of Dr. Havelock Ellis, in the Penguin Special (1940), "The Internment of Aliens." We shall retell this story later—one of the most sad and depressing of this war of many horrors, sufferings, and oppressions.

IT MIGHT HAVE HAPPENED TO YOU. "Word" Special Investigation Report on 18B. A most important and informing document. 1s. Post Free 1s. 2d.

CHURCHES AND THE LABOUR MOVEMENT

By The Rev. William J. Piggott

(Free Church Chaplain and Librarian Banstead L.C.C. Mental Hospitals, etc.)

[Reference is made in our Humanist pamphlet, "Why Jesus Wept," to the Rev. William J. Piggott, with whom I broke a lance over the question of Immortality in "The Spur" in 1915. At that time Comrade Piggott was a strong Socialist and Pacifist propagandist. He was victimised for his uncompromising Socialist Anti-Militarism in the Unitarian Church and was compelled to take refuge in the Presbyterian Church of England. Comrade Piggott is to-day Free Church Minister and Librarian at Banstead Mental Hospital, near Sutton, Surrey. He is Lecturer to the London County Council Evening Institutes. The present essay is reprinted from the "Carshalton Labour Herald" for June, 1937. It was a most powerful warning when written. It is a prophecy turned to challenge to-day.—Ed.]

For good or evil, mankind is now everywhere in the rapids of revolution and there is not one kingdom of human thought and action left unaffected. Everywhere the standards of revolt have risen or are rising fast and an extending crisis confronts the varying Churches of our own and every land.

For Rome, which is the largest ecclesiastical army, the decision has already been taken.

The shadow of Pagan Cæsarism looms behind her real rulers, however much vast multitudes of her followers profess a humbler and a kindlier faith. She has come to terms with Mussolini in Italy and she openly supports Franco in Spain and would willingly become the ally of Hitler, if only he would be reasonable enough (or shrewd enough even!) to let her alone. The genius of Rome is more and more openly Fascist. For Rome, every rising authoritative state is a natural sister for she will sanction and bless the grimmest nationalism in economics and politics, if only her international position in theology, and the hidden world of dominence by persuasion and agreement are allowed her.

For the Protestant Churches the position becomes daily more acute. Their growing financial needs have made internal federation a necessity and have also compelled a close relationship with the world of investment and finance.

A few outstanding men of commanding personality may still retain personal freedom, but even for them this largely exists because, so far, they have not clearly seen, let alone definitely challenged the arrogant claims of the Capitalist Oligarchy.

For the great mass of the rank and file, the central payment of stipends, the Advisory Boards, the superannuation plans, etc., are all part of a close and finely worked out system of control. Fewer and fewer rebels gain or retain promotion, and are more and more carefully sifted out.

The difference between an unbeneficed Anglican and the rank and file of the Nonconformist ministry on the one side and the married commercial or industrial worker on the other side, is steadily shrinking. Love for wife and children tend to compel both to a slavish submission, and lips are tied to a shameful silence in the presence of open wrong, by heart strings!

Far-reaching effects of mechanisation and rationalisation are also smoothing out the old difference between skilled and unskilled labour and between men's and women's output, and a new type of civilisation is being formed. If the Churches do not know that the hour of judgment and of visitation is upon them, they will try and maintain a defensive position as the ill-paid and scarcely respected mercenaries of Capitalism. They will become more and more an integral part of a dying culture, and, as in Russia, perish with that culture, because so saturated with its deadly outlook.

At present there is a lull in Britain, and the world of Trade Unionism and Labour, national and local, shows very little of a revolutionary spirit, but isolation from the wider international sweep of industry, trade and finance is impossible.

We are seeing the passing of an entire era, and a new age is visibly being born before our very eyes. Earth-wide changes in theology and religion must accompany the upthrust of a new civilisation, or the equally real danger of a world-wide collapse and barbarism. A judgment day of God visibly confronts Churches and men. For over 40 years I have been trying to show my fellow-Christians and especially my brother ministers, how inevitable this world crisis is.

The coming of efficient competition produces combines and trusts, and these give birth to monopolies, and these breed economic nationalism, and that reaches out to trading empires, and these expand to a point of tension, and so war breaks out. The very efficiency of new methods and machines causes less and less need of men, and that, with the growth of unemployment, means less and less home trade, and so the outer sweeping search for profit abroad grows swifter and wider, and the perils of wars for trade and colonies grows greater every year. If Democracy awakes and seizes the economic machine that means Socialism.

If the commercial and financial rulers of the economic machine capture and transform political democracy, then that means Fascism. Rome has openly accepted the latter and will, I believe, perish with it.

What will the Protestants do with the Christ enshrined in the Bethlehem of the Labour and Socialist Movement?

RELIGION AND WAR

BY C. H. NORMAN

The Duke of Bedford, in his comment on my article on this subject, suggests, as a criticism of the argument advanced therein, that it would involve "the acceptance of the idea that Christ was mistaken," etc. The following two quotations from a pamphlet written by me some years ago called "The Neutrality of God," will show that there is some reason for believing that the whole foundation of Christianity is open to serious rational criticism:

"Christianity has a second limb in its structure of belief, in that its leading prophet, Jesus Christ, is alleged to have been the Son of that Creator who described to the ancient Jewish prophets how he made the world, man anw woman, and that His Son was sent to the world by this Omnipotent Creator to redeem mankind from its sins, heralding forth a new morality and a new spiritual force for the upliftment of mankind. This redemption took the very odd form of the Creator sending His Son, Jesus Christ, among a small race of people living in a country called Judea, where this Son attacked the local ecclesiastics, who were Jewish rabbis and readers of the law, with the result that complaint was made against him of heresy and blasphemy, and he was arraigned before a Roman Governor, Pontius Pilate, convicted, sentenced to death, and executed. The Creator, thus having sent His only Son, as the exponent of this theory tell us (though why Christ was the only Son on their own account of the matter is not at all plain) on this extraordinary mission, retired seemingly from any further active display of interest in the world of a similar kind, because no Christian writer has ever pretended that there has been any second visit of any representative of the Creator since this disastrous incident in Judea in about the year A.D. 35; though, no doubt, the more enthusiastic religious believers invite one to see the hand of the Creator in everything of a beneficent character occurring in the world. One is further told that Christ's body vanished shortly after His burial and that His spirit ascended into heaven, and rejoined the Creator, presumably having fulfilled His mission on which He had been sent. . . .

"If Christ were sent to this world as a messenger from the Creator to redeem human character, it is certainly unfortunate that His teachings, as translated from the Greek transcription of the Hebrew, are so ambiguous that exactly opposite conclusions can be drawn from the various texts. . . .

"Certainly the Quaker and conscientious objector who relied upon that interpretation of Christianity which acclaimed Christ as the 'Prince of Peace' found the Christian gentlemen and theologians sitting on tribunals did not take their view, so they spent a period in prison, where they might reflect upon the vanities of human interpretation of Divine principles and teachings when such interpretation happened to come in collision with the needs of State, the fears of humanity, and the greed of the secret forces manipulating mankind."

After further discussion of the improbabilities associated with the three main religions, the pamphlet concluded:

"Sensational though the conclusion may be, an honest mind cannot arrive at any other judgment than that the story of the world's creation contained in the Bible is utterly false; that there is no such spiritual being of the character of the god or creator of religion; and that, though Christianity has advanced some excellent moral precepts for the conduct of mankind (which the exponents of Christianity carefully avoid following in their daily practices on the ground that performance of these precepts is not possible), as an explanation of the universe Christianity has nothing to tell which can satisfy the intelligence of any thoughtful and impartial inquirer, anxious to discover whether the human intellect has gained the key which will open the door to the secrets of the universe, without reference to other realms, spiritual or astronomical, of which the human mind has neither knowledge nor comprehension."

These passages are sufficient to show that the difficulty that the Duke of Bedford has referred to had been present to the writer's mind in weighing the improbability or probability of various religious beliefs. It is clear that the whole conception of Christ's own existence in the manner presented in the New Testament may be a myth propagated, like so many other ancient myths, for the collective satisfaction of certain human minds.

It is a melancholy fact that many millions of men have died in sincere defence of beliefs which turned out to be false. It is obviously the case with most soldiers who died in the Crusades and other wars. The fact that a person is prepared to die for a belief is no evidence of the truth of that belief: it is only some evidence that that particular person sincerely thinks that the particular belief is true, which is quite another matter. The Duke of Bedford and the writer, for instance, consider that most beliefs held by British politicians and public concerning the true causes of this war and the last war are maleficent delusions. It is also a fact, unfortunately, that most major beliefs held by the majority of mankind in all periods of history have been founded on the most fantastic and ridiculous ideas: as the study of any encyclopaedia of religious or political doctrines will establish beyond question. It is the credulity encouraged by the variety of religions which renders the masses always so helpless against the political and religious charlatans of their time, as a truly educated community is impossible where the individual mind is at an early age warped and coloured by the superstitious uses connected with religious beliefs.

TO ALL COMRADES.

This is an urgent appeal. We ask every comrade to help. The deficit on our paper is growing despite increased circulation. And we have the following pamphlets in the press:—

(1). A Call To Manhood. A collection of about 20 essays written between the years 1907 and 1943.

(2). At Grips With War. Third edition of this long out of print work.

We need help to meet the paper bills, which will be heavy. The works will be issued at an early date at a popular price, less than the actual cost of production.

THE EVOLUTION OF A CONCHIE

A Story of Two Wars and The Interlude

Other elements are opposed to the war because they don't see any fundamental difference between what they describe as British Imperialism and German Nazism. Some of the groups are knowns as militants and others as anti-parliamentarians.

—P. J. Dollan in "Forward." April 8, 1944.

Mr. Moffat may be right about some districts in Scotland, but is he sure that there are no political influences operating in other areas?

Does he deny that so-called groups of militants, Bedfordians, Trotskyists, and quick-step revolutionaries have been agitating in Lanarkshire for political rather than industrial reasons?

—P. J. Dollan in "Forward." April 15, 1944.

Like Judas of old, Sir Patrick Joseph Dollan is a pathetic figure. Judas is reputed to have committed suicide immediately after he had erred. Consciousness of his position destroyed him. He felt the urge of an inward soul. His tragedy was majestic. Sir Patrick survives without a soul. He is a man without a cause. His activity is reduced to a parade. Naturally, he has never liked the Anti-Parliamentarians. And now he has discovered another aversion—the Bedfordians! We congratulate him on his latest phrasing. "Bedfordians" is an exceellent term. It is more pleasing to the ear than the earlier phrase—the "Aldredites."

Dollan's career has been exposed very fully and in exact detail in these columns for June and August, 1939, and February, 1940. Unfortunately, these issues are obtainable now only in the three years' bound volume, and but a few of these volumes exist. They contained a very full factual account of Councillor P. J. Dollan's stand as a "conchie." It was an interesting exposure and brought together the following documentary and unanswerable record of Dollan's "conchie" pleading in 1917, and his war-recruiting activity in 1939. It contrasted the "conchie" Councillor against the militarist Lord Provost. Dollan did not suffer unduly as a "conchie." He did not suffer as a patriot, but benefitted enormously. There was contrast and sameness. It was an interesting study. Those who can should study the reports collected and published in the issues of this journal mentioned. We table them, although not necessarily in the exact order of our republication :—

(1) Report of the National Service Recruiting meeting addressed by Dollan and Sir Harry Lauder at the Lorne Cinema, Govan, on Sunday, May 28, 1939.

(2) Reproduction from Forward, for June 1, 1918, of Thomas Johnston's attack on Harry Lauder, accusing him of making a patriotic tour of the United States at £1000 per week return, or £66 per oratorical hour.

(3) Reproduction of Thomas Johnston's "War Points" attacks on Labour leaders who had accepted war honours, detailing their names, from Forward, September 1, 1917.

(4) Report of Dollan's arrest at the Central Police Court, Glasgow, on Tuesday, May 17, 1917, at the hearing of Councillor Shinwell's case for alleged assault at a peace meeting, which he defended against self-styled "patriots."

(5) Glasgow Herald, Thursday, May 24, 1917, report of Dollan's appearance at the Central Police Court, charged with being an absentee.

(6) Glasgow Herald, Friday, May 26, 1917, report of Central Police Court proceedings, when Dollan was found guilty. Dollan was fined 40 shillings and ordered to be handed over to the military authorities.

(7) Report same proceedings from Forward, June 2, 1917, headed: "Councillor Dollan Handed Over."

(8) Glasgow Evening Times (6th edition) for Wednesday, May 30, 1917, report of application on Dollan's behalf to the Stipendiary Magistrate for Dollan's interim liberation, pending the hearing of his appeal. The application was unsuccessful, but the Home Office released Dollan pending the hearing of his appeal. Dollan was advised that, if the appeal went against him, he was to hold himself at the disposal of the Home Office Committee that dealt with conscientious objectors. Thus, although he did spend a short time in Wormwood Scrubbs Prison, of which he subsequently made his literary most in the Socialist press, he never experienced sufferings like those who endured several court-martials.

(9) Glasgow Evening Times for Friday, August 31, 1917, report of the dismissal of his appeal, with £7 7s expenses. Unlike his hated Anti-Parliamentary critics, Dollan did not plead his cause before the High Court of Justiciary in person but was represented by counsel, instructed by solicitors in Edinburgh and Glasgow, for which the Labour movement paid. Contrast Dollan's experiences in court in Glasgow and Edinburgh against our own. But then we believe in Socialism and the power of logic. We believe in principles of law and jurisprudence, whether courts adhere to them or abuse them : in ethics of justice that must operate under any property system and are fundamental to human wellbeing and the rights of mankind. Dollan has not, and has never had, any higher inspiration than the instinct of careerism. We never sought the plaudits or approbation of the mob at the beginnings of our Socialist activity. We wait in no ante-room of the monarchy at its conclusion. Throughout our career we have asserted, as every true citizen should assert, principles of liberty and common sense and common good. We would be the voice of the common people inarticulate in their oppression and not the representative of their stupidity and ignorance. That is the difference, the essential difference, between the true Anti-Parliamentarian and the typical Parliamentarian : character versus repute, integrity versus career, principle versus opportunism.

In dismissing Dollan's appeal, the Lord Justice General employed the prejudiced and extra-legal but none the less scathing, militarist description of Dollan : "Of recruitable age and otherwise eligible."

This terrible phrase would have remained a mere expression of idle abuse, condemning the judge who abused his position to utter it, if the "conchie" Councillor of 1917 had not developed into the militarist over-age Lord Provost of 1939. Only then, twenty-two years later, did it acquire force. Yet the capitalist-militarist press that endorsed it in 1917 was anxious to forget it in 1939. Such are the ways of destructive society's hypocrisy. By his own conduct Dollan qualified for the description : "Of recruitable age and otherwise eligible."

(10) Forward for September 8, 1917 report of the Court of Justiciary decision against Dollan, picturing, as a conspiracy, the prohibition, by the Glasgow Magistrates, of a meeting of protest against Dollan's conviction.

(11) Hansard Commons Report for Tuesday, July 10, 1917, of MacCallum Scott's question concerning Dollan's exemption and the answer given by Munro, then Secretary of State for Scotland. Thomas Johnston now answers questions in much the same evasive way as Munro did in 1917.

(12) Article by William Gallacher (now M.P.) in The Worker for August 26, 1922, contrasting Dollan's behaviour as a "conchie" at Wakefield against his later conduct as a Glasgow Bailie.

After the war, en route to place, Dollan became quite a Bedfordian.

Consider Dollan's War Loan activities as Lord Provost of Glasgow during 1939-1941 and contrast against his activity in the Glasgow Town Council twenty years earlier. Remember that, but for that activity, he would never have secured the working-class support that enabled him to become Lord Provost.

Forward for Saturday, July 19, 1919, published a very full report of the Council meeting, from which we quote :—

GLASGOW TOWN COUNCIL

Labour Opposes "Victory" Loan

The fortnightly meeting of the Glasgow Town Council was held in the City Chambers on Thursday, 10th July, when Lord Provost Stewart presided. . . .

Labour Opposition to Victory Loan

The recommendation of the General Finance Committee that the Corporation should purchase £1,000,000 4 per cent. Funding Loan in the Victory Loan met with bitter opposition from the Labour Group.

Bailie Wheatley in moving that no investment be made, said that the whole thing had in it an element of farce. The Corporation had already invested £3,444,235 in War Loan securities, and every single penny of that enormous sum had to be borrowed. They had succeeded in repaying only £276,525 7/11, leaving still due to the banks and others before they embarked on this new proposal a balance of £3,167,709 12/1 still to pay. . . .

The Corporation, in fact, had no money. They had to go to the banks to borrow a certain amount of their paper, and hand it over to the Government. The credit of the Corporation was good, but the credit of the Government was better, for the credit of the Corporation depended on the credit of the Government. Therefore, would it not be better for the Government to borrow for itself? . . .

Councillor Dollan (Lab.), in seconding the amendment, said that the position was that they were going to borrow £1,000,000 at 5 per cent., and they were going to get 5 per cent. by investing it in War Loan, and then hand it over to the banks as their share of the plunder. . . .

When Wheatley said the money ought to be raised by taxing the wealthy people, a man sitting amongst them said it could be done if the Government were dishonest enough to do so. He wanted to tell them that if the people had acted like that man's firm, which had made huge profits during the war by plundering the people to such an extent that they had been able to recapitalise the firm, then one would have been justified in saying they were dishonest. . . .

Mr. Winston Churchill had stated that the Government were spending £100,000,000 a year in sending munitions, food supplies, and other war accessories to Russia, for the purpose of waging war against the people of that country. . . .

The whole thing was one of the most reactionary and unbusinesslike proposals ever brought before the Corporation.

On a vote being taken the Labour amendment was defeated by a large majority, only 11 voting for no investment.

In 1924 Dollan added to his "Socialist" repute by denouncing the Anti-Socialist activity of the Duke and Duchess of Atholl. His article in Forward for April 5 of that year was sub-headed "The Atholls Keep on Talking." The main caption jeered at "The Dear Duchess." When Maisky, the then Soviet Ambassador to Britain, had a "secret" meeting with the Duchess at Eastwood House, Dunkeld, on Saturday, July 15, 1939, she became, to the "Communists," "The Red Duchess."

Dollan's opening paragraph explained :—

The Duke and Duchess of Atholl have been appointed chief propagandists for the Tories in Scotland. The Duke is now the recognised leader of Scottish Toryism, and is much in demand for anti-Socialist propaganda. The Duchess is also receiving unusual publicity for her criticisms of Socialism and Socialists.

Dollan proceeded to comment on the fact that the Duke had raised £100,000 for Anti-Socialist propaganda :—

This huge sum was collected by a levy on rich individuals and businesses, who stand to gain by the retention of Capitalism. . . . the Duke and Duchess will attempt to convince plain folk that the workers and our old nobility have common interests to defend.

Dollan bitterly attacked the Duchess for a speech she made in Glasgow on Monday, March 31, 1924, warning local Tories "against the soothing syrup of the modern Socialist Government." Dollan summarised her speech and commented :—

She declared men and women at 21 years of age were too young to have the Franchise. Men, so the Duke might say, are competent to fill the trenches at 21; but that is an easy job compared with placing ballot papers in a ballot box in an election.

Having quoted from her speech passages eulogising the capitalist system, Glasgow, and the Empire, Dollan commented that her speeches did not help her object to maintain the system. He added :—

"Scotland's only woman M.P. thinks the system that has produced Glasgow and the Empire is a most excellent one, which ought to be preserved.

Dollan added :—

Her Grace evidently holds the view that a city which has 300,000 persons existing on doles and allowances, is something to be proud of. These 300,000 victims of private enterprise may not agree with her.

As Parliamentary candidate for Ayr in 1925, Dollan continued to denounce the aristocracy. A speech made the previous day was reported in

The Daily Herald for Friday, July 12, beneath the headings :—

TORIES' SORRY RECORD

Mr. Dollan's Vigorous Exposure

And here is the Daily Herald's account of what Dollan said :—

Mr. Dollan said that the worker was more important than a duke, and he claimed that the Marquis of Dungarees should have preference over the Duke of Portland. The working man's wife was the equal of any duchess, and the children of the poor were as much entitled to enjoy the fruits of labour as the children in Buckingham Palace. He claimed equal rights for all children.

Dollan continued in this anti-militarist posing as late as 1938, down almost to the time that he became Lord Provost. In Forward for October of that year he published an article headed :—"Guns Before Social Services."

Dollan wrote :—

Make the National Government pay for national services should be the slogan of all Labour candidates in the Scottish municipal elections.

Denouncing the State for throwing the burden of Public Assistance on local authorities, and maintaining that Poverty was a national and not a local problem, Dollan added, in heavy type :—

The Cabinet, apparently want all the money for rearmament, and will spend it on guns rather than relief, if we allow them to get away with it.

And then came the Second World War!

"Of recruitable age and otherwise eligible," said the then Lord Justice General from the Bench of the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh on Friday, August 31, 1917. Such was conchie Councillor P. J. Dollan. Beyond recruitable age and no longer eligible, was Lord Provost P. J. Dollan in 1939. Se he donned his uniform and went reviewing and recruiting. What a satire! What hypocrisy!

On National Service Cinema Sunday, 1939, Lord Provost Dollan spoke, with Sir Cecil M. Weir, K.B.E., M.C., Sir Alexander B. Swan, and others at the Regal, New Savoy, Paramount, and Cranston Cinemas on behalf of National Service. At other cinemas, Moderate Councillors and nondescript Colonels spoke on the same theme. In all, war appeals were made at fifteen cinemas. All who participated knew Dollan's 1917 record and attitude.

The Evening Times for July 8, 1939, published an article headed "'Mr. Dollan Goes to America," sub-title "Glasgow's Rousing Send-Off." The letter-press showed how little real social antagonism there exists between Labourists and Tories, how harmoniously they operate as representatives of class society. We make some excerpts :—

To the stirring rhythm of pipe music by the band of Glasgow Corporation Transport Department Lord Provost P. J. Dollan and Mrs. Dollan last night walked up the gangway of the Anchor liner Transylvania at Yorkhill Quay on the first stage of their visit to New York at the invitation of Mayor La Guardia.

Several of his colleagues in the Corporation were on board and gave him a "civic" send-off after he had been welcomed to the liner by Captain Bone.

Among the many telegrams which the Lord Provost received on board was one from Sir Kingsley Wood, Minister of Air, and one from Mr. John Colville, Secretary of State for Scotland, who both wished him every success in his mission.

Good wishes were also extended to the Lord Provost at a sending off ceremony on board by Sir Alexander Swan, a former Lord Provost of Glasgow; Mr. David Kirkwood, M.P.; Treasurer Ernest Greenhill, Commander T. D. Galbraith, and Mr. Howard A. Bowman, United States Consul.

He is accompanied by Mrs. Dollan, two secretaries, Council Officer Thomas Wilson, and colleagues Hugh Fraser, John F. Wilson and Hector McNeill.

Note David Kirkwood's good wishes. But how did Dollan's trip to the United States benefit the poor of Govan or the workers of Clydebank?

Ross Kennedy in "I Cover the Waterfront" article contributed to the Scottish Daily Express for July 8, 1939, gave Dollan's send-off a big head-line : "P. J. Gets 'Piping Send-Off.'" He wrote a series of typical boosting paragraphs from which we quote :—

Lord Provost P. J. Dollan was piped aboard the Anchor liner Transylvania last night by Glasgow Police band, with the civic flag flying at her foremast.

He was accorded the biggest send-off any one man has had from the Clyde in recent years. . . .

Ex-Lord Provost Sir Alexander Swan called the lord provost the fastest man Glasgow has ever had in the position. . . .

It was typical of the man, he said, that he would only travel in a Glasgow ship of a Glasgow company.

He offered the advice that the lord provost should take care of himself, not overdo things, and charged Mrs. Dollan with the greatest care of him. . . .

The lord provost remarked that since he took office he has known no party, no creed, no class, no naticnality, but has found the support of them all. . . .

This appalling rubbish was a pure mockery of the suffering of the common people. The Anti-Socialist blubber was poured out continuously in the capitalist press of Glasgow. Very little attention was paid to the visit in the New York press, in which the references were moderate and subdued. The contacts made were all capitalistic and Anti-Socialist.

Writing in the Glasgow Evening News for July 26, 1939, Dollan described his view of the Hudson River and Manhattan from the top of the Empire State Building. His guide was Al Smith, four times Governor of New York State. Dollan continued :—

The chairman and director of the National City Bank, Wall Street, one of the largest financial concerns in America, gave a luncheon in honour of Mrs. Dollan and myself.

We chatted long and seriously about British and international affairs. . . .

What could Dollan have to say to these people that mattered to the working-class of New York or to the working-class of Govan?

In the Evening Times, Glasgow, for August 11, 1939, Dollan published his first impressions of New York. We excerpt :—

When the Transylvania arrived it was boarded by groups appointed by the Mayor and Scots societies to give a welcome. This took more than an hour, during which I had to wear my robes and chain for the pleasure of the Scots exiles and the gratification of the New Yorkers, who had never seen such garments. . . .

Only three sentences in the entire article matter, and these make no suggestion of the Socialist solution in which Dollan is supposed by his Govan supporters to believe. Describing New York, Dollan says :—

It is a city of paradox and bewildering contrasts. Probably the richest city in the world, it has also 600,000 persons unemployed or on relief and over 500,000 families in what are officially described as slums or congested houses. It will need a tremendous effort to solve the poverty and unemployment problem.

Compare this reference to New York poverty with Dollan's 1924 comment on Glasgow's poverty. Like British capitalists, the capitalists of the United States have no intention to solve the problem.

The Sunday Mail, Glasgow, for July 31, 1939, published the following paragraph, with the heading in bold type, set out to occupy four lines :—

MEN IN DOCK BLESSED MR. DOLLAN

New York, Saturday.

The fact that Lord Provost Dollan visited Harlem district court to-day was a lucky break for seven offenders. Judge Bromberger let them off very lightly as a compliment to Glasgow's civic chief.

"God bless Glasgow" said one coloured man. . . .

Sat On Bench

One British citizen who was brought before the Court while the Lord Provost was there was put on probation for two years.

The Lord Provost was given a seat on the bench, permitted to examine papers in the cases and consulted regarding the Court's decisions. . . .

Lord Provost Dollan was greatly impressed with the care and scrupulous fairness shown during the trials.

This performance was merely so much cheap play-acting, pleasant holiday nonsense, mocking the actual sufferings of the common people.

On the night of July 24, 1939, Dollan was the guest of honour at a dinner aboard the Anchor Liner California at her West Tenth Street Pier. Captain Robert Smart, of the steamship, was the host at the dinner. Stanley H. Howe, executive secretary to Mayor La Guardia, praised Dollan as a man who had "captured the hearts of Americans as no other foreign visitor since Queen Elizabeth came to these shores."

Reporting the luncheon next day, the New York Times used the heading : "Mayor of Glasgow is Guest on Liner."

The same paper four days later (July 29) published a news article headed "Glasgow Executive Finds Trip Cheap." We excerpt :—

Mr. Dollan, who led 2,000 Scottish visitors here this month for the World's Fair, will sail Tuesday on the Anchor liner Cameronia for Glasgow.

"We have found that a trip to America need not be an expensive holiday," Mr. Dollan said.

The Evening News, Glasgow, for Tuesday, August 1, 1939, published an article from Dollan, dated "New York, Tuesday," headed "Mr. Dollan's tribute to New York." Here is an extract :—

Never in my 26 years of public life have I met such hospitality as I have received in New York. . . .

Last night Mrs. Dollan and myself were guests of honour at a farewell dinner in the Ritz Carlton, New York, presided over by Mr. George McAneny, Chairman of the World's Fair.

Dollan reached Glasgow on Thursday, August 10. His sojourn in New York extended over 12 week days. During that period he addressed 23 public meetings, not one of them a Socialist meeting. The Mayoral suite at the World Fair was placed at his disposal. He was principal guest at a civic luncheon, attended by a company of about 500, in the Waldorf Astoria Hotel.

The Evening Times for August 10, 1939, published a heading set out in four lines of large type :—

BRONZED AND FIT, MR. DOLLAN WELCOMED AT CORPORATION

There is no need to reproduce the letter-press.

On October 26, 1939, it was announced that Lord Provost Dollan was the first winner of the St. Mungo Prize of £1000.

Interviewed by the Scottish Daily Express, Dollan said :—

The work I have done for this city in the last three years is, if I may say so, just the kind of work in which I have been engaged since entering public life 25 years ago.

Which statement certainly took no account of Dollan's evolution from a "conchie" to a militarist.

The same day the press announced the cost of Dollan's visit to New York as follows :—

LORD PROVOST IN NEW YORK—£486

Glasgow Lord Provost's visit to New York and Paris cost the city £586.

Lord Provost Dollan, who was appointed by the corporation to visit the World Fair in New York, was accompanied by council officer Tom Wilson. Bill came to £486.

They visited Paris, accompanied by Mrs. Dollan, to attend the United Associations of Great Britain and France.

During the year Dollan visited London and Birmingham

Lord Provost Dollan—fifteen days on official visits to Birmingham (three days), London (12 days). Travelling expenses, £23; personal expenses, £47—total £71.

In due course Dollan accepted a knighthood.

The Evening Times for January 7, 1941, published the following report :—

MR DOLLAN ON WHY HE TOOK KNIGHTHOOD

The Lord Provost told members of Clyde Trust at a meeting to-day in Glasgow why he accepted the honour of knighthood when he replied to their congratulations. . . .

"I feel from the messages I have received from all parts of the world that my decision was right. Those messages have come, not to me in my capacity as Lord Provost, but to Glasgow in recognition of the great contribution the city has made in the war effort."

Which is a rather neat statement from a man who owes his career to having been a "conchie" Councillor and a Socialist anti-militarist!

PEACE PLANNING and the Post-War World

By Stephen Hobhouse

[We print below the more important portions of a small pamphlet recently issued by the P.P.U. entitled "An Open Letter to Peace Planners." The writer has the support of active members of the P.P.U., F.O.R., and the Society of Friends. The pamphlet can be obtained, 4d. post free, from the P.P.U., 6 Ensleigh Street, London, W.C.1.—Ed.]

Many who are able to look beyond the conclusion of the war are now engaged in thinking out or even drafting the outlines of a post-war world-settlement for stable peace, to be commended for adoption by the Governments of the "United Nations" or at least by those of Britain and America. Some of us feel that, admirable as are many of the provisions included in these drafts, the diagnosis of the existing world-situation is usually superficial, the depth and extent of the spiritual evil and of human deterioration is underrated, and too little attention is paid to the guidance of history. Against such a background and for the reasons set out below, present-day planning of a good world-peace appears to us most unlikely to be productive of anything practical in the nearer future.

Political prophecy has always been hazardous, even for an Isaiah; yet realistic considerations, both material and psychological, seem to point as a major probability to a situation, at the end of this phase of the war that started in 1914, in which the Anglo-Saxon capitalist-democracies will at most have only a very temporary and superficial control of the great bulk of European and Asiatic peoples. Some, perhaps most, of these are likely to be ruled by severely totalitarian Governments on the Russian Communist model, others by rulers more of the fascist type.

But, whatever the precise post-war political situation may be, history seems to indicate that the reorganisation and redemption of society on really human, that is, on Christian lines will not in the future any more than in the past be best promoted from "above", but from "below", by groups of pioneers, the true "Church", not necessarily all Christian dogma, but increasingly akin in their humane and and religious outlook. We may expect them to be intermittently, sometimes savagely, persecuted; later on to be tolerated as valuable economic or cultural assets to the state. After a time these groups would, by permeation and example, come to have a very powerful effect for good on the autocratic materialists who are likely to be ruling the world-state or states, leading them on to experiments in true democracy, i.e. a régime based on liberty and justice and a vigorous social conscience that is predominantly pacifist.

In spite of the very different outlook prevalent today and the present weakness of "community" groups and pioneering Churches, we think that it is to similar agents, rather than to the organisation of the world by Governments, that spiritually-minded men will again look for the gradual building up of a truly democratic and economically harmonious world-civilisation in a later era better educated and readier for it.

One of the major causes of present disasters is the fact that the spiritual leaders of Europe have in past centuries failed to accept and develop the faith taught and practised by Christ as regards (i) goodwill and forgiveness towards enemies, (ii) refusal to take part in the infliction of "retributive" punishment, and (iii) the gradual working out of "non-violent" methods of resisting and neutralising evil men and unjust rulers, so that ultimately it may even be possible to police the world without swords or machine guns in the cupboard.

On the side of economic and social justice another major cause has been the failure of the "Churches" (in the widest sense) to deal with the new and terrible problems thrust upon us by the application of machinery to human industry and life. This, not only as regards the allowing of production for private profit to take the place of production for use, but in accepting an all-devouring system of standardised, power-driven mass production. We believe it can be shown that the almost fully mechanised industrialism of today is one of the primary causes of both chronic unemployment and total war, as well as of the gradual degradation of the image of God into the half-mechanized, half-hypnotised "mass-man" who is becoming more common now than ever before.

One of the greatest miracles of the machine-age is the radio, and notwithstanding certain admirable features the total effect of broadcasting, as it functions in war-time, must be reckoned as definitely harmful to the love of truth, goodness, and beauty. Some of it does, however, serve the useful purpose of revealing, to those who have ears to hear, in all its naked ugliness and pathos, the situation into which our industrial civilisation has brought us.

Thus there is a terrible significance in many of the "feature" programmes from the war-industries "front", as produced by the B.B.C. with great ingenuity and elaboration. One of these recently took as the hero, so to speak, of its story a shell from its birth in a British factory to its death, in a blaze of glory, among a company of German lads on a North African battlefield. We listened to men and women workers expressing joy and pride in the progress of their united creation, and speeding it from workshop to its ultimate billet in mangled human flesh.

Punch! Punch! hammer! hammer! . . . in frequent broadcasts one may hear the cheerful voices of women who had left their place as home-makers to spend each day endlessly repeating the same mechanical process, as their share in the manufacture of a single part of some elaborate instrument of death.

"I'm a girl in a Royal Ordnance factory. I started as a clerk in the office there; but Jim, he's on a fighting plane. I wanted to fill his shells; six hundred of them he fires off in one minute. Oh dear! it's an awful lot. How many can I help to make in a minute? Quick, turn that handle on the left, press that handle on the right . . . Oh no, it's not dull, it's so exciting, every bit of it. It's my first night-shift, you know . . . I wonder . . . I suppose . . . yes, all over Europe girls have been driven through this cold night to factories, hidden away just like this, to make bombs and shells—yes, thousands of German girls filling shells all to kill my Jim! God make him, make them all come back!"

Oh, the infinite pity and torment of it! All over the "civilised" world girls and mothers working in feverish haste to feed the cunning artificers of death, the fiery death that is to blast their beloveds. Hearing words like these, part of a carefully prepared propaganda talk by a gifted actress, one need only have a little common-sense, to perceive in this fatal enslavement the near, the dangerously near approach of our human society to the logical and historical finale of the age of the unrestricted machine.

To sum up—with preponderatingly pacifist convictions in both people and Government, without some well-balanced combination of common ownership and co-operation with free craftsmen, without a public opinion, moreover, ready drastically, where the need arises, to restrict by general agreement the use of machinery and of applied chemistry and biology in the interests of simple living, health and beauty, of "joy in widest commonality spread"—without all these, no peace will be secure. The prophetic voices able and ready to lead mankind into a society of this character are too few or too weak as yet. Most of our leaders in Church and State have no conception of the tremendous forces of ill-will, disruption, and, by mere reaction, of selfish inertia, which worse, much worse perhaps than in 1918, are being unleashed by the present prolonged savagery.

We find ourselves faced today with an utterly unprecedented world-orgy of distruction, a kind and degree of war to which there have been harnessed nearly all the brains and hands of a world of mechanized mass-production with its manifold prejudices and illusions stimulated by the hourly propaganda of wireless, printing-press, and films; and there is forced upon us the inescapable conviction that this total war must inevitably, by the moral laws inherent in history, continue to produce after its ostensible conclusion an almost irrestible tendency to anti-social acts of violence and greed, which will find many fresh channels of development against real or imagined enemies, within and without the State. Every additional week of war, each new masterstroke of monstrous devastation, darkens the prospect before us.

In the lovely summer days of this year we all read or heard of the destruction by young British airmen of the great dams of Western Germany, resulting, as could not fail to have been anticipated, in enormous consequent loss of human lives and homes and means of subsistence. A writer in the "New English Weekly" has truly said that the almost complete absence in the British Press (and, I think, radio) of anything but admiring praise for this sinister exploit, this "unloosing upon a whole population of a vast natural catastrophe comparable to a tidal wave or an earthquake," is "ominous for the future of Europe." "Were we a Christian people, we should at least have decreed a day of mourning for so sombre and menacing a success."

Such exploits are surely setting in motion, in that spiritual medium which controls the consciousness of humanity, currents of destructiveness which will need to work themselves out during long years to come in other forms of demoralising and corrupting activity. The only alternative possibility would be the occurrence, unexampled hitherto in history, of a moral miracle, dependent on the widespread grasping by men and women of the supernatural powers available in that spiritual region only reached by the contemplation of God's perfections, a miracle coming perhaps soon enough to cause the abandonment now of the dominant demands for a knock-out blow and unconditional surrender and the willingness to take some military risks in the interests of humanity and justice. Otherwise, such public selfishness and apathy as made it impossible in peacetime to bring to an end the daily slaughter on our roads, the product of our craze for machinery and speed, must be intensified, tenfold perhaps, by the inevitable reactions following the strained enthusiasms of war.

Instances are cited by the author of religious groups and movements in past centuries which purified social life "from below."

THE DISEASE CALLED WAR

A SOLDIER'S VIEW

In these columns for May, 1939, we reported the lecture delivered by Coy. Sergt. Major Franklin, M.C., to the Inns of Court Training Corps, on July 19, 1918. The lecture was published in pamphlet form and distributed among members of the corps, inscribed "not for publication." The lecture was endorsed and applauded by the commanding officer, Lt. Col. H. L. Stevens, D.S.O. The pamphlet recorded, in cold print, official encouragement to kill wounded German soldiers and German prisoners-of-war. Subsequently the War Office suppressed the pamphlet. Some copies fell into the hands of the No More War Movement and it was broadcast in pamphlet form, with an introduction by Lt. Col. Arthur Osburn, D.S.O. We reproduced the lecture and Lt. Col. Stevens' eulogy but not Lt. Col. Osburn's criticism.

Lt. Col. Osburn's military credentials were as follows:

Educated King's College and Guy's Hospital. Boer War in the Queen's Own Dorset Hussars as a private, afterwards a temporary captain. Medal and three clasps. Served in Artists' Rifle Volunteers. M.R.C.S.(Eng.), L.R.C.P.(Lond.). Entered R.A.M.C. Service in India, China, Burma, etc. Served in Great War with 4th Dragoon Guards. D.S.O. and Bar. Five mentions. Thanks of French Government. 1918 Commandant of Training Depot at Addington. Commandant, School of Military Hygiene, Carrickfergus. Staff Officer to G.O.C. Irish Rebellion and to G.O.C. Army of the Rhine.

Declaring that the real case against war or mass murder was the horrible moral declension that accompanied it, Lt. Col. Osburn continued:

Our war-mongers are fond of abusing the neurotic and effeminate, the perverted and abnormal types who, they suggest, are often to be found in the Pacifist ranks. But it is these very types which war conditions must eventually produce. The strain of war conditions on pregnant mothers and very young children, the deprivation of wholesome foods and, in particular, the prolonged strain on the potential fathers inevitably produce in the succeeding generation a high percentage of under-sexed or inverted types, amongst whom the craving for drink, drugs and excitement is very noticeable.

Dishonesty, violence, corruption and all the evils our "patriots" and war-mongers feel must be resisted, even at the cost of fascism and civil war, are prevalent. This degeneracy is but symptomatic of the demoralisation which originates in sadistic incitement to Mass Murder. Bellicose fathers complain that their eldest son or daughter—a "war baby"—is effeminate or neurotic, ineffectual or abnormal, delicate in physique and uncertain in mind; but they fail to realise that these peculiarities in their offspring are the indirect effects of their own pugnacity. It is not Peace but War that multiplies the degenerate and kills off the more high-spirited and generous of our youth. Privation and terror always increase the percentage born of the physically and mentally unfit. The hysterical sadism and moral confusion in post-war Germany has been a striking example. Our pugnacious patriots pretend that war should be a purifying influence—it is and always must be the very reverse.

War may once have been necessitated by scarcity of food or over-population, but modern discoveries promise us unlimited food supplies and the power to curb by rational means a too rapid increase in population. So the two fundamental causes of war are no longer operative, and it has become meaningless, futile and unnecessary. Since war was always unpleasant and wasteful, it now fulfils the definition of a real Perversion. To-day it is not the Pacifists who can be accused of perversion, but the war-mongers. Personally in the three wars in which I have had experience, both as a combatant and a regimental doctor, I have been something of a profiteer. Medals and decorations, promotion, well-paid jobs and a pension have all come my way, but I feel war is no more a healthy outlet for surplus energy than is a bout of Delirium Tremens or an attack of Diphtheria—but is just a noxious disease which all brave and sensible men and women would wish to put in quarantine because it is debilitating and demoralising. . . .

Unemployment, the dreary routine of our drab cities and the absence of gaiety make many of our young people long for war as an adventure, though there is plenty of fighting for them to do in combating disease, poverty, profiteering, ignorance and stupidity, as well as in opposing the forces of nature that for ever menace the happiness and prosperity of the race.

THE FORGOTTEN INDIVIDUAL

Dr. C. E. M. Joad has written somewhere that: "In the life of modern society the individual is conceived as an expression of the State's will, as a drop of blood in an ocean of racial purity, as a cog in a proletarian machine, as a unit in an industrial ant-state." Our job who believe in man as the Divine creator is to work to rescue him from the clutches of all those authorities which would subordinate him to their will and power. The only justification for any kind of authority—Political, Industrial, Educational—if our view of the importance and value of the individual is true is, that it should make it possible for man to develop his God-given faculties; to live his life in perfect freedom, to live that full and abundant life which Jesus said was every man's right. But as Oscar Wilde said many years ago, "Society forces man into a groove in which he cannot freely develop what is wonderful and fascinating and delightful in him."

And that is still the condemnation of society—that in the multifarious demands it makes on man, it tends to crush out his individuality, his personality, and to reduce him from his God-like stature to the degrading level of a mere mechanical Robot. Authority demands that when it issues its decrees we shall submit ourselves to them with unquestioning obedience—"ours not to reason why, ours but to do and die"—to dance to its tune, to respond, and quickly to the crack of its whip and to surrender, at its dictation, the promptings of the Divine Spirit within us. The conscience which is the voice of God in our souls and the mind with which we are endowed to reason and think for ourselves . . . The citizen of a Democracy has the right and the obligation to resist all attempts to impose upon him any way of life that would limit the full development of his faculties, and would deny him the free exercise and expression of conscience and reason, which would trample on his essential dignity as a human being in whom dwells the Divine Spirit; and the Christian ought to protest against and to resist with all the energy he can, all those tyrannous demands made upon him by any outside power which would cut at the very root of his God-given personality. "With the Nazarene, join the small elect circle of God's splendid rebels, learn the lesson of the Divine necessity of the rebel. Join the prophets and help usher in a world free and untrammelled: a God-like world, full of initiators, inventors and creators, and co-workers with the Immanent Spirit"; and if and as we do that we shall help ourselves and encourage others to recover their forgotten individuality.

—From an Address given at the Portsmouth Unitarian Church by the Rev. Charles H. Cole.

RICHARD CARLILE

We have published several press notices of the books issued by The Strickland Press on Richard Carlile: "Life," by Aldred, 1s 9d; Jail Journal, by Carlile, 2s 3d; Carlile and The Surgeons, by Brook, 2s 3d. These prices include postage. The three will be sent, post free, for 6s. They are invaluable records of the struggle for freedom of thought in Britain from the time of the French Revolution to the hungry 'forties.

The Countryman, published at Idbury, Oxfordshire, in its Spring 1944 number, gives the following notice to Dr. Brook's book:—

Carlisle city and Carlyle (Thomas) everybody knows, but too few have heard of Carlile. . . . you may read the story of this gallant reformer in "Carlile and the Surgeons" and marvel at the social advance in a century. Shelley and Keats protested against a sentence of three years and a fine of £1,500; the Duke of Wellington wanted the sturdy bookseller transported. Refusing to pay the fine or find securities, he remained in prison for six years (see his "Jail Journal," same publisher, 2s.) Indeed he served three terms of imprisonment. He it was who said, "It is not in the power of man to insult me; human nature is capable of a dignity that will not leave room for insult." His cell in Dorchester gaol was shared for two years by his devoted wife, and one of his children was born there.

PACIFISM AND NUMBERS

Under the heading "Provocative Pacifism," The Cheshire Observer, in its issue for December 13th, 1943, attacked our comrade, Rhys Davies, M.P., for his pacifist activity, and commented on the smallness of a meeting he addressed in Chester. Comrade Davies replied in a strong letter published by our contemporary in its issue for January 1 of this year. We quote part of Rhys Davies' reply:—

There is a great Cathedral in Chester and dozens of other churches, all built ostensibly to propagate the same gospel propounded by the Saviour 2,000 years ago. His audience on occasions was even smaller than our; it numbered only 12, with a Judas thrown in, by the way. You should peep in on a Sunday to see how many attend your places of worship at Chester!

At one time, with Mr. J. H. Thomas on the same platform, I spoke to several thousand people on your Radio, to find to my regret later on that political thought in Chester is as immovable as its ancient Walls, and that Chester is the Noah's Ark of British politics.

Then, I have sat in the House of Commons on more than one occasion in the past, when our present Prime Minister had no more than the proverbial dozen listening to him.

The largest visible audience I ever addressed was at Thingvadler in 1930, when 30,000 people gathered together at the millennary celebrations of the establishment of Icelandic Parliament; and although the crowd cheered me vociferously, I was assured that not more than a dozen understood a word I said.

And so, numbers do not influence me when I am on the platform, especially when I endeavour to debunk Government Press and Radio propaganda, and try to dispel hatred between nations artificially engendered for ulterior motives.

I have lived too long and travelled too much to be affected by such foul slogans in my lifetime, as the "Brutal Boers," "French Froggies," the "Unspeakable Turks," the "Bolshevik Baboons," or the "Cruel Huns." I detest this vulgar arrogance and conceit on our part. . . .

There must have been at least 2,000 wars waged since the birth of Christ, and most of them, like that of 1914-18, have created many more problems than they set out to solve, and the present conflict will fall into the same category.

You are obviously of the majority who support every war in which our country is engaged; I am of the minority who believe that the genius of the British people could be better employed in preventing wars and keeping the peace. Your patriotism probably regards warfare as a glorious adventure; I, on the other hand, believe it to be the foulest instrument that men ever devised.

In any case, war and peace are arranged by Governments; the common folk everywhere are just the fodder that feed the furnaces of the few. I believe that my kinsmen have entered into too many international commitments; more than our small island population can sustain, and if my feeble appeals to small groups will not avail them, they might ponder over the weighty words of their hero, General Smuts, who, by the way, during the Boer War, was regarded by the majority of our people as just as much of a scoundrel as Hitler is to-day.

The militarists of every country are as insane as the old woman of the fable who spent all day begging candles and matches, so that she might do her housework at nights. And, as some of the people who read your paper may profess Christian principles, they might allow a paraphrase into modern language of the verse which would then read thus: "And the condemnation is this, that light came into the world, and the people, including 'The Cheshire Observer,' preferred the black-out."

SOCIALISM IN LANARKSHIRE

A great deal is being published in the capitalist press concerning Socialist activity in Lanarkshire. We feel justified, therefore, in reviewing the work of our Motherwell comrade, W. E. Currie, who is responsible for the Motherwell I.L.P. Open Forum, and has persuaded parliamentary and anti-parliamentary comrades in Lanarkshire to come together in a grouping of the United Socialist Movement.

Comrade Currie, and his immediate comrades, are not concerned with party or sectarian divisions. Their aim is to develop the widest possible movement; a movement of varied Socialist thought and reading, all tending to final unity in struggle. They wish to evolve a living witness of protest against the horrors of war; and, taking Lanarkshire as the area in which they live and work, within its boundaries to create a practical fellowship of thought and action that will influence, inspire, and recreate the Socialist movement throughout Britain.

The United Socialist Movement in Lanarkshire would liquidate, in a vital movement of direct proletarian contact, all sectarianism and all opportunity towards careerism. All activity would function in an environment of actual criticism. The concept is one of sweeping regional unity and a nation-wide federation of district-powerful Socialist activity. So-called national bodies would be reduced to mere propaganda and cultural agencies of thought. A most important function. But action would be dictated not by national parties but result from district association and understanding. A real movement of the common people impelling and compelling unity of action combined with individual freedom of thought and power of criticism.

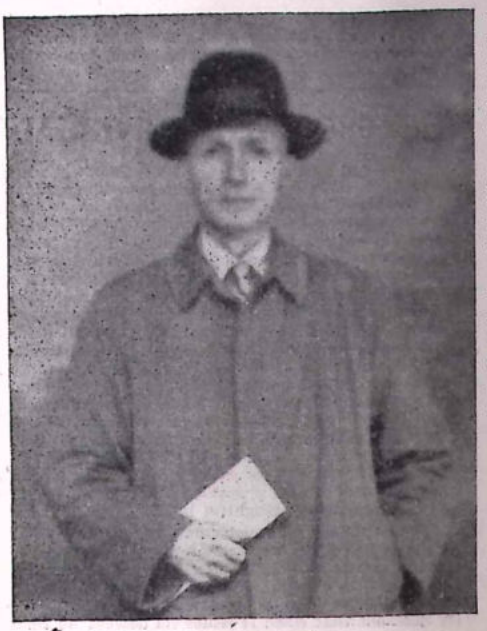
Comrade Currie has been struggling to make this movement possible since the conclusion of the First Great War. It is of interest, therefore, to review his activity. The story is that of an awakened and disillusioned soldier who said, "Never again," and meant it.

Comrade Currie served in France during the last war from 1914-17. Towards the end of the war, he became an avowed pacifist and suffered imprisonment for his opinions and stand.

Upon his discharge from the army, Currie played a prominent part in the fight for what was termed "adequate pensions for disabled ex-service men." He appeared with numerous cases before the Appeal Court. A Socialist and Pacifist, he was the ex-serviceman's champion. Under the seven years' limits many claimants were denied pensions on the grounds that their disability was not due to war service. Currie's consistent agitation was instrumental in having the seven years' limit abolished. Consequently many claims for pensions were reviewed. He was commended for this work by Tom Johnstone, now Secretary of State for Scotland, and presented with a full length portrait by the Rev. James Barr, then M.P. for Motherwell. Tribute to his pacifist activity was paid by George Lansbury and Dick Sheppard.

Currie organised anti-war meetings in many parts of the country and W.E.C. Peace slogans became famous throughout Britain. Many of these slogans were displayed during Peace Week in Glasgow, and in March, 1938, were published in the Scottish Free Press, the organ of the Scottish Socialist Party, on the recommendation of P. J. Dollan, so soon to become Glasgow's militarist Lord Provost.

In April 1938 Currie organised "No More War" demonstrations in Motherwell. In the same year he assisted in the presentation to Mr. Chamberlain of a mass petition on behalf of prematurely aged and disabled ex-Servicemen the majority of whom had no pension at all. This petition was ignominiously rejected by the then Prime Minister on the plea that the nation could not afford to grant these claims. (To-day the same country is spending untold millions daily on death and destruction.) Denouncing charitable funds and flag days for disabled ex-Servicemen, Comrade Currie's slogan was "Pensions, Not Poppies."



W. E. CURRIE

In May 1939 Currie formed a branch of the No-Conscription League in Motherwell. He issued a Manifesto against Conscription, which was widely distributed. He organised public meetings and demonstrations throughout Lanarkshire protesting against the passing of the Conscription Bill. In June 1939 he was awarded a diploma by the Union of Democratic Control for an essay on Peace.

On the outbreak of war hundreds of young men, Socialists and Christians opposed to war, from all over Lanarkshire who were liable for registration under the National Service Armed Forces Act attended the meetings in Motherwell. A Special Committee under Comrade Currie was set up to give advice and to provide representation for conscientious objectors attending the Tribunals. From the outset of the Tribunal hearings the services of Comrade Currie were in constant demand, both at the Glasgow Tribunal and the Appellate Tribunal in Edinburgh. These activities became known to the Parliamentary Peace Aims Group of the Labour Party, and Comrade Currie assisted at meetings addressed by Rhys Davies, M.P., and the Rev. James Barr, M.P.

In March 1941 Comrade Currie forwarded a widely signed petition from the people of Lanarkshire to the Peace Aims Group for presentation to the Prime Minister, the opening sentences of which read :—

We, the undersigned, shocked and horrified by the devastation and endless toll of human lives caused by the indiscriminate bombing between civilised nations, call upon the Prime Minister and Members of His Majesty's Government to agree to an armistice and the setting up of a World Conference at which all nations will be represented, not to accept the dictated terms of either side, but to formulate a just and lasting settlement that will give peace and security to the peoples of all countries.

In April 1941 Currie was appointed a member of the Peace by Negotiation Committee at the Central Halls Conference. With the entry of Russia into the war all efforts to bring about a cessation of hostilities were rejected.

With the enrolment of women for the Services and industry further demands were made on the services of Comrade Currie. While conscientious objectors were not so numerous among the women, a greater number sought exemption or postponement on the grounds of hardship. This led to a greater increase in the number of cases appearing before the Hardship Committees and Women's Panels.

Comrade Currie, in addition to appearing before these Committees and Appeal Boards, put up a splendid fight against the transfer of local girls to England. Although compelled through illness to resign the chairmanship of the Motherwell Branch of the I.L.P., Comrade Currie undertook and carried out successfully the duties of Organising Secretary. Demonstrations have been held calling for a "Socialist Britain Now," at which the I.L.P. Members of Parliament and other prominent speakers have taken part.

Realising that the need for Socialist unity is greater to-day than ever before, Comrade Currie organised an Open Forum in Motherwell for the purpose of rallying the forces of reason, truth and progress.

During the last war similar demonstrations were held and addressed by James Maxton, Guy Aldred, and John M'Lean. Comrade Currie bases his present attitude of Socialist anti-war solidarity on this experience and a statement made by Maxton when commenting on these examples of solidarity :—

I have never been in the same party as either McLean or Aldred although appearing on platforms with them when particular fights on special issues made such alliances the obviously right course to take.

The Duke of Bedford, who made a tour of the Lanarkshire coalfields in 1943, attended an I.L.P. meeting in Motherwell accompanied by Comrade Currie and a group of miners from Burnbank. So greatly impressed was the Duke with the Pacifist activity of the Socialist anti-war comrades that he accepted an invitation to speak against war and the power of high finance in the Empire Theatre, Motherwell. That meeting the pro-war "Communists" made a vain attempt to boycott. Later, Comrade Currie organised the successful Burnbank meeting at which the Duke of Bedford spoke.

Having experienced the horrors of war, Comrade Currie protests against the folly of the workers pursuing the path of military glory until the road to some leader's or Government's "victory" is strewn with the torn and mutilated bodies of men, women and children.

NEGOTIATED PEACE CAMPAIGN

If they attended, and it looked as if some of them were there, the jingoes, imperialists and militarists must have received a shock in being present at one of the most crowded and enthusiastic meetings held in the heart of London during the present War.

The meeting was held during Lunch hour at the Kingsway Hall, on Wednesday, April 26, under the auspices of the "Bombing Restrictions Committee." The Rev. A. Belden occupied the chair in the absence of Lady Parmoor who could not attend owing to indisposition. The speakers were Vera Brittain, Rhys Davies, M.P., and Professor Stanley Jevons.

When the Resolution was put calling upon H.M. Government to amend its ways in this connection, only four put up their hands against.

If that meeting, held mid-day, is any indication of the minds of the public then it is obvious that Decency and Reason are beginning to show their heads once more in the largest Metropolis in the world and the centre of the biggest of all the Empires.

The Merseyside Region of the P.P.U. held two public meetings on negotiation, addressed by Harry Hilditch, Negotiated Peace Campaign organiser for the P.P.U. The first was at Chester on Thursday, April 27, and the second at Liverpool on the following day.

Opening his first address, Harry Hilditch quoted E. D. Morel's famous challenge on the Versailles Treaty, "If this treaty is not altered, those of you who have little children can kiss them goodbye to-night, as the mark of death is already upon them."

Negotiation, he maintained, depended for its lasting effect, not upon the trustworthiness of particular statesmen, but upon the justice of the terms. During 1916 and 1917 the British Cabinet was considering the possibility of negotiating with Germany, but even if they had all been in favour of negotiation, they could not have carried out their wishes, because they had poisoned public opinion against it. Their own propaganda had boomeranged back to tie their hands. Perhaps the same was true to-day.

Pacifists must create a public opinion willing to negotiate. The prolongation of the war must lead to worse and worse peace terms being signed. However little effect peace lovers might think that they had, it was their duty to bear unending witness to their faith.

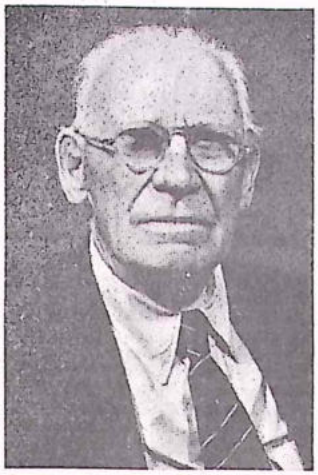
PARKER HOLMES SERCOMBE



Parker H. Sercombe, named after Theodore Parker and Oliver Wendell Holmes, died at Los Angeles, California, January 29, 1944, at the age of 83. He was born on a farm in Milwaukee County, Wisconsin, at 3 a.m., June 24, 1860. His parents, Ephriam Thomas Sercombe and Harriet Minerva Westover, were great lovers of Poetry, Music and Literature. They provided an excellent cultural atmosphere for their family of six on long winter evenings in days when cinema entertainment was unknown and modern avenues of research were inaccessible. Parker attended the Milwaukee High School, but quit in the third year to become a Teacher in Milwaukee County.

In rather rapid succession Parker became Post Office Clerk, State Champion Bicycle Rider, agent for books, typewriters, and cash registers. He had the distinction of building the first "stake body" auto truck in the world.

Because of his wife's ill health he went to Mexico City in 1894 and became Editor of the "Daily Mexican Herald." Two years later, he became President of the American Bank and Vice-President of the Mexican Trust Company. He later visited the United States as the personal guest of Elbert Hubbard. He then became Editor of "To-morrow Magazine" in association with Clarence Darrow, Oscar L. Triggs and ten others.

Sercombe was for a time with the Chicago Board of Education. He was always a "misfit" among those who employed the theological method of reasoning. He was a life-time Humanist and contributed much to the Humanist movement. At the time of his death, he was the Senior Minister of the Humanist Society of Friends, of which we are the British representative. "The Truth Seeker," New York, contained a tribute to Sercombe's memory, written by our old comrade, Cassius V. Cook, who addressed many searching questions to us on Anarchism in the columns of "The Herald of Revolt" in 1914. We shall reproduce these questions and answers later, partly because Sercombe would like no better tribute paid to his memory than recalling of questioning leading to the extension of truth. Our dead comrade was no mediocrity and no querulous conventionalist in his approaches to life. Cassius Cook refers to him, rightly, as "veteran libertauian and unique entrepreneur."

Sercombe made a considerable fortune and spent it, promoting thought. He died believing in the need to spread widely Humanist, Libertanian, and Radical ideas.

His parents came from England and often entertained Robert G. Ingersoll in their Milwaukee home. But Sercombe went far beyond his father as a libertanian.

Prof. Oscar L.Triggs lived in this home after he was dismissed from the Chicago University in consequence of a free speech affair. Upton Sinclair also lived there while working upon his first most successful book—"The Jungle."

Parker Sercombe was the father of three children—Charles Snydex, Herbert Spencer, and Romanie. They live in Los Angeles and are Humanists.

When the family came to Los Angeles from San Gabriel, a Get-together Celebration and welcome was given to them, to Kathleen Burke, the actress and to Rudolph Rocker, who was welcomed erroneously, as time has shown, as an Anarchist and an anti-Militarist.

WHY NOT LEARN?

Captain Liddell Hart's little book "Why don't we learn from history?" (George Allen and Unwin Ltd.) is very thoughtful and thought-provoking and, though not written from the pacifist standpoint, contains more than one argument which workers for the cause of peace are likely to find new and useful. The book also contains a searching exposure of the schoolboy diplomacy of our politicians and Foreign Office and it is one which readers of "The Word" would do well to study.

We reproduce above (reduced to two-thirds original size) the diploma received from the Pacific International University, California. Our American colleagues wish their appreciation of our Humanist struggle and "clear legal and constitutional definitions and defence of Free Speech before the High Court in Edinburgh and the Court of King's Bench, London," to be placed on record. HUMANISM AND UNITARIANISM

Early in June 1933, The Inquirer, London, reproduced in extenso the American Humanist Manifesto which was published in The New Humanist in May 1933. This manifesto has been reprinted several times in the United States since it was signed on May 1, 1933, and appears in the 1943 Annual Number of The Humanist Friend, official organ of the Humanist Society of Friends, published at Los Angeles, California. Many Unitarian ministers signed this manifesto. They included the following:—

E. Burdette Backus.

Raymond B. Bragg.

Ernest Caldecott, Minister, First Unitarian Church, Los Angeles.

Albert C. Dieffenbach.

John H. Dietrich, Minister, First Unitarian Society of Minneapolis.

R. Lester Mondale, Minister, Unitarian Church, Evanston, Ill.

Frank S. C. Wicks, Unitarian Church, Indianopolis, Ind.

David Rhys Williams, Minister, Unitarian Church, Rochester, N.Y.

The Inquirer for June 17, 1933, published a letter from a number of Unitarian ministers protesting against the reproduction of the Humanist Manifesto.

The same issue published an editorial comment headed "God and The Humanist Manifesto." We cite the mildest passage:—

"We are convinced that the time is past for Theism," declares a group of prominent American humanists in the manifesto printed in our last issue. And along with theism go deism (why rake up this "effigy" of the eighteenth century?) modernism and "several varieties of the new thought." They all belong to the out-moded and superstitious past; throw them on the scrap heap where discredited doctrines rightly belong; proclaim a new religion shorn of all cosmic or supernatural guarantees, based on human values humanely apprehended. . . .

In short, we deeply regret the publication of a Manifesto capable of creating the impression (for certain American Unitarians have signed it) that the name Unitarians is consistent with non-theistic humanism. Our churches exist for the worship of God and the service of man.

Humanism does not rule Theists out of participating in Humanist gatherings and services. Its organisation is completely congregational and cannot do so. It simply rules Atheists in. Before Theistic Unitarians indulge further their theological bias against Humanist Unitarians they should recall Coleridge's complaint against Unitarians for denying that Trinitarians are Unitarians. We agree with the Unitarians on this question. By the same process of reasoning we favour the Humanists against the Theists. Actually, Theism, like Atheism (of which we personally approve, although many do not), is but the theology. Humanism is the real spiritual or religious content. It embodies the vision or idealism which mankind sometimes describes as divine. It is the living flame of truth or service. Humanism defines and expresses dedication. It is the essence of all true religion and expresses equally well all that matters in Buddhism or Christianity, in Theism or Atheism.

In June 1933, expressing the belief that The Inquirer was justified in publishing the Humanist Manifesto, a number of Unitarian ministers published the following statement in our contemporary's columns:—

The document is one which merits the attention of all who are concerned with the future of Free religion.

We do not identify ourselves with the religious and philosophical outlook expressed in the Manifesto, but we feel that it is essential to the progress of Unitarianism that its adherents should have the fullest freedom of thought and expression.

Whatever fellowship we may enjoy with those who are known by the Christian name, in our view it is vital to the future of our churches that we should develop the largest measure of sympathy and co-operation with the representatives of Free religion throughout the world.

The following Unitarian ministers, who are on the active list still, signed their names to this declaration:—

A. MARGARET BARR	E. SHIRVELL PRICE
WM. BOTTOMLEY	MAGNUS C. RATTER
T. BRETT DAVIES	R. F. RATTRAY
J. TYSSUL DAVIES	H. LISMER SHORT
HENRY DAWTREY	L. BAKER SHORT
L. A. GARRARD	SIDNEY SPENCER
FELIX HOLT	GORDON STUART
RAYMOND V. HOLT	ROGER THOMAS
ETHEL KAY	ADA TONKIN
E. G. LEE	J. B. TONKIN
WALTER M. LONG	S. P. WHITEHOUSE
G. MEWHORT

Of these ministers, the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., and the Rev. William Bottomley, now of Melbourne, Australia, need no introduction to our readers.

Against this view, in The Inquirer for June 17, 1933, H. G. Chancellor, M.P., placed the following somewhat—and for him surprisingly—reactionary comment:—

I note that the signatories of the Humanist Manifesto include several Unitarian ministers, who, presumably, accept stipends for ministering to congregations in churches dedicated to the worship of God. The Manifesto declares that "the time has passed for theism."

I would deny to no man the liberty to preach atheism. I am willing to hear him in any hall or forum, and to weigh his arguments with an open mind. But to preach from a pulpit, in a house of worship, that worship is obsolete (Art. 9 and 10) and that there is no God (Art. 6) is an abuse of the pulpit that no ad hoc definition of religion (Art. 7) can make religious, and no social passion (Art. 8) can make honest. Have the ministerial signatories considered that point?—

Why should not one urge from a pulpit that formal worship is obsolete, if one feels that such static expression is not the way of Truth? Why should a Church be bound by a formal definition of an anthropomorphic concept of God? Is that the only way in which to define idealism or to express wonder and vision?

We believe that Atheism is true as opposed to Theism. But Atheism is merely negative Theism. Humanism liquidates this theological discussion which, so long as it continues, sacrifices the well-being of humanity to the metaphysical contentions and interest of theology. Atheists are theologians as well as Theists: and theology is not a science but an abstract reasoning, the perpetuation of which creates a shadow world barren of all use to mankind. Theology should be destroyed in the interest of science and human well-being. With Richard Carlile we look forward to a time when humans will neither call themselves Atheists nor Theists. The question of theology will not arise. But idealism and vision will inspire the realism of their living as never before.

The Humanist Society of San Francisco exists to stimulate interest in a more intelligent and humane way of life, based on rational ethics and the scientific view of man and the universe as opposed to supernaturalistic religious and outgrown traditional views. The Society will mail Humanist monographs free each month to any address in Britain or U.S.A. Names and addresses to: Hugh Robert Orr, director, P.O. Box 4401, San Francisco.

BARREN THE WORLD THESE DAYS.

Barren the world these days, and wintry-cold,
The icy blast of Greed has stopped the flow
Of every kindly water, and the leaves grow
Limp and yellow that should be green and bold.
For Power and Ease all beauty has been sold,
Skies have gone dark, no coloured flower is seen,
No bird is heard, only the vulture spleen,
High on the mountain of unwanted gold.

Oh, foolish Man that has become so blind,
So weak in Faith to doubt his strength and worth,
Why should he trust in Greed on this fair earth
That can produce far more than please his mind?
Thus millions live in want, while those who gain,
Leave naught behind them but a bloody stain.

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I thank you so much for your letter about Richard Carlile's descendants. I thought you might be interested in the work I am doing, the work that led me to write to you.

I worked on Shelley in graduate school, and after graduate school I became particularly interested in Queen Mab. Suddenly, I found myself immersed in the radical movement in England in the years after Waterloo and before the first Reform Bill. I have been collecting material for several years now, and hope some day to publish a history of English reform movement in this period. Most of the standard histories that I have seen are dreadful, and all detailed studies begin with the Chartists. I think that the men who came before the Chartists are equally important. Carlile seems to me particularly important.

I am particularly anxious to find out more about Carlile's friend, Julian Hibbert. In 1815 a large portion of Queen Mab was published in a free-thinking magazine called "The Theological Enquirer." The editor of the magazine seems to have been someone close to Shelley and he signs himself "Erasmus Perkins." I have found other articles by him, and under one was written Julian Hibbert, as though that were his real name. However, in "The Republican" in 1826 Carlile says "Erasmus Perkins was one George Cannon." I have been trying to track down both Cannon and Hibbert for a long time. There is a mystery about Hibbert's year of birth. Most sources say 1801, but accounts of him in the public papers sound such as though he were an older man.

I have never been able to lay hands on "The Theological Enquirer," but I would certainly like to do so. I have hopes of the Carlile family having letters and documents that they would be willing for me to see.

I have been emboldened to go on spouting about my favourite subject, owing to the fact that we seem to have the same heroes—Carlile, Paine, Jefferson—I would only add Henry David Thoreau.

Sincerely yours,
ADELINE E. GLASHEEN.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Correspondents of ours in New York City forwarded the February, 1944, issue of "The Word" to us away out here in Idaho. I read every line of it and most of it with interest. I enclose a very critical issue of our little village paper of which I am editor and publisher. We had quite a struggle with the Post Office Department at Washington over mailing rights and were accused of seditious pacifist publishing, but finally won out.

My two youngest sons, Clark and Boyd Cornell have served a year in prison camp for refusing to register. Boyd, the youngest, has been in a C.O. camp since September, 1942.

We did not miss publishing an issue of the paper during the time we were denied 2nd class mailing privileges.

Please send "The Word" regularly and also the Duke of Bedford's House of Lords' speeches; "Why Jesus Wept"; and "What a Game!"

Sincerely,
A. CORNELL,
Editor, "Boise Valley Herald."

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I thank you very much for parcel of pamphlets and the copies of "The Word," the March copy of which reached me yesterday and is of deepest interest to me.

Considering the different back ground of yourself and the Duke of Bedford and your lack of agreement in religious matters (as there must be to a certain extent), I think you both are examples of broad-minded men who respect each other's sincerity and bravery in devotion to a cause which only brings derision and unpopularity at present (while war hysteria carries everything before it) and people seem blind to the evils that accompany war and are following in its wake. To quote from the last copy of "The Word" received:

"To-day there is no bold spokesman for the right of conscience in the House of Lords other than the Duke of Bedford. He stands completely alone. The loneliness of the Duke of Bedford in his defence of conscience and his maintenance of civil liberty is a scandal of this war, a grave scandal peculiar to this war."

The enclosed cutting from "The Gazette" here, was written for Holy Week on "The Loneliness of the Great." It says:

"The loneliness of the great is one of the ironies of human life. The great are lonely, because they are great; had they peers and companions they would cease to be what they are in relation to those around them. This holds good of greatness in all its forms, whether greatness of station, greatness of genius, or greatness of character."

Another paragraph states:

"History is full of examples of men whose benevolence and kindliness and activity have at first won general applause and admiration, but who have been deserted, hated, denounced, perhaps even put to death, when the real character of their greatness was discovered."

I am glad to see defenders turned up for the Duke, even in the House of Lords, in the persons of Lord Ponsonby and Lord Morris.

As one of your distant readers I send you my good wishes and admiration for your efforts to support liberty and publish the truth.

Yours very truly,
CATHERINE FRASER.

Dear Guy Aldred—my good Comrade,—"The Word" still maintains its high level and I find it of great use. It helps to satisfy my great curiosity as to what other people are thinking! The "Humanist Society of Friends" appears to me to have a platform on which all could meet who practise Christian ethics, while rejecting Christian doctrine, e.g. Unitarians, Theists, and even Liberal Jews! And I think that such a "United Front" would be all to the good. From my observation of the "Quakers" of late I should say that the majority are drifting towards humanism and that a small, though strong, number are beginning to feel that a non-credal, non-sacramental faith cannot be maintained and are beginning to turn their eyes towards Catholicism, where their mysticism has always found a home. I do appreciate honesty, and that the "Humanist Friends" seem to possess. "Entre-nous" I can never understand why the Unitarians bother to call themselves Christians.

I cannot help feeling profoundly pessimistic as we drift towards totalitarianism. The Church, too, is being more and more used as a war-propaganda instrument. Yesterday in Bury "Salute the Soldier" services were held. The irony of the situation was that it came at the end of a "Religion and Life" week. All good wishes.

Yours in the struggle,
A. K. SHREWSBURY.

Sir,—Interest in Esperanto has grown so much during recent years that a well considered plan would easily obtain 50,000 new members in 1944 for the main Esperanto societies in this country.

What is lacking, among other things, is large scale, continuous, attractive and enterprising press advertising by the Esperanto movement, which could well afford to increase ten-fold its present expenditure on publicity.

Thirty of us have spent over £120 in five months on various forms of publicity. The 3,000 members of the British Esperanto Association and the much larger number of Esperantists outside that body could vastly overshadow the efforts of our small group.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Emrys Hughes, yourself, the Duke of Bedford and a few others deserve more support, and when this bloody mess is over will be found standing high amongst those who love truth. The world is only looking at the doorway of Democracy, it is not yet on the doorstep. The Labour Leaders have sold their principles for office and Parliamentary careerism and the liberties of the British Isles been made farcical for those leaders to pose as champions of Socialism outside of Trade Unionism is a false claim. I have no quarrel with Trade Unionism, it has done much for the workers, but these humbugs have betrayed their trust.

Best wishes to you.—Yours faithfully,
E. C. SQUIRES.

NATURE NOTE.

A Grey Wagtail is nesting in the roof of our house. He is a neat and beautiful little bird, with much bright yellow about him. Frequently as he flies back to his nest, he catches a sight of his reflection in a window, and then ensues a furious battle with this other wagtail who dares to come on his territory! Sometimes the window is marked and even blood-stained after one of his hard attacks. How VERY like Man, who goes on fighting so bravely and so very futilely, against this terrible "other fellow" who, in reality, is so extraordinarily like himself!

WAR AND FINANCE

The International Monetary Fund

After the Education Bill had passed its third reading on Friday, May 12, 1944, on the motion to adjourn, Mr. Stokes raised the question of the International Monetary Fund (Joint Statement). We reproduce his speech from the official report, columns 2268-2270. Mr. Stokes was followed by Commander King-Hall, who said that he crossed the Atlantic with Lord Keynes, and knew the passenger list. Commander King-Hall asked that a more popular account of financial matters be published by the Treasury and that there be less mystery-making and mumbo-jumbo. Mr. Assheton (the Financial Secretary to the Treasury), in his reply to Mr. Stokes, requoted Mr. Stokes' question and his answer of May 11, 1944, and added:—

I stand by that reply, and my hon. friend knows that a Financial Secretary is peculiarly accustomed to that position. It is one of the tasks of a Financial Secretary, from time to time, to say "No," and on this occasion I am bound to say "No" again. I will, however, go so far as to say this to satisfy the hon. Member's curiosity. Leaving aside the noble Lord to whom the hon. Member has referred, there were officials in Washington, and they did not include a single part-timer or anybody appointed "ad hoc" because of currency experience. On the other hand, they did include certain whole-time temporary civil servants who have been in the service of the Government since the beginning of the war. Beyond that, I am afraid I cannot go, and I suggest to the House, and to the hon. Member, that it is quite contrary to the traditions of the public service that members of it should be other than anonymous. As the hon. Member knows, the House recognises that tradition and I think hon. Members will wish to recognise it once again to-day.

Which, did we take the capitalist system seriously, must be a most unsatisfactory state of affairs: a most dangerous and menacing situation: all-powerful, anonymous government concealed behind a facade of democracy.

There were not 40 members present when this revelation was made, and the House adjourned, after being counted out.

It is time the common people studied and circulated widely our work on "Socialism and Parliament," which will be sent post-free for (the two parts) for 1s 4d. Democracy rests not in parliament but in the understanding of the people.—Ed.

Mr. Stokes (Ipswich)—It is, perhaps, somewhat of an anti-climax that, after the passing of a great measure, I should wish to go back to one of my hobby-horses. I have apparently learnt nothing by the Bill. I gave notice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that I proposed to raise a matter which was the subject of a question that I addressed to him yesterday. My question was:

"whether he will give the names and qualifications of the British experts who collaborated in drawing up the Joint Statement by Experts on the Establishment of an International Monetary Fund."

I got the most unsatisfactory reply. The Chancellor said:

"No, Sir. The experts in question are working for His Majesty's Government and it would be contrary to traditional practice to give the names of those who have collaborated in this task."—[Official Report, 11th May, 1944: Vol. 399, col. 2108.]

The Chancellor, who has got as far away from me as he can get without falling over the edge, has gone to Edinburgh. I do not blame him for that, any more than he can blame me for raising this matter. I have been pursuing this particular side of the matter for 15 months—I have been raising the whole subject, actually, for about two and a half years. I have never yet got any satisfaction. Now I hope that the Financial Secretary, out of the goodness of his heart, if for no other reason, will tell the truth for a change—at any rate, the whole truth. About a year ago I raised this matter, and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer gave me an exceedingly unsatisfactory reply about what was going on in America. The reply would indicate that there were no Treasury officials engaged in discussions. Knowing that discussions had been going on, I assumed, therefore, that there were people who were not Treasury officials engaged in discussions on our behalf.

Later in the year I raised the matter with the present Chancellor. He assured me that the discussions—which I had understood had not been taking place—had come to an end! Rather bewildered, I assumed that there had been an interim period and that Treasury officials must have joined the unofficials. Meanwhile, I was not smart enough to raise it sooner, or perhaps the House was not sitting, and then the next Chancellor told me that the discussions were drawing to a close. This year I pursued the Chancellor, and asked him for an assurance that there would be no commitments entered into by the Government until this House had discussed the subject. He assured me that there would be no commitments entered into until that had happened. I am all the more perturbed because there was a debate two days ago, which was almost universally condemnatory of the White Paper; yet one of the papers which cannot be regarded as completely dissociated from the Government, the "Financial News," said, in a leading article to-day:

[Specially drawn for "The Word," by McPhail

"Although the Commons have accepted the International Monetary Fund scheme in principle, their acceptance has been somewhat timid and reluctant."

Could that possibly be regarded as a correct description of the debate which took place last Wednesday? Of all the speakers who spoke, including even the Chancellor, there was not a single person—well, perhaps, there was one who gave a half-clap to the scheme, but all the others who spoke were condemnatory of the scheme. Yet the "Financial News" says that:

"The Commons have accepted the International Monetary Fund scheme in principle."

They have done nothing of the sort; and the sooner the world, and particularly our cousins in America, know it, the better. I want to ask why I, and the House, should not know who was responsible for carrying on these discussions in America. Everybody knows that Lord Keynes was there. That is no secret: you have only to read the document to know that he was. But who else was there? There is some mystery about it. If the Financial Secretary can tell me that only Lord Keynes and accredited Treasury officials—not part-timers brought in for the job—

Mr. Bowles (Nuneaton)—Did the hon. Member say brought in, or bought in?

Mr. Stokes—Both: brought in, and paid. I do not want any of these "temporary gents"—that is an old Army expression from the last war—regarded as permanent officials. If the Financial Secretary tells me that there were Treasury officials only, I have no more complaints to make, and I will sit down. I do not regard a Treasury official as a part-timer brought in by the Government, and paid by the Government for the job. I want to know what commercial associations anybody engaged in the discussions had. Why should we not know the actual names of the people involved? I feel very strongly about this. I may have never made it quite clear yet, but I want to make it clear now, that I have never liked this Government. I think they have spent their time suppressing the truth. We are never allowed to know what is going on. We lose half the Empire, and are never allowed to see the despatches. Singapore and Burma were lost; Norway, Greece, Crete, and other campaigns were a fiasco; and we have never seen any of the despatches. We are not even allowed to know what happened at Teheran, when they tore up the Atlantic Charter. In the British Isles to-day 45,000,000 people, who are concentrating on the war effort, are fighting for reasons known to the Government of which they have no idea whatever. My suspicion—and I hope that I shall be forced to withdraw it when my right hon. friend replies—is that you are juggling with what is the lifeblood, the monetary machinery, of the people. You are in fact arranging for the next war.

Mr. Speaker—I hope I am not.

Mr. Stokes—I beg your pardon, sir. The Government are doing these things. I entirely exonerate you from all those accusations. They are playing about with the monetary system. No less a person than the right hon. gentleman the Minister of Labour said, not many years ago, that if we really examined the causes of war we could not excuse ourselves, on account of the dominating part we had played in the financial affairs of the world between the two wars. If there is juggling with the financial system there are things going on that may lead us into another holocaust. I ask the right hon. gentleman to say definitely that nobody but Lord Keynes and professional officials were at these discussions; and I hope that if there was anybody else at all there, he will tell us who they were and what were their associations.

FIXING THE BANK RATE

THE METHOD CRITICISED

The following letter bearing on Mr. Stoke's speech on the International Monetary Fund from the pen of Mr. R. Fletcher, M.P., was published in the Manchester Guardian for Thursday, December 28, 1939:

Sir,—On November 7, in the House of Commons, my friend Mr. Stokes endeavoured to elicit from the Chancellor of the Exchequer some information as to the identities of the individuals who fix the Bank rate and the principles on which they do it. Sir John Simon replied that the Bank rate is fixed by the Court of the Bank of England and that in doing so the Court are solely actuated by the public interest. In fact, the Bank rate is settled by the Treasury Committee of the Bank of England, which consists of the Governor and Deputy Governor and seven members of the Court. We were not told the names of these seven members, but we do know, however, that they are drawn from the directorate of the Bank. The members of the directorate have very varied and important interests. The capital of the various companies they assist to direct amounts to hundreds of millions of pounds. Fluctuations in the Bank rate must be of supreme importance not only to their own fortunes but to those of their shareholders.

Yet a secret junta drawn from the ranks of these gentlemen is capable, when the Bank rate (with which their worldly fortune, prestige, and status are bound up) has to be altered, of going into a dark room and passing into a state of Nirvana in which everything but the public interest is blotted from their minds. In this state they are jointly delivered of a decision about the Bank rate which is invariably good for the public interest. It is safe to say that if Sir John Simon believes such nonsense he is the only man in the country who does. We can be certain that nobody believes it less than those directors of the Bank of England to whom he ascribes unfailing altruism and nescience.

Even if these gentlemen could achieve the impossible and dismiss from their minds all save the public interest, may one ask by what yard-stick they measure the public interest? And what sections of the public do they think deserve to have their interest considered? It may fairly safely be assumed that those of them who have any politics own allegiance to the Conservative party and that all of them think in terms of the property-owning class.

The other side of the matter is this. We are a democracy, supposed to be fighting for democracy. I know this is true because every Cabinet Minister says so whenever he makes a speech explaining why any proposals that we should state our war aims must be stoutly resisted in the name of democracy. Now the essence of democracy surely should be that any matter vitally affecting the lives of the people may be debated in the House of Commons by the representatives of the people.

Short of the issue of peace or war (which is also to all intents and purposes kept out of the purview of the people) there can be no questions more profoundly affecting our lives than those bound up with all that is implied by an alteration of the Bank rate. Yet this operation is performed by individuals whose names are not known and over whom the House of Commons has no jurisdiction. I am very glad, however, to have noted for some time now an increasing tendency on the part of many connected with commerce and finance who are not at all on the Left in politics to realise and admit that in view of the vast influence which the Bank of England exerts in every phase of the national life the Bank should become directly amenable to national direction.—Yours, etc.,

R. FLETCHER.

Mr. Fletcher was then Labour M.P. for Nuneaton. Since 1942 he has sat in the House of Lords as Baron Winster. We criticised his seat-taking in these columns for March, 1942.

THE "FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC DISARMAMENT OF GERMANY."

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Readers of The Word will be aware that in some of my articles I have suggested that this is a financiers' war. The financiers of the City and Wall Street, who control the British and American politicians by bribery, intimidation or propaganda desire to overthrow the Axis Governments because the latter do not allow scarcity of money to hinder any desired object for which labour and materials are available. Such (in peace-time) revolutionary ideas might, it was feared, spread to other countries, to the detriment of the moneylenders' interests.

Striking proof that I was correct in my supposition has been afforded by certain of the debates in Parliament during the month of May, highly significant phrases such as "the financial and economic disarmament of Germany" having been used by certain members.

Now what does the "financial" disarmament of Germany really mean? It can hardly mean that the German Government is to be prevented from voting sums of money for military purposes as, in the event of an Allied victory, Germany (until her help was desired as a partner in the next war!), would be forbidden to have any armaments, and Allied inspectors would see that there was no secret re-arming. There would be no point in preventing the German Government from voting money for the construction of armaments they were already forbidden to have.

The "financial disarmament" of Germany could scarcely mean, either, measures to prevent inflation in order to escape part of the burden of reparations payments. Reparations, if demanded, would take the form of a specified quantity of goods. They would certainly not be paid in marks, for German money—the only kind of money Germany has the right to create—is of no use outside Germany.

It is quite clear, therefore, that "financial disarmament" would simply mean that Germany would no longer be allowed to be an exponent of enlightened monetary practices alarming to the moneylenders. No longer, if labour and materials were available and a job needed doing, would her Government be allowed to order the banks to create the sums required. The creation of money would in all likelihood be restricted by some form of gold standard, limiting the money-supply, not by the country's capacity to produce and import goods, but by the amount of gold the international financiers thought fit to allocate. We may be sure also that barter trade would be firmly discouraged because it deprived bankers of commissions on trade Bills of Exchange and "the freedom of the exchanges would probably be insisted on to allow gambling in currencies and the shifting of private fortunes from one country to another. The "economic disarmament" of Germany would doubtless mean the creation of various hindrances to Germanys export trade, i.e., to her capacity to export goods for satisfy'ing the wants of the people of other countries so that in turn she might obtain imports to satisfy the urgent needs of her own people—a thoroughly sensible and humane policy, and so likely to promote lasting peace!

LORD SNELL: A STUDY

The death of Lord Snell on April 21, 1944, at Highgate Hospital, where he had been a patient for many weeks, suffering from a bronchial affection, gives rise to much reflection. In Lord Snell, C.B.E., C.H., etc., Deputy Leader of the House of Lords, a post he had occupied since 1940, older members of the Freethought Movement recognised the Harry Snell of the Freethought open-air platform of over fifty years ago. He had been Secretary of the Nottingham Secular Society and Chapman Cohen recalls meeting him in Victoria Park in 1890, soon after his arrival in London. He was then twenty-two years of age and had migrated from Nottingham to Woolwich on his famous penny-farthing bicycle.

From the Freethought platform Snell turned to the Ethical movement and came more and more under the influence of Dr. Stanton Coit and Moncure Conway. His connection with the Secularist Movement became very slight. He visited South Place, and in 1898, at the invitation of Dr. Coit, he accepted a salary of £150 a year for three years as a lecturer and organiser in the Ethical movement. In the summer of that year, our comrade, Mr. F. G. Gould—nephew of Mr. F. G. Gould, the well-known Socialist and Freethought writer of the South Place Ethical Society, first listened to Snell's open-air addresses in Victoria Park for the East London Ethical Society. Here Snell attracted large audiences.

We met Snell in Camberwell in 1904 and spoke with him under the auspices of the Ethical Society in the local Town Hall. Snell introduced us to Stanton Coit, but there seemed to our mind to be a little too much beauty and almost ritualistic incense about the Ethical movement to please our sense of rationalism. We were in sympathy with the philosophy expounded by Snell and Coit, but we did not like the atmosphere in which they expounded it.

Snell now devoted most of his time to the Ethical Union and was its secretary from 1906 down to the outbreak of the Great War of 1914. As an officer of the Union, he was allowed to visit Wandsworth Prison and hold services for conscientious objectors who were Ethicists and Free thinkers.

Commencing with 1910, Snell made three unsuccessful attempts to enter Parliament. In 1922 he was returned for East Woolwich. Nine years later he became Under-Secretary for India, with a seat in the House of Lords.

Lord Snell was associated closely with the Rationalist Press Association. He was a supporter of the Secular Education League, and he presided at the celebration of the 150th Anniversary of South Place on February 14, 1943. His last essay, written from his death-bed, was an appreciation of Stanton Coit, contributed to The Literary Guide for April, 1944. It is in connection with Lord Snell's Rationalistic and Atheistic repute, as evidenced by this activity, that we wish to review his political record.

Harry Snell was born on April 1, 1865. He was seventy-nine years of age at the time of his death. He has left an account of his career in Men, Movements, and Myself, published by J. M. Dent & Sons, in London, in 1936.

Describing his conversion to Freethought, when he was sixteen years old, Snell says (pages 30-31):—

It was at one of the meetings held in the great market-place at Nottingham that, in the year 1881, I first heard of the name and the fame of Charles Bradlaugh. . . . The meetings that he addressed were held on a Sunday in the old Alhambra Music Hall, in St. Mary's Gate, and I attended the one that was called for the afternoon. . . . Bradlaugh was already speaking when I arrived, and I remember, as clearly as though it were only yesterday, the immediate and compelling impression made upon me by that extraordinary man. . . . from that hour until the day of his death, ten years later, I was one of the humblest, but most devoted of his followers. . . I knew Bradlaugh more intimately as I grew older, and my devotion to him increased with my experience. . . . It is now forty-five years since he died, but I hold his memory as one of my great possessions.

We ask the reader to note this declaration of loyalty to Bradlaugh's memory and acknowledgment of discipleship. Remember it when you come to read of Lord Snell taking his seat in the House of Lords.

Describing C.O.'s in prison, Snell has a paragraph full of invaluable moralising (pages 197-198):—

While the war was in progress I was called upon to visit Wandsworth Prison, where several young men belonging to ethical societies were detained as "conscientious objectors" to military service. Like other prisoners they, were entitled to receive the spiritual consolations of the religious body to which they belonged, and the Union of Ethical Societies was asked to care for their spiritual needs. In the course of a few months they were joined by some young Socialists, and for a long time I had twenty-seven prisoners on my list. . . . Here were twenty-seven young men, some of them highly educated, all of them intelligent, who had been compelled to face a great and urgent moral issue, and who, rather than betray a moral intuition, were willing to suffer the continued degradation of prison life. It appeared probable, therefore, under these circumstances, that when the war was over they would associate themselves with peace societies, Labour, and other organisations and, for the rest of their lives, endeavour that no son of theirs should ever be faced with a crisis such as they had known. The armistice came and they were released. I have, with one exception, never since seen or heard of them.

Snell describes the Woolwich bye-election, when Ramsay MacDonald was defeated. To recall that election must be galling to the 1914-1918 semi-Socialist Pacifists, like Thomas Johnston, who now rejoice in the propaganda of the jingo press. What did Horatio Bottomley do but blaze the patriotic trail of falsehood for these humbugs to follow, these rogues who built up their careers on the denunciation of Bottomley and the pence-sacrifices of a deluded but admiring working-class. This applies specifically to the present Secretary of State for Scotland, who owes his status in this war to a capacity for semi-pacifist charlatanism in Forward during the Great War.

Snell writes (pages 204-6):—

Some time before his death, Crooks had been compelled through continued ill-health to withdraw from public work, and to resign his seat in Parliament. The election of his successor was the occasion of an unexampled orgy of violence and slander. A more discreditable election never took place in any community. The Labour Party chose as their candidate Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who lost his seat at the general election of 1918. . . . He had been one of the foremost opponents of the war policy of the Government, and his alleged association with the still-born Council of Action had brought upon him every epithet in the British Journalist's rich vocabulary of abuse. . . . MacDonald seemed doomed to be defeated, and he was. . . . Any one who opposes the war passions of a people must expect to be scourged by them. MacDonald had pleaded for a sober peace when they were drunk with war: and they revenged themselves upon him. The task of organising the patriotic indignation of the constituency was assumed by or entrusted to the late Mr. Horatio Bottomley, and thousands of the delicate-minded followers of that edifying patriot invaded the borough and conducted the kind of rough-house campaign which was appropriate to their character, and dear to the heart of their leader. The Tory candidate was a man exactly suited to the occasion. Captain Robert Gee, V.C., was a brave man and a fine soldier: but as a politician he was both inconsiderable and naive. An indifferent speaker, he was always ready to challenge any one who corrected or interruped him to come upon the platform to fight. The Tory Party in the borough were delighted, and the constituency went patriotically mad and dirty. Labour women were assaulted, MacDonald was stoned, execrated, and defeated: England's honour was saved—by Horatio Bottomley! . . .

When sense came, Snell was returned for Woolwich. He tells the story on pages 204-206:

When the general election came in 1922, the patriotic anger of the by-election had been superseded by a grim anxiety respecting unemployment. Woolwich, for a period, was one of the black spots of the land. . . . during the years of the war the Government had imported into the borough many thousands of men for the manufacture of armaments. When it no longer needed them it left them more or less a burden on the local rates. . . . The constituency returned to its old allegiance to the Labour Party, and elected me by a majority of nearly five thousand votes.

And then came the House of Lords. How Snell took his seat is recorded by him on page 250:—

Looking back upon what I suppose was the most striking episode of my life I can with complete sincerity affirm that the social distinction supposed to be associated with the peerage meant nothing at all to me, nor membership of the House of Lords modify, in the least degree, either my political outlook or my habit of life. It imposed upon me some disadvantages and financial sacrifices, and gave to me but few obvious compensations. . . .

It was perhaps the strong puritanical strain in my character which caused me to shrink from the ordeal of my introduction to the House of Lords, in full robes and cocked hat, more than from any other event in my life, and I endeavoured to keep as secret as possible the day and the hour when the ceremony would take place. Therefore, as the "Birmingham Post" remarked the following day: "There were not many eyes to watch the official entry of the new Labour baron into the ranks of the peerage. "My Lords" numbered a mere handful. A few comrades from the House of Commons looked in. . . . "Hansard" coldly will record that Lord Snell of Plumstead took his seat and subscribed to the oath of allegiance "in the usual manner," . . .

We do not understand why a Labourist, a Radical, and a Freethinker had to bow to this robing and ceremonial nonsense. Why could not Snell have made a stand instead of hiring a robe for five pounds for indulgence in all this mockery and masquerade? But if he had to have the robe, if he felt undressed without it, why did not he, a Freethinker, a disciple of Charles Bradlaugh, who had fought for affirmation, have the moral courage to insist on his right to affirm? Of what value his Freethought reputation if he bowed before orthodoxy and convention on every occasion. We consider Snell's oath-taking a disgraceful exhibition. We are surprised that the entire Freethought Movement conspired to make no comment upon it.

Contrast this conduct against the Duke of Bedford's calm and untrammelled insistence on the right to affirm when he took his seat in the House of Lords on Wednesday, December 3, 1941. Unquestionably, the Duke is the outstanding man of integrity in British politics to-day. How puny by comparison are these "Socialists" and "Freethinkers" who must swear, who must conform, and are totally devoid of the moral courage essential to uphold their principles. But if they cannot uphold their principles why are they in public life?

Lord Snell has been in the House of Lords, sitting on the Government Benches whilst Government spokesmen were denouncing the Duke of Bedford for his Pacifism and opposition to war. Did Snell believe that the patriots of 1939-44 were superior to the patriots of 1914-1918. He knew better: but he remained silent.

Lord Snell was not without thought nor ability. But he wrapped his mind in platitudes and ended his days in esteemed mediocrity. This is the paralysis that obstructs the progress of mankind and sacrifices civilisation to the conservation of slaughter. The pursuit of politics wasted Snell's power of heresy and declined his service to humanity.

A SPECIAL APPEAL.

Our new pamphlet, consisting of about 20 essays, published in various journals between 1907 and 1943, is in type and will be printed as soon as possible. It is entitled "A Call to Manhood." We shall price it as cheaply as possible. Meantime we appeal to every comrade who wishes to help this work to send a donation. Every comrade making a donation to this special effort will receive a free copy of the book as soon as it is issued. Mainly anti-war and anti-militarist, this work covers a wide range of social enquiry and discussion.

The loss on this journal is heavy. Some comrades suggest cutting down the size. Others suggest increasing the price. We could combine these suggestions. Actually, we wish to do neither, for we are at war with ignorance, and we cater for the poor, the very poor. Culture is without price, like wisdom, and should be spread widely. We ask "every reader"—and that "means you, comrade"—to make a special effort. If possible, as soon as you receive this paper, make your gift. A complete response would end the need to beg for "the duration," as the militarists say. Please respond.

THE JEWS AND THE NAZIS

BY C. H. NORMAN

In the great controversy which has taken place in Europe in recent years founded on the anti-Semitic attitude of the Nazi Party towards the Jews in general, the commentators on this controversy have not much heeded the peculiar similarities existing between the Jewish attitude towards the non-Jewish peoples in the religious sense, and the attitude towards the Jews of the Nazis in both the religious and racial sense. The matter is of some importance as this racial and religious enmity between the Jews and other peoples is a fact of European history: it is not a cruel innovation of the Nazis. The argument presented against the Jews by the Nazis can be summarised thus. The Jews are alleged to have views and ideas and ideals which isolate them from the general body of the community; those ideals and views taking the form that they are the people chosen by the Almighty as His selected race. One recalls the lines which were current some years ago in London intellectual circles on that topic, which perhaps express a wide opinion on that remarkable claim of the Jews:

"How odd
Of God
To choose
The Jews."

The Nazis also assert that the Jews have peculiar views on the subject of finance, which enable them to secure an advantageous position in society at times when national affairs are passing through periods of stress. The great enrichment of the Jews in Germany during the period of inflation is pointed to in support of that criticism of the Jews. It is to be noted that "The Times," in its articles on the economic position in Germany in 1938, after the confiscations of Jewish property which had been directed under the Hitler regime, stated that the Jewish population of Germany still owned "half the land and capital of the former Reich," a truly astonishing state of things, when one recalls how small the Jewish population is in Germany relatively to the non-Jewish, though no exact figures have been obtainable in recent times. One cannot help observing, too, that Jewish names figure largely in the "black market" and other prosecutions which have taken place in England under the special war legislation controlling food and other commodities. The quick business instinct of the Jews is not always used to promote the best interests of the community among which they live in times of stress.

The Nazis are criticised for adopting certain racial theories about the "purity" of the "Aryan" race which are generally regarded by impartial scholars as quite unsound. Much has been made of the fact that intermarriage between Jews and Germans is forbidden under heavy penalties. But what is not seen is that this attitude is only an extension of the Jews' own religious attitude in marriage questions towards non-Jews. The daughter of the Rothschilds who married Lord Rosebery was very much criticised at the time by the strict religious English Jews. The religious Jew has always frowned upon marriage between Jews and those of the non-Jewish persuasion. Indeed, Christian women who married strictly religious Jews were expected, certainly till recent years, to undergo a period of preparation under the tuition of the rabbi before the marriage was recognised as proper by the Jewish community. The peculiar powers exercised in England by the Beth Din, by the Jewish Board of Guardians, and by the rabbis in the matter of divorce are only examples of the specialised attitude which has secured a certain legal recognition in England, adopted by the Jews when living in a Christian or non-Jewish community.

The religious Jews put forward the early books of the Old Testament still as direct instructions from Almighty God to the Jewish people. Some may think that the Nazis are not entirely unreasonable in challenging that claim. The early books of the Old Testament, to some minds, may have coloured the human mind unduly in their great circulation, contributing much to that savagery which, is so widely prevalent in the world, which the Nazis are specially accused of themselves propagating. The doctrines of the Old Testament are the doctrines of vengeance, hatred and malice, which, being attributed to the Almighty Mind, can have had nothing but ill effects on the moral progress of the human race.

The habits of the religious Jews in their special feeding practices are again an assertion of their own superiority over the ordinary community, whose feeding habits are regarded by the religious Jews as unclean and contrary to the laws of health as given to Moses and Aaron. The Jews are quite entitled to hold these beliefs, but there can be no doubt about their provocative character when maintained and practised in non-Jewish communities. Indeed, the curious paradox of anti-Semitism, as preached by the Nazis, is its close relationship to the ideas and practices of the Jews themselves. In secluding the Jews from the national communal life, the Nazis have simply followed out the attitude of the strict Jews themselves on many vital matters towards the non-Jewish communities among whom they live.

At one time the Jews, being under heavy political disabilities in England, were much influenced by the doctrines of Liberalism, but the removal of political and social barriers in the last fifty years has led to the transfer of the Jewish influence largely to the Conservative Party. But the writer was certainly surprised to find that the Jewish Press had so far departed from any belief in the tolerance from which the Jews have benefited much in the past, that it was supporting the internment of people without trial or charge for an indefinite period under the war regulations, and indeed complaining that this monstrous theory of indefinite detention of untried persons (remembering that the Government has no difficulty about trying spies and other war felons by the ordinary machinery of justice), had not been carried far enough. It is perfectly true that the Jews are not singular in this conduct, but that does not relieve them from the criticism which it is bound to call forth from those who know that none have suffered more than the Jews from the exercise of such arbitrary powers of detention and deportation.

The Jews are also very provocative (here again the Nazis have imitated them in their anti-Semitic propaganda), in their assertion of the high mental qualifications of the Jews compared with other races or communities. The Jews generally only claim they are the chosen race in the religious sense, even though some pro-Semites press the contention into the realm of pure race, asserting that the Jews, racially and religiously, are the "chosen of the Lord."

In many respects, the Jews have contributed a good deal to progress in various aspects of human activity; but it is worth remembering that the leaders of literature are not recruited from the Jewish race: Dante, Shakespeare, Euripides, Cervantes, Goethe, Moliere, Tolstoy and Omar, were not Jews, though Lessing can be fairly placed at the head of the second rank of literary genius. The Jews stand high in the musical art, but very few great inventions can be attributed to them from what is known in historical times. The claim of the Jewish race to special recognition on the ground of extraordinary mental attributes compared with other races is provocative, interesting, but unsound.

There can be no question that anti-Semitism is a pernicious doctrine which represents almost the highest point (except the belief in witches and witchcraft) which human unreason has reached, apart from the belief that war has ever done anything but debase every government and every person who has engaged in it. On the other hand, a detestation of anti-Semitism should not take one to the other extreme of regarding the Jews as other than they are, a race with certain anti-social characteristics, whose qualities do not outweigh their defects. In that, they are no different from many other races existing and passed away. But, as one should treat anti-Semitism as a poisonous attitude of mind, so one should also be wary of the pro-Semitism so harmfully rife in many places to-day under the guise of anti-Nazism.

There is the further fact to remember that the state of terrorism so widely prevalent in Europe to-day is traceable to the Russian Jewish revolutionary statesman and writer, Leon Trotsky. The Russian revolution produced two notable contributions to modern political thought. The first was "The State and Revolution," by Lenin, the principles and teaching of which have been completely abandoned by Mr. Stalin in recent years. The second was "The Defence of Terrorism," the most poisonous political book written for centuries, the author being Leon Trotsky, and the followers of its teaching being the repressive governments of Europe wherever they may be situate—in exile or at home. It is ironical that the Jew, Leon Trotsky, should have propounded a doctrine of repression and suppression which is being actively practised throughout Europe and in many other parts of the world. All the terroristic activities of the time, whether in Russia, Germany, Poland, France, Britain or elsewhere can be traced to the doctrines enunciated in this book, which are exactly contrary to the works of the Jewish writers known to English people as the New Testament.

WHITEHALL HYMN

Land of Hope and Glory,
Mother of the Free!
Though our hands be gory
We stand for Liberty—
See the flower of Freedom,
Glorious 18B!

Onward, Christian soldiers—
Go and fight our war!
Bomb and burn and slaughter;
That's what you are for.
And if you're blown to atoms
We'll find plenty more!

Everyone conscripted,
Doing what they're told,
Taxed to suffocation,
Bringing us the gold
So that we can keep things
Going as of old.

Laws, in tens of thousands
They are made to keep—
Every movement governed,
Even when to sleep.
Praise the Lord for making
Humans so like sheep!

Unthinkingly obedient
To the song we sing—
We know how to stir 'em!
What a lucky thing
They respond to phrases
As "For God and King."

While the war still rages
Post-war plans we thunder,
We must work like mad
To keep the people under,
And to deal with those
Who dare to doubt or wonder.

Finance, State and Army—
Lo, the mighty Three!
To our fearsome edicts
All must bend the knee.
O Land of Dope and Story,
Smother of the Free!

PACIFISM DEFINED

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

Statement Issued by the Newcastle-upon-Tyne War Resisters' Group of the Peace Pledge Union.

"If we do the works, we shall know the doctrine."
—JOHN MIDDLETON MURRY.

We believe the above words to be profoundly true. Conversely we believe that if we do not know the doctrine, if there is doubt and perplexity about it among our brother pacifists, then it follows that we are not "doing the works."

That there is doubt and perplexity among us, cannot be denied. The recent Annual General Meeting of the Peace Pledge Union was notable for its impression of a people seeking after a sign and for their obvious uncertainty of "the way." We believe that this attitude of doubt is tinged with hope. Had its opposite, a rigid adherence to a cut-and-dried party line, been the keynote, we should have despaired. At the same time, we feel that too often was there a tendency for honest doubt to be led all too easily to a more comfortable seat on the Laodecian fence and that there was an inclination to intellectualise ourselves out of the first basic resistance to war implicit in the pledge.

Renunciation has been the first step preceding the positive work of any worth-while faith; our renunciation says succinctly:

"I Renounce War, and will never Support or Sanction Another."

Before any more complex level of pacifism is reached, we insist that this pledge calls upon us to refuse completely to assist the war in any and every way humanly possible. If, at any time, it happens that we lack the courage to carry out this refusal in any particular, then let us, in the name of honesty, know it as "a compromise" and not by some intellectual euphemism which blinds us to reality.

We believe that wars will cease when men refuse to fight. Even if this has the obviousness of a first proposition, it should be stated, nevertheless. (Too often do pacifists tend to neglect the obvious truth for obscurantist complexity.) To this end, we believe that one of the duties of pacifists is to attempt, by word and deed, to dissuade men from fighting; to allay, with all the persuasion we can muster, the war-mindedness of our individual acquaintances, and to co-operate in any corporate effort of pacifism to stop this war.

"We are at the faint and tender beginnings of a new movement—a new political and religious movement which contains in itself the germs of a new society."
—John Middleton Murry.

At this stage we approach another level of pacifism. The causes of war are complex, but we will tabulate them under two broad headings:

(1) The folly of man, by which we mean his admixture of unintelligent valour, sheep-like docility and ignorant fear which make him a suitable pawn for war-making.

(2) The capitalist system, which sooner or later results in a clash between rival economic blocs each or all trying to extend their spheres of influence to gain markets.

We believe, therefore, that pacifists must make a two-pronged attack. We believe that this folly of man has to be corrected, and we ask for the co-operation of all our fellow-pacifists in this task even where this process is known as "re-integration." Yet we know that this is not all of the task. We believe that the "structure" of society must be changed also; that these two great tasks should be synchronised: that pacifists should not only be people reintegrated and reintegrators, but should be politically minded and demanding the ending of a system which makes for war. We believe that there should be no exclusive "plugging" of either one of these tasks, and that we should shun the twin devils of wooliness on the one hand and partisanship on the other. "We are," as the sapient words which head this passage say, "a new political and religious movement." Or as others would put it:

"We are a political movement with a soul: a religious movement with an intellect."

We now ask that a more definite plan of action be formulated, and to that end we make the following proposals:—

1. The integration within the Peace Pledge Union of this "political party with a soul" with these reservations:
   (a) No paid officials.
   (b) Paid assistants to have no power to make decisions affecting policy.
   (c) No adulation of personalities, and to this end a constant watch upon the tendencies to hero-worship.
2. The declaration by the Union of a policy demanding "Armistice Now" and pressing our Government to declare publicly the terms upon which it would agree to a cessation of hostilities.
3. A declaration that we stand unequivocally for universal disarmament.
4. A declaration that as an essential step for such universal disarmament, we demand that the Government renounce all claims to imperial possessions and allow full self-government to all peoples within the British Commonwealth and Empire.
5. That the Union states its absolute opposition to conscription for war and industrial purposes, and refuses to operate or assist either forms.
6. A declaration that we are opposed to capitalist economy because it is the chief cause of modern wars, and that we pledge ourselves to work for its overthrow and the substitution of a system of socialism based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as well as economic security.
7. That we establish a fund to aid dependants of war resisters throughout the world.
8. That we have close co-operation with international socialists.
9. That we have full co-operation with international war resisters.

The ways and means of our policy are essentially pacifist and non-violent, virile and realistic, and we call upon all friends for support and suggestions.

All comrades who approve of this programme should write to the Hon. Secy., Newcastle War Resisters, Frank Gillender, 5 Hood Street, Swalwell on Tyne, Co. Durham.

NEGOTIATED PEACE CAMPAIGN

Henry Hilditch, National Organiser of the Negotiated Peace Campaign, visited Manchester on May 9 and addressed a meeting of pacifists. He suggested the possibility of a National "Negotiated Peace" Week on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the outbreak of war (September 3rd).

On May 10 a large crowd listened attentively for two hours when Comrade Hilditch spoke and answered questions on "Peace by Negotiation" at Platt Fields Park. Although this was the first open-air meeting to be held on the subject in Manchester, the turn-up exceeded all expectations, and it was obvious that many of those present were in substantial agreement with the views put forward. Alderman Titt, a former Lord Mayor of Manchester, and seveal British and American soldiers were among those who attended the meeting.

Comrade Hilditch said that in 1917 every member of the War Cabinet—with the exception of Lord Curzon—was in favour of a negotiated settlement, and had there been a body of informed opinion in the country at that time we might have had such a peace. Unfortunately, as Lord Buckmaster points out in his Memoirs, the Government of the day was unable to control the war feeling which it had itself helped to incite earlier in the conflict, and there was no strong opinion in the country to support the starting of negotiations. In the present war it was the job of the pacifist movement to form an opinion favourable to negotiation.

If the mistake of 1917 were repeated we might discover in ten years' time—and many would regret their inactivity then—that a negotiated settlement could have been concluded in 1944 if there had been support in the country for such a move. Lord Grey expressed regret in 1925, for example, that he had not heeded the mediation proposals of the American President, and said the prospects for the future would have been much fairer if peace had been possible in 1916, as "two years of war, in which expenditure of life and national treasure were at their maximum, would have been avoided." A rigid adherence to-day to "Unconditional Surrender" would simply mean a repetition of the tragic error of the "Knock-out Blow," as Capt. Liddell Hart has shown in his recent book: "Why Don't We Learn from History?" Negotiation was not a case of "Trusting Hitler." "Whether or not a treaty is kept," said Mr. Hilditch, "does not depend upon the names at the foot of it, nor yet upon the trustworthiness of statesmen, but upon the terms that are in it."

To show the absurdity of the belief that "the Germans are different," he quoted the great historian of the Napoleonic period—Stubbs—as describing Britain and Germany to be the two great peace-loving nations of Europe. "One has only to substitute Germany for France in the propaganda of that time and it might have been written to-day."

Speaking on the very night of the signing of the Treaty of Versailles, Mr. E. D. Morel had said:

"If this treaty is not altered drastically—those of you who have little children can go and kiss them good-bye."

This prophecy has been fulfilled in the present war. The alternative to a repetition was negotiation.

In 1917 Germany—then at the height of her military power—had been willing to negotiate. How much more likely was it that she would be to-day, when her strength was waning?

As a Socialist he did not believe a negotiated settlement would be wholly satisfactory, but it was the first step and would be infinitely better than going on to repeat all the old mistakes—for that was what Churchill's policy meant. We could not even begin to eliminate the evils of the capitalist system until peace had been restored. If E. D. Morel's words were not to come true a second time—and the lives of their children were to be saved—then this war MUST be ended by means of negotiation.

The warmongering of this hour, which takes the particularly obnoxious form of discouraging all peace talk, or rumours of peace, or even work for peace, is a thing to prompt despair. Is war so desirable that we would delay its ending, or peace so undesirable that we would delay its coming, by so much as a split second of time?

The statue of the fifth Duke of Bedford which stood behind iron railings in Russell Square, was disfigured on October 26, 1941, as a protest against the war views of the present Duke of Bedford. Strange to relate, the fifth Duke was opposed to war, and defended a negotiated peace with Revolutionary France, in a famous speech in the House of Lords. The statue was sculptured by Sir Richard Westmacott, R.A., and is considerably more than life size.

The fifth Duke's Anti-War Speech is reproduced on page 139.

THE MARK OF VANDALISM

Patriotism is deemed a virtue. Yet it is never identified with the idea of life. Always we think of death—death to the species, the outrage and slaughter of humanity. Militarism has captured the slogan "patriotism" so absolutely that we think of a patriot always as a destroyer. His symbol is always a weapon; his attitude, one of menace. "Salute the Soldier" is patriotism. "Salute the Physician" makes no conventional appeal.

Patriotism is never international. Always it strides across frontiers to ravage and to conquer. How strange that such a concept of provincial braggadocio should prevail in the twentieth century of the Christian era!

Whoso will not participate in the fools' parade of death and criminal glory, will not join in the march of homicide, is an anti-patriot. Whatever relates to him becomes an object of vandalism.

We attach no importance to vandalism in a world where human beings are destroyed by the thousand without regard to age or sex. The destruction of a monument, or the stupid disfiguration of a statue, is a minor offence compared with the murder of a human being. Vandalism is an evidence of bad taste and irresponsible temper. Only as an evidence of the sorry outlook of patriotism do we treat of its stupid error.

Vandals are puerile exhibitionists, vulgarians who prosper in war-time and in periods of crisis. Nazism is an expression of vandalism. Vandalism is the creed and conduct of people who are prepared to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children and the sins of the children upon the memory of the fathers. Either way, torture the living, defame the dead, and let ignorance enjoy its masquerade of pomp and ceremony to the chant of devastation.

The story of the Bedford Estate railings in London broke in the British press on October 24, 1941. The best summary of it overseas appeared in the Melbourne Argus," Australia, the following day. This gave big headlines to a despatch from its London correspondent—

DUKE WON'T GIVE IRON RAILINGS

The letter-press stated, in part:—

The Duke of Bedford, whose notoriety has increased since it was revealed in the House of Commons on Tuesday that Mr. Morrison, Home Secretary, had refused him permission to visit Ireland, has now declared that he will not take down the iron railings around his Russell Square, Bedford Square, and other Bloomsbury properties . . . and make them available for use in the making of munitions. The King was the first to contribute the famous iron railings which surround Buckingham Palace.

"I am not willing to take my railings down to help the war effort," the Duke of Bedford declared . . .

It is estimated that there are enough railings in one square mile of the Duke's Bloomsbury property to make 10 medium tanks.

What other attitude did the militarist press expect a pacifist to adopt? We can conceive of many better uses for railings than conversion into tanks. It is strange that railings should become objectionable only in war-time and only because they are not turned into instruments of death.

Note the picture! The untrue implication that the Duke had sought to go to Dublin—to see the Nazis! The sacrifices of the loyal King. The disloyal Duke and his wicked railings. The ten tanks per square mile not supplied!

And then the correspondent added this note at the foot of his despatch:—

On Wednesday the Duke showed a reporter a copy of his latest pamphlet entitled "What a Game!" He admitted that there was a risk in publishing such books.

Risky literature publication! What a study in sinister conduct! What a story to rouse vulgar hatred! This story girdled the English-speaking world. As did its sequel.

During the night of October 26, 1941, the statue of Francis, fifth Duke of Bedford, in Russell Square, London, was splashed on the face and breast with yellow paint.

"V" signs in paint and chalk had been printed all over it. Immediately under the figure of the Duke were inscriptions in yellow paint. On the bronze figures on one of the side panels was chalked "Melt me."

Those who passed the statue the next day found that the fifth Duke bore a paint-pot on his head. A red, white, and blue scarf was draped round his neck, and a bottle, with a paint-brush, dangled from his wrist. The base of the statue was inscribed:—

GRANDFATHER OF A QUISLING—DOWN WITH TRAITOR, 1941, AND HIS RAILINGS—DOWN WITH DUKE

The statue is considerably more than life-size. It is of bronze and, as the militarist press next day carefully stated, contains a large proportion of war-valuable copper.

Big approving headlines were given to this act of stupid and feeble vandalism.

And then came the unaccepted truth about the railings.

The Daily Express published this paragraph in its issue for October 28, 1941:—

STATE CAN TAKE MY RAILINGS, SAYS DUKE

The Duke of Bedford writes to the Editor of the "Daily Express" concerning his railings round Bloomsbury Sq., Russell Sq. and Bedford Sq.:

"As I am a pacifist, I naturally would not take the initiative in presenting the railings to the Government.

"Naturally, if the Government wish they will take my railings. It would be useless for me to attempt to oppose them, as in this democratic country the State possesses the power to take anything it chooses from anybody."

Time and Tide, London, in its issue for November 1, 1941, pretended that the conscription of British railings made an end of a lot of ugly and pretentious ironmongery all over the country, and would give the meek access to a few quiet and shady places. It is inconceivable, in view of the vandalism that has developed during the war, and the property interests that the war has not destroyed, that such measures of unrestricted access to what are still private squares will survive the war. Hence this comment was merely so much war-time hypocrisy. It served as an introduction to an attack on the Duke of Bedford for his pacifism:—

The Duke of Bedford has let down Bloomsbury badly and while it may seem hard that the sins of the children should be visited—in yellow paint—upon the fathers or grandfathers, there was certainly provocation for the act of vandalism that took place in Russell Square on Monday night.

The Daily Sketch, London, for November 6, 1941, published an editorial stating:—

THIS MUST STOP

The case of the Duke of Bedford grows more serious. . . .

The Duke of Bedford is attracting very much more attention by his eccentricities than he has ever done by any service to his country.

And it should be put out of his power to circulate his defeatist and seditious opinions.

Under the somewhat abusive and most irrelevant heading, "Jerry and the Duke," the Eastern Daily Press, Norwich, next day published the Duke's correction of some of the press references to the railings. The Duke explained:—

I had never heard anything about the requisitioning of these railings until the Press started asking question about them, when I replied that, as a Christian pacifist, I naturally should not offer the railings to the Government for the making of armaments, but that if the Government requisitioned them I had neither the power nor the intention to offer any opposition.

My agent decided, with my approval, to schedule the railings round the Gower-st. Garden as being of special historic or artistic value. The others surrounding the only two squares over which the estate has control are doubtless being requisitioned.

The Duke wrote to the same effect in the Liverpool Echo the following day. His letter was headed by our contemporary: "A Duke's Railings."

Whilst the Duke was making these corrections of the railings story, "Idler," a staff writer in the Torbay Herald and Express, was publishing notes in that journal, stating that the Duke was in Northern Ireland waiting on a visit from John M'Govern, M.P.! That story was not corrected until twelve days later. Published November 8! Corrected November 20. A lie with twelve days start!

Evening Standard for November 10, 1941, stated:—

The valuable 5ft. high railings in Russell Square, owned by the Duke of Bedford, were to-day being removed by men from the Ministry of Works and Buildings. . .

The railings round Russell Square and Bloomsbury Square are to come down. Those at Bedford Square will stay because of their historic value.

That day the Yorkshire Observer published a story which queried the integrity of the compact patriotic majority slanderers. The staff-writer courageously wrote:—

The Duke of Bedford is more than a headline to me—he is a vivid, personal experience.

It was about a year ago, after he had returned from Dublin with certain peace proposals.

He was saying something about these proposals to an audience which included a number of half-tipsy Irish labourers, earning £10 a week on war work. They did not like the proposals, nor did they like the Duke of Peace. They became angry and threatening.

The Duke was deploring the loss of British, Norwegian and German lives, and someone shouted "Why not put the Germans first?" When the Duke retorted, "As a believer that all men are equal in the sight of God, I'm prepared to do that," I looked round for the nearest exit.

I left the meeting convinced of the courage and sincerity of the Duke. Now he is defying Mr Morrison, who is earning a reputation for shutting up people and closing down papers.

To upset the Observer's slight suggestion of justice, the Manchester Guardian, in its miscellany three days later, made an extraordinary comment beneath the subheading: "More Work for the Police":—

That statues in public places should not be daubed with paint or otherwise disfigured is a proposition that no normal person would challenge. At the same time it seems slightly horrifying to read that "a day-and-night police watch" is being kept over the statue of the fifth Duke of Bedford in Russell Square in order to prevent further attacks on that memorial . . . the ancestral effigy of an increasingly wayward and self-satisfied peer who has managed to make himself thoroughly unpopular with the vast majority of his fellow-countrymen. It is a nuisance that there should be silly people who try to daub statues. It is an even bigger nuisance that they should have been given any excuse for their mistaken activities.

Was a more ridiculous comment on public vandalism ever published by a responsible paper?

The Torbay Herald, Torquay, for November 20, 1941, published the Duke's letter, beginning:—

Sir,—May I be allowed to point out that Mr. McGovern did not ask the Home Secretary for permission to go to Northern Ireland in order to see me? Mr. McGovern desired to go to Northern Ireland to make some inquiries with regard to the detention of Mr. Cahir Healy under Regulation 18B.

The "Western Independent," Plymouth, for November 23, published an article on "the great house of Russell," mentioning that the Duke of Bedford was its head. The study concluded by a reference to the first Duke, who entered politics as M.P. for Tavistock, in the Long Parliament: and to his martyred son, Lord William Russell, who also sat for Tavistock. The writer concluded:—

So did the sixth Duke, who became a member of the Society of "The Friends of the People." So did the Duke's third son, the famous nineteenth century reformer, Lord John Russell.

Two years and one month later, another Plymouth paper, the Western Morning News, published a picture of a wreath being placed to the memory of Pym on the memorial of the seventh Duke of Bedford at Tavistock. A correspondent recalled (December 11) memories of Pym and his close connection with the Duke of Bedford:—

It was the Duke's ancestor, the fourth Lord Bedford, as the historian Froude records, who gave Pym his seat in Parliament; and the eldest son of that ancestor, William Russell, the future first Duke of Bedford, was Pym's fellow-Member in the representation of Tavistock; and it was, in turn, his eldest son who died on the scaffold, under Charles II, in the same cause of Constitutional liberty for which Pym had lived and worked.

It is of interest, too, to recall that Clarendon, in his history of the Rebellion, records that in 1641 King Charles I, anxious to conciliate the Commons, had the intention to appoint the fourth Earl of Bedford Lord High Treasurer, or, as we should say, Prime Minister, with Pym as his Chancellor of the Exchequer.

But before the King had carried out his purpose, Bedford caught the smallpox and died. With him, too, died the wise project of the King. . . .

Never, perhaps, in the history of our country has so much hung on the life or death of one man.

Photographs could be taken of all existing monuments and the monuments demolished. Most of them are blots on the landscape. Let the removals be done decently and usefully, for the well-being of humanity, and not in a spirit of vandalism.

Among the patriotic fanatics—actually warmongering hate-mongering anti-patriots—who applauded the Russell Square vandalism were religious fanatics and even irreligious fanatics. We heard atheist-patriots, to their shame, applaud the yellow-paint daubing, etc., of the statue of the Francis, Fifth Duke of Bedford. What thoughtless fools! These persons despise the Bedford monument but would approve a monument to Ingersoll. Let them beware. Ignorance has a case of hatred against Robert Green Ingersoll just as ignorance has a case against the present Duke of Bedford.

(To be concluded.)

THE FEAR OF PEACE.

To hear some people talk you would think Sherman had said "Peace is hell!"

The thought of going back to a quiet, orderly world of brotherly love throws them into depths of pessimism. Of course, the men and women who are doing the fighting don't feel that way; it's the folks far behind the lines with none of their loved ones at the front.

The less danger they're in the more they're nervous about waking up some morning and finding peace staring them in the face. . .

It's just too bad. Maybe Washington should begin now to do something to build up peace morale; to condition people for struggling on through peacetimes. Maybe there should be an office of OPI (Office of Peace Information) created immediately to keep the fidgety folks fully informed of the dangers ahead.

The Government could even create some medals for Distinguished Conduct in the Face of Peace.

With special ribbons for the fellow with nerve enough to hear a peace rumor and say, "Fine. It can't come too soon to suit me. I'll take it over war any old time."

PERMANENT PEACE—HOW?

Speech delivered in the House of Lords, January 27, 1795, by Francis, Fifth Duke of Bedford, respecting Peace with France.

[. . . The following report of the speech made in the House of Lords by Francis, fifth Duke of Bedford, makes excellent reading at the present time. The fifth Duke succeeded to the title when he was six years of age and was twenty-nine when he defended revolutionary France in the House of Lords. The arguments he advanced against the policy of permanent peace through unconditional surrender apply with the same force to-day as in 1795, notwithstanding the lapse of time, and the contrast between France and Germany. Like the 12th Duke, he spoke to a hostile house. It is an event of interest that, as pointed out in another column, his statue should be defaced because his descendant, the present Duke, dares to stand out against war also. This gives point to what the fifth Duke said in 1795 and invites consideration to his great and wise speech.]

Reproduced from the Official Report.

The Duke of Bedford called their lordships' attention to the motion upon which they had been summoned. If their lordships should think fit to negative it, they would render the prospect of peace more desperate than even the proceedings of ministers, or more particularly their language and the language of their friends. Their lordships had often heard it asserted that this was a war usque ad internecionem—a sentiment so fraught with cruelty and so dangerous to the principles of all good government, that to call upon their lordships to contradict it was to call upon their policy as well as their justice. Whenever a proposition for peace had been brought forward, it had been contended that to do so would tie up the hands of ministers, and oblige them to accept of whatever terms the enemy thought fit to grant. His motion had no such tendency. All he asked their lordships to declare was that they were ready to accede to peace as soon as it could be obtained with safety and with honour.

His motion would bind their lordships to no particular time, but leave both time and terms to the discretion of ministers who were responsible for their exercise of that discretion. The common arguments against every proposition were, that no peace concluded with the present government of France could be permanent; that to sue for peace would be as injurious to our interest as inconsistent with our honour. Now, no man who recommended removing the obstacles to peace had ever proposed suing for it. Next was alleged the danger to this country from the introduction of French principles; our Allies, it was said, were preparing to make greater exertions; and the desperate situation of the French finances rendered it impossible for them to continue the war on the same extended scale of operations that had hitherto baffled our efforts. Then, feeling the insufficiency of their own arguments, ministers attacked the passions of their lordships, and told them that the war was the cause of humanity, of religion, and of God.

To negotiate, ministers said, would be dishonourable. How, they asked, could we make the first overtures for peace, when it was notorious that the French had been the aggressors? The question of aggression was by no means so clear as they chose to represent it; but, admitting it to be so, let their lordships consider what endless scenes of blood Europe must have exhibited, had it been the predominant principle of courts that no states could, without dishonour, manifest a disposition to peace, unless it had been the aggressor in the commencement of war. We had often offered to treat when our arms were successful, although we had not been the aggressors; and in the American war, which was unsuccessful, we had even suspended offensive operations as a preliminary to negotiation.

To prove that the French had been the aggressors, the decree of November 19, 1792, had been much insisted upon: and the argument came with greater weight from being urged soon after their lordships, in a dutiful address, had expressed their approbation of a speech from the throne in which his majesty told them that he had carefully abstained from all interference in the affairs of France, and that in all the disputes between the continental powers he had observed a strict neutrality. He was ready to admit that we had a right to interfere in the internal government of France, if the French declared an intention of interfering in ours. But let their lordships call to mind how anxious the French had been to retract this declaration. Their minister for foreign affairs offered any explanation that might be required. The same inclination was shown by speeches in the Convention.

After a speech by Danton, setting forth that although friends to the liberty of all mankind, they ought to correct the errors of momentary enthusiasm, a decree was passed declaring that the French would not interfere with government of other countries; and in their new Constitution an article was inserted, that they would not interfere in the government of any other people, nor suffer any other people to interfere in theirs. They had therefore renounced this offensive principle, and we ought to do so too.

In answer to the assertion that no permanent peace could be made with the present French Government, he would ask what was a permanent peace? Where, in the history of Europe, was a permanent peace to be found in the absolute sense of the word? A permanent peace, in any rational and practical acceptation of the term, was a peace on such condition as each of the contracting parties had a right to expect. An equitable peace was the only one likely to be permanent; for a nation, compelled to accept of any other, smarting under a sense of injury, would observe it no longer than weakness and necessity compelled.

Were he to argue on relative permanency, he should think that peace with a republic must be more lasting than with a monarchy, either absolute or limited. In a republic the question of peace or war must be debated and canvassed by numerous bodies of men; whereas in a monarchy, a single individual might decide; and while human judgment was liable to mistake, the decision of one person must be less to be relied upon than that of several.

Their lordships were exhorted to persevere in the war, because of the danger to be apprehended from the introduction of French principles. Were Englishmen, then, so disaffected to the Constitution; were they so partial to the institutions of other countries, in preference to those of their own, as to be ready to abandon them on the first suggestion? French Jacobins, it was said, would come into this country. Who were these Jacobins? Were they the members of the Jacobin Club?; or was it meant to brand the whole people of France with the name of Jacobin?

But, in what situation would the French Jacobin come here? Was there anything so peculiarly captivating in his language or address as to make him formidable? He must tell the people of this country, "Do as we have done in France; destroy your monarchy; abolish the House of Lords; dismiss the House of Commons; sweep away all your ancient institutions, and establish liberty and equality." The Englishman would hardly be so dull as not to ask, "What have you established in the room of all you have abolished; and how do you know that what you promise would be better than what I possess?" he would ask, "How came you to forsake all the blessings of your own liberty to come here, where you say there is none?" If the Jacobin should reply that his universal philanthropy had induced him to become a voluntary exile, to relinquish the blessings of liberty at home in order to preach liberty to strangers, the Englishman would probably ask, "What have you gained by your liberty, and what have you suffered? Is not your agriculture impaired, your manufactures and commerce ruined, poverty and want brought upon your citizens who have survived the prisons, or escaped the executions and the slaughter to which you have been led without distinction?"

The next argument for persisting in the war was drawn from the increased exertions to be made by our allies, and the desperate state of the French finances. But could their lordships hope for greater exertions on the part of these allies? Even if they were willing, they were not able. With respect to the finances of France, his general conclusion was that they were by no means so exhausted as ministers wished us to believe. But supposing them to be exhausted, could we ruin the country? Certainly not. While there was prosperity in the country the Government would find means to get it for the purpose of maintaining their armies; while the people were convinced that the war was a war of extermination or submission to the will of a foreign enemy they would sacrifice their property. If we could not ruin them in finance, could we hope to outnumber them? Their population was 1/7 of all Europe, and add to this the extensive acquisition of all Holland, where they had not entered as an enemy, but had been received as an ally. He had heard their lordships' feelings played upon by being told that they were embarked on the cause of humanity and of God. Was the death of 50,000 British subjects who had fallen in the war, and of hundreds of thousands of innocent soldiers on all sides a circumstance favourable to the cause of humanity?

It was agreed on all hands that the present state of France was preferable to that in which it had been very lately. Surely this was a circumstance for humanity to rejoice in. But what was the language of our humanity? We saw a nation emerging from guilt and blood, its rulers in some instances punishing, and in many endeavouring to repair the mischief they had done. Should we not hail this as a favourable omen? "No," said ministers, "you shall not restore order and justice, but by our means; nothing shall satisfy us but carrying war to your frontiers, and famine in the interior."

By this course we should never conquer the armies or the opinions of France; but we might perhaps regenerate the system of violence and blood. Were we to assume to ourselves the task of punishing the French nation on the pretext of their impiety? If the principles in which his youth had been instructed were true, it was not for feeble and erring man to assume the office of dispensing the vengeance of God, and wrest the thunderbolt of justice from the arm of omnipotence. It could not be denied that the war was less popular in this country than it had been; and in proportion as it became unpopular must our exertions be enfeebled. If their lordships were to declare that they supported the war, not for the purpose of dictating a form of government for France, but to obtain equitable terms of peace, and the French people, or their rulers, obstinately persisted in continuing the war, what feeling would actuate every Englishman but that we were engaged in a war of necessity; that we were fighting for our liberty, for our existence, and that every sacrifice and every exertion must be made?

The noble duke concluded with moving:—

"That any particular form of government which may prevail in France should not preclude negotiation or prevent peace consistent with the interest, the honour, and the security of this country."

THE ONLY CARROT

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

I am glad I am not a soldier; not merely because I feel war to be wrong and because a soldier's life these days is apt to resemble that of Man in his Natural State, described by Hobbs as "nasty, brutish and short"; but because it has become so glaringly and increasingly obvious that the Serviceman has nothing worth-while to look forward to as a reward for his sacrifice, if he should achieve the only war aim—victory—which has not been thrown overboard.

It was different in 1914-18. Then some really juicy-looking carrots were dangled before the soldier's hopeful nose—"War to end war"; "War for Freedom and Democracy"; and best of all, "A land fit for heroes to live in!" But this time . . .

"Owlglass," in one of his witty articles in "Peace News," reminded his readers how E. A. Hulton of "Picture Post," urging the need to "combat the state of mind which cannot visualise the possibility of another war," writes, "Vast Russia has forged a wonderful fighting machine which her generals may feel disinclined to disband. . . . Britain must keep her wits about her to preserve that equality, which is the surest guarantee of peace"; and he goes on to say that we must "make up for our numerical inferiority by devoting a greater portion of our production to armaments, than the Russians."

"Owlglass" further calls attention to the fact that the B.B.C., summarising a recent Debate on post-war housing, announced that: "In years to come vulnerability to bombing will affect house planning."

In the same number of "Peace News" the opinions of a Mr. Stuart Gelder are quoted from a May issue of the "News Chronicle." Mr. Gelder, it seems, has a low opinion of the present Chung-king Government and says that—

> If the present Anti-Liberal trend in Chungking continues, the final result of the defeat of Japan in China might well be the emergence of something very like a Fascist dictatorship which would use Lend-Lease weapons to suppress any popular attempt to overthrow it . . . A Fascist China might in time be as dangerous as an Imperial Japan

Now the degree of interest to be attached to these Press and B.B.C. statements does not depend entirely on the good or bad judgment of their authors: it lies even more in the fact that they were made at all. The Press and the B.B.C., as we all know, are owned or controlled by inveterate warmongers. They are also subject to Government censorship, so that no article is published or statement broadcast which our rulers regard as highly obnoxious and dangerous to their war aims and war effort. It follows, therefore, that the Government has no objection to the people being gradually accustomed to the idea that there will be more wars when this one is finished and more air-raids; and that we may have to fight Russia, or China, or both, on some future occasion. Mr. Hulton and Mr. Gelder do not go quite so far as actually to mention war with Russia or China in so many words—as we have not yet finished with their services in the present enterprise, to have done so might have savoured of rather indecent haste—but the suggestion is there right enough. The bit about "equality of armaments being the surest guarantee of peace," besides being rubbish from the standpoint of the evidence of history, is the thinnest of thin camouflage when taken in conjunction with what follows; while if it is right to have a war with Japan because her imperialism is dangerous, it follows logically that it may be equally right to have a war with China if her Fascism should prove just as bad.

Seeing that war with Russia or China will be a big undertaking, it will be essential to have Allies, and if the necessary arrangements can be fixed up at the proper time, what Allies could be more useful than Germany or Japan? In this war it seemed to me to take about a week's propaganda to switch the proper geese who compose 90 per cent. of our unthinking population from fear and hatred of Soviet Russia over to an admiration of ever-deepening intensity.

I calculate that in the next war it should not take much more than three days to accomplish the reverse switch-over to love of Germany and Japan. The technique of war propaganda (like the efficiency of bomber aircraft) will have been improved considerably by the time the next show is due to begin; while the citizens of a slave-State, such as we have now become, are even less capable of original thought, memory and critical judgment than those of the semi-democracy which we were when this war started.

Yes, I am glad I am not a soldier—bigger and better wars the only carrot left!

This article was written before the Second Front began and I feel that I should not like to conclude it without expressing my very deep sympathy both with soldiers and their relatives. If I have written cynically it is only because I feel that the foul racket of war deserves cynicism.

TOWARDS THE GREATER VICTORY

An Appeal to True Patriots

By FRIEDA LE PLA

FOREWORD.

The following essay was written shortly before Christmas (1943) for private use only. In revising it now for unexpected wider service, however, I have not altered the Christmas setting because Christmas is far more than an external festivity confined to a fixed date. The Christmas spirit and atmosphere are urgently needed all the year round, and we can bring every day our gifts to the feet of the Christ-Child whom we acclaim our Prince of Peace.

I should perhaps also make it clear that this appeal was written to my non-Pacifist fellow-citizens rather than to the Pacifists, and response to it would not in any way compromise the position of those who are honestly unable to accept Pacifist principles and methods. It is therefore to our non-Pacifist fellows that in one paragraph herein I point out that the war need not even be interrupted if they decide to give fair trial to the alternative to prolonged war suggested in these pages, and that in any case if the proposal failed to win the desired response from our opponents the war could be continued.

But to avoid misunderstanding on the part of my Pacifist fellow-citizens it is necessary to make clear at the outset that I personally am against the continuation of war under any circumstances whatever, for even if the alternative herein proposed did fail, there are also other alternatives which could be tried out, all far more humane, more Christian, more civilised, and more permanently effective than war could possibly be. But to set forth all the various alternatives here—other than the one which could be immediately tried even by the most anti-Pacifist and enthusiastic of war-supporters—is beyond the scope of this pamphlet and has already been done elsewhere.

Whether we could win this greater, more permanent, and more glorious victory depends on whether our own Nation and her Allies could themselves be great enough and Christian enough—and also heroic enough—for such a conquest, a conquest truly worthy to bring to the Christ-Child for his blessing and approval as our birthday offering to him.

The Greater Victory.

Many humane and Christian people to-day, shocked and distressed by the increasing savagery of the war-methods adopted by both sides, are asking in anguish of heart: "But what else can we do to shorten the war? How else can we end it quickly so that there are still populations left in Europe to be liberated"?

Before coming to our practical suggestion the following points should be kept in mind—and in our hearts:—

1. Thousands of innocent children are daily being starved either to death or to permanent physical and mental deformity, while others are being killed or tortured and mutilated by bombs which hurl them down and bury them alive beneath the debris of their own wrecked homes or schools, sometimes to lie there for hours in pain, hunger, and terror before they are found—if they are found. Modern war involves war against children—surely a crime that should be rejected with horror and indignation by any humane and Christian nation, and brought to an end without any delay.

2. Jan Masaryk, the Czech leader, said some time ago (according to a report in the News Chronicle—"If this war lasts much longer, Europe will be one vast cemetery."

3. The distinguished military expert, Captain Liddell Hart, wrote in 1940, before the war was even two years old: "As to peace, we must always remember that a long war tends to a bad peace. . . . I still insist that (military) victory has less to offer than an indecisive war that ends in an agreed peace. The idea of complete and overwhelming victory is the greatest folly on earth. Such victory only leads to bankruptcy, moral as well as economic."

4. The vastly superior military position now attained by the United Nations—so that ultimate military victory is assured to them—already gives them the power to lay down terms for an armistice.

5. For some months there have been recurrent rumours that the Axis Nations would be willing to consider and were even planning peace proposals. Any such desire on the part of opposing nations, whatever the underlying motive, implies a willingness to yield much to obtain peace. It may also imply the recognition that the Allies are already victorious in the military sense. All which means that the Allies could almost certainly gain those nobler ends for which they had started the war, and so win for the ideals they then claimed to be theirs.

6. Earlier in the war allied spokesmen had repeatedly declared that it would be a crime against Humanity (and surely against their own professed ideals) to continue the war one day longer than is necessary to attain the ends stated at that time to be theirs—namely, the liberation of the captive European nations and the downfall of Fascism and Nazism.

To what practical suggestions, then, do these six considerations lead? If it is our earnest desire, as a humane and Christian nation, to save the children of the world from further torture by starvation and bombing, and to save Europe from becoming "one vast cemetery" (which is certainly what it would risk becoming with invasion added to starvation and bombing); if the United Nations are to be saved from being guilty of that "greatest folly on earth" and the moral deterioration and bankruptcy against which Captain Hart warns the nation; and if the allied statesmen are sincere in their assertions that it would be a crime, and that they have no wish, to prolong the war a single day longer than is necessary to attain the ideals with which they had started the war—then surely the first practical step for them is that they should become great enough and Christian enough to give up their more recent and very unworthy demand for "unconditional surrender"—which is doing more to prolong the war and play into Goebbels' hands than anything else is—and immediately propose an armistice (or a "truce of God") on terms consistent with the Christian ideals they have claimed as theirs—which terms would of course include the immediate cessation by the Nazis of their persecution of the Jews, and the Axis Powers' withdrawal from the occupied countries, together with an invitation to all the Axis Nations to co-operate with the Allies in relief and construction work. Fascism in Italy is already doomed; and Nazism would speedily collapse with the removal of the external menace to Germany on which its hold on the German people is largely based. To insist on "unconditional surrender" (which absurdity has already been exposed many times by such distinguished writers as Commander King-Hall and Count De La Bedoyere) is not only to be false to the very aims which our people had earlier declared to be theirs: it also means, as already said above, needlessly prolonging the war, playing right into Hitler's and Goebbels' hands by stiffening the German people's will to resist, whereas the offer of generous armistice terms would almost certainly weaken that will to resist, weaken Hitler's hold on them, and help to bring about his defeat and downfall.

If our people are to realise how valuable a gift they have made to Goebbels by their adoption of the slogan "unconditional surrender" we must bring out its real meaning before going on further. It does not mean, "If you will accept our ideals we will end the war." It means: "Even if you, our enemies, do happen to be willing to stop persecuting the Jews and to withdraw from the occupied nations, we are not going to trouble ourselves even to ascertain if this is so, for even if it were so, we intend to go on trying to smash you just the same. Moreover, even when you are down and weakened so that you cannot any longer fight a winning battle—which was Italy's position before her surrender—we shall go on beating and beating at you, bombing, burning, and blasting you and your children till we force you to say: 'Because we have no power to do otherwise we will agree to everything you dictate, whether moral or immoral, honourable or dishonourable, and whether it means annihilation or enslavement for us, body and soul.'" For that is just what unconditional surrender means—the demand that our victim should deliver himself up to us, blindly, body and soul, to do our dictated will. It also means a greater concern to get an absolute victory for ourselves (with that aforesaid absolute domination over our victim) than the achievement of victory for our ideals—which latter victory could be won far sooner and far more permanently by the offer of generous armistice terms at once than by prolonging the war with its accompaniment of long-drawn-out torture of thousands of children.

Of course Hitler and Goebbels would much prefer that we hold to the "unconditional surrender" slogan and flourish it as ferociously as we like—our gift to them. But we do not really want to help Hitler, do we? And surely that slogan is a base and unworthy demand, a dishonourable demand, to come from a nation calling itself Christian and professing to be more concerned for winning people to our ideals than for domination of others?

A truly great and Christian nation would welcome even the faintest signs of willingness for peace on the part of its opponent—never spurn it as an "offensive" action. (And here let it be said that it is surely one of the most disgraceful things in a Christian nation that its people or its Government should speak of any readiness for peace by its enemies as being "offensive." The Christian Churches in particular should be ashamed to let such a term be used about any peace suggestions without protesting vigorously about it.) Welcoming warmly any dawning desire for peace, we should immediately test its sincerity by proposing honourable terms for an armistice—terms which would be an honour to the nations proposing them and to those accepting them, terms as we could bring to our Lord Christ for His approval and blessing.

There is nothing to be lost or risked (and let this be emphasised) by courageously adventuring out on this path to the immediate cessation of military hostilities, for the offer of generous armistice terms can be made without interrupting the war; and if the Nazis should prove false (which would be very unlikely under the circumstances), the Allies could resume their war and could then carry it on with far less guilt, for their consciences would be clear of any charge that they had persisted in their bombing, burning, slaughtering, and starving of thousands of human beings long after they could have attained their ends (or those of their ends which are righteous) by offering armistice terms of an honourable character. To continue the war for even one week after the Axis Nations had shown any readiness to consider armistice proposals, without testing that willingness by offering decent and fair terms, is a grave crime against God and Humanity—as grave as anything committed by the Nazis, for it would make us wholly responsible for the prolongation of Europe's—and China's—agony, and for the moral deterioration inevitable to belligerancy.

Fellow-citizens, in the name of the starving children of the world; in the name of the truest and noblest patriotism, and in the name of the Prince of Peace whom we profess to take as our Lord—will you not see to it that our Nation shall lead the way in this great, daring, and heroic adventure in a more humane and Christian type of victory, a victory we could bring with joy and pride as a Christmas gift to the Christ-Child on His Birthday? And let us remember, the Star of Bethlehem was not only the Star of Peace; it was also—as the three kings or magi found when they started out to follow it—the Star of Adventure.

APPENDIX

To the difficulty felt by our non-Pacifist friends, and indeed by many Pacifists also, that a negotiated peace would not be a stable peace and would be a compromise peace, there is a six-point reply.

1. As Captain Liddell Hart pointed out in the article from which the quotation already given was taken, history proves that a dictated peace is usually the most unstable of all. Did the "peace that followed the 1914-18 war prove stable? Holding within itself the seeds of the next war it produced nothing but a very uneasy truce.

2. The only stable peace is that born of terms fair to all nations concerned, and agreed to by all—by the people, not only by their governments.

3. The complete defeat of any nation or group of nations is no guarantee of a stable peace because present-day economic conditions, as well as all wars ending in crushing defeat, hold within themselves the seeds of further conflicts.

4. An unstable peace does at least provide an interlude which is less un-Christian and inhuman than certain war, because it is minus the addition of war's still more glaringly anti-Christian and torturingly brutal operations, and it gives time for passions to cool and for the blinding war-clouds to subside, paving the way for a clearer, truer vision of the tangled situation and its healing.

5. A "peace" of any kind, however bad and unstable, does provide opportunities—which war-time restrictions cut off—for the more Christian, humane, and reasonable elements in the various nations to effect contact and co-operation with each other in working against evil systems, the Christian and anti-Nazi forces in Germany and Britain and other nations thus carrying on the struggle together instead of wastefully killing each other in indiscriminate military warfare.

6. An unstable peace can by progressive stages and persistent effort be transformed into a stable peace if the aforesaid Christian and reasonable forces in the various nations have unrestricted scope for joint action. And there would be plenty of time for this, for even if the present war ended to-morrow, the belligerent nations would be far too exhausted—both morally and economically—and far too war-weary, even to think about another war for many years to come.

For all these reasons, therefore, a negotiated immediate armistice or peace has far more promise of stability, and offers far more scope for the Christian and peace-loving groups in every nation to build up a permanent and Christian peace, than war ending in crushing defeat of either side can ever hold. Again—in the name of Christ and "these my little ones", in the name of the highest patriotism, test the possibilities of ending this colossal carnage called war by abandoning the desire for unconditional military victory and substituting instead the immediate offer of such honourable terms as we could bring to the Lord Christ for His blessing—and so win the greater victory.

Mr. Morrison—These cases are often difficult to understand. I have tried, in the special circumstances of this case to be as helpful as I can and I will do so, but I do not think I ought so to speak, to usurp directly the functions of the local authority in the matter.

Earl Winterton—Could not the right hon. gentleman make it quite clear that local authorities are not to be interfered with by questions in this House, in the carrying out of their duties under the law?

Mr. Morrison—I think that point is covered by the answer which I have given.

Rhys Davies Active

It is impossible to record justly the unremitting vigilance of our comrade, Rhys Davies, in the House of Commons. He maintains an uncompromising stand in defence of pacifism, the conscientious objector, the victim of industrial conscription, and the oppressed soldier. Below is a typical day's record of his persistent questioning.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Thursday, 15th June, 1944.
ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.
NATIONAL WAR EFFORT.
Coal-Mining (Directed Youths.)

1. Mr. Rhys Davies asked the Minister of Labour how many ballottees have refused to enter the coal-mining industry; how many have been prosecuted for refusing; and how many of them have been imprisoned.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Ernest Bevin)—I have no exact figure of the number of ballottees who have refused to enter coal-mining. Up to 31st May, there had been 285 failures to comply with directions to undergo training, but this total, no doubt, included a certain number of cases in which there were good reasons, such as sickness, for not complying immediately. Up to the same date, 135 ballottees had been prosecuted for failing to comply with directions either to coal-mining training or to a working colliery. Of these, 32 were sentenced to imprisonment, but within a few days 19 of these were released, on promising to comply with their directions.

Mr Rhys Davies—In view of the reluctance of some courts to convict in cases like this, because the boys prefer to enter the Forces rather than the mines, and in view also of the fact that the High Court of Justice in New Zealand has recently decided that compulsions like this are akin to the serfdom of the Middle Ages, will not my right hon. friend reconsider his policy?

Mr. Bevin—No, Sir. Some things in the Middle Ages were worth preserving.

UNITED STATES FORCES, GREAT BRITAIN (DEATH SENTENCES).

23. Mr. Rhys Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of persons sentenced to death in this country by foreign powers; and how many of these have been executed on British soil.

Mr. H. Morrison—I am informed that sentence of death has been passed on fourteen members of the United States forces by United States courts martial in the United Kingdom. In three cases the sentence has been commuted to life imprisonment; four cases are still subject to review; and in seven cases the sentence of death has been carried out by the United States authorities in this country. In every case in which the death sentence has been carried out the offence charged has been murder; in one of the cases rape had been committed as well as murder. So far as I am aware no sentence of death has been passed in this country by the courts of any other foreign power, but their courts martial do not try cases of murder, manslaughter or rape.

Mr. Rhys Davies—Would the right hon. gentleman say whether all those who have been sentenced to death were negro soldiers, or whther there were any whites among them?

Mr. Morrison—I could not say without notice.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR (PROSECUTION, LEWES)

24. Mr. Rhys Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions George Elphick, 66 Priory Street, Lewes, a registered ocnscientious objector, has been prosecuted at Lewes police court for refusing fireguard duty and with what results; what has been the cost of the prosecutions to date and on whom has it fallen; whether he will give an assurance that no Government contribution has been made or will be made towards such costs; and whether he will take powers to prevent such persecution, which was deprecated by the Regional Commissioner in October 1942.

Mr. H. Morrison—This man has been before the magistrates seven times and was convicted on six occasions. Patriculars of the cost of the prosecutions are not at present available, but the local authority has been informed that no grant from the Exchequer will be made towards expenditure on proceedings commenced against him after 8th Octobr, e1942. As regards the last part of the question, I would refer my hon. friend to my answer of 9th December last.

Mr. Rhys Davies—While thanking the right hon. gentleman for the action which he has already taken in this case, may I ask whether it is possible for him to take some further steps to prevent an obvious waste of public money and the time of the courts, in what is tantamount to absolute perseeution.

WHAT THE STARS REVEAL

GLIMPSES BY "GOWRIE"

The first cases to be heard by the Tribunals under the Ministry of Labour (Post-War) Regulations came before the London Tribunal yesterday. That such national organisation of labour resources would be necessary after the war was foreshadowed by many prominent politicians, including Lord Bevin, Viscount Morrison, and Dame Ellen Wilkinson, O.B.E., for some time before the cessation of hostilities. With the coming into power of the present Socialist Government, new types of objectors seem to have arisen, and the callings represented are widely varied. A strange coincidence about most of yesterday's applicants was that each mentioned that their work had been recognised as being of national importance during the war period.

First to appear before the Tribunal was Henry Johnson (33), groom at the Racing Stud of the Duke of Hampole. He said he was a key man, who had been indispensable during the war, and had strong objections to being ordered to take up other work. His domestic arrangements would be upset. He had been brought up in the village and had no wish to leave it. He was granted exemption conditional on his taking up a three years' course of study in Modern Languages and giving an undertaking to read "Co-operation, the Only Hope," by Lord Beaverbrook.

Next to appear was Hugh Robinson, an agent of the Pearl Assurance Company. In view of the valuable service his employers rendered to the working classes, the applicant claimed that his objection to taking up other work was conscientious and a matter of principle. He cited cases where poor widows and others had said to him that they did not know what they would have done if it had not been for the "Pearl," and he had been the means, by his tact and persuasive manner, of preventing the lapsing of very many policies. A superintendent from the "Pearl" said that Mr. Robinson had served the company faithfully and well, and always put their interests before his own. He did not think he could serve the community better in any other capacity. The applicant was directed to road construction work.

A skilled worker in a firm of tobacco and cigarette manufacturers, William Dawson, who pleaded hardship on account of home ties, said he had been allowed to remain at his work during the war, as the manufacture of cigarettes had been of great importance to the winning of the war. It was his opinion that the morale of the country would be very poor now if it were not for a constant supply of cigarettes. It was that comfort which had saved his mother's life in a recent illness. Applicant was granted exemption, the conditions being that for three evenings every week he should render voluntary service to the Y.M.C.A.

James Philpot, an officer in the Salvation Army, had a strong conscientious objection to taking up other work. He said he was working for the Lord, and could not conceive of work more important or more urgent than the saving of souls and the fight against sin and wickedness. Asked about his former occupation, applicant stated that he had been employed by the Corporation in the street cleaning department. He was not prepared to go back to this. Since he had been "born again" he had made a clean break with his former life, glory be. As he showed no willingness to compromise in any way, Philpot was told by the chairman that he would be directed to take up chimney sweeping, and a warning was added that if he did not comply within a reasonable time he would be sent to prison.

Describing herself as a "glamour girl" from the Porchester Follies, Annette Ransome told the Tribunal of her war service, entertaining the troops, chiefly officers, by keeping up their morale, in various night clubs and hotel shows. The importance of her work had been recognised by highly-placed military officers and State officials. She wished to continue this form of service for the benefit of jaded business gentlemen. She was the sole support of her widowed mother, and did not want to take up other work. She was granted exemption conditional upon taking up part-time work with the Women's Rural Institute Movement.

Another young woman, the private secretary of a prominent banker, was directed to secure employment in a soap factory.

An ex-Serviceman, who had been wounded in North Africa and was at present working as a bookmaker's clerk, said he wished to remain in his present post because it meant him spending most of his time out of doors, and he was very useful to his employer, who was a jolly good fellow. He had no domestic ties, but had a conscientious objection to working for anyone else except Joe Blossom, who was well known on all racecourses. The last-named individual stated that the applicant was indispensable to him, and at a recent meeting at Newmarket had saved him from a nasty accident.

The Chairman said that an ex-Serviceman should not think that because he had been in the Army he could just do as he liked. If all ex-Servicemen did that and did not submit to discipline in some form or other, the country would be in a state of chaos. Applicant was directed to serve behind the counter in the Maypole, and to take a course of study under the Society for the Prevention of Juvenile Crime.

John Hunt, a traveller for a firm of brewers and wine and spirit merchants, who had stuck to his post during the war, was allowed to remain on condition that his three children attended the Band of Hope regularly during the ensuing three years.

Finally, Lord Ashtray appeared to defend his claim for exemption from direction. His entry into the Court was the signal for excited whisperings. The noble lord is known as a bold, unconventional character among his compeers, whose policy is never to oppose directly legislation which is unfavourable to them, but always to make it appear that the opposition comes entirely from the workers and humble folk. In reply to the Chairman's questions, his lordship referred to his own war service and that of his wife, Lady Ashtray, who, as Colonel in the A.T.S., and President of the County Women's Voluntary Service, and by placing many rooms in her mansion at the disposal of the Red Cross Society, had sacrificed a great many of the home comforts to which she had been accustomed. A letter was read from certain villagers which said that the tenants were very devoted to Lord and Lady Ashtray as landlords, and that they refused to leave the cottages in which they dwelt.

In support of the noble lord's application, the Rev. Henry Sarsaparilla, Vicar of Levum in the Mud, who mentioned incidentally that he was a student of Marx, said that although he had found it incumbent upon him on one or two occasions to oppose his lordship's wishes, as in the matter of the closing of farmers' gates during the fox-hunting season, and in the unhappy matter of the little disagreement at the Baby Show held at the time of the Victory Tea, nevertheless he knew his lordship to be a man of strong principles and one who dared to be in the right with two or three. It was his opinion, and he believed that opinion was shared by the Bishop, that his lordship should be allowed to carry on his work unhampered by restrictions from the Ministry of Labour.

After brief discussion among themselves, the members of the Tribunal agreed that, in the interests of a Socialist Britain, Lord Ashtray should receive unconditional exemption, and complimented him upon the able manner in which he had stated his case.

COMMUNIST "UNITED FRONT."

Since its inception, the Communist Party has rejoiced in its contradictions; its repeated changes of policy, accompanied by persistent abuse of those who did not adhere to its policy of the moment; weird and wonderful "united fronts" involving a thousand most emphatic repudiations of previous "fronts" and isolation aggressively asserted at the time.

Because the Duke of Bedford visited Lanarkshire and enquired into the miners' conditions, the Communist Party accused local Trotskyists, I.L.P. Reds, and Anti-Parliamentarians of being Bedfordites, and issued leaflets and chalked the streets declaring that there could be no "united front" between Socialists, Communists, and Aristocrats. The same Communist Party had held repeated meetings with the Duchess of Atholl, who never renounced her Toryism, and saw nothing wrong in Lord Marley, a sometime Labour M.P., with a most orthodox militarist background, who, in due course, reached the House of Lords. We recall a picture published in the Glasgow Daily Herald for October 1, 1937. This showed Sir Iain Colquhoun, Bart., speaking with Mr. Hugh McIntyre, the then Vale of Leven Communist Party representative, at a meeting held in Glasgow. There was an accompanying news-splash, headed, across four columns, in bold type:

BARONET AND COMMUNIST IN "UNITED FRONT" ON HOUSING

Beneath this heading, the letter-press stated in its opening sentences:—

Sir Iain Colquhoun, Bart., noted man of public affairs in Scotland, and Mr. Hugh McIntyre, the Vale of Leven Communist, presented a united front in Glasgow yesterday in a search for a solution to increasingly grave housing problems.

They conducted a conference of local authorities called by Dumbarton County Council, of which Sir Iain is Convener.

The Conference was a striking example of the solidarity of Scotland's civic administrators regarding the need for reforms to meet an acute situation.

The very tone of this record exposes the hypocrisy of the loud-mouthed "revolutionary" phrase-mongering propaganda conducted by the Communist Party over a period of years, during the hunger marching days. Whether exploiting hunger or patriotism, posing as anti-militarist or avowedly beating the militarist big-drum, the Communist Party has but one ambition—to secure political power. It knows no principles and has no ethics. It has no understanding except that of power-interest. It is a party of scoundrels and opportunists.

In Communism (1943 edition), we tell the story of the assassination of the Socialist and working class struggle in Germany. One phase of that struggle, omitted from that pamphlet, is recorded well in a survey of pre-Hitler Germany published early in 1938 in an issue of the London magazine symposium, Fact. The author is Evelyn Lynd, and the title of the study, Underground Struggle in Germany.

Lynd describes the antagonism between the Social Democrats and the "Communists," during the struggle to power of the Nazis, the most ignorant of all the political groupings, and yet the most effectual:—

The intensity of the mutual hatred of Socialists and Communists will hardly be conceivable to anyone who has not himself experienced this period.

To both of them the enemy was not so much the rising Fascist movement, the Junkers or magnates of the Ruhr, as the rival labour organisation, which was to be attacked on every occasion with the utmost ferocity.

In the course of time, more and more Socialist parties and organisations, varying in size and importance, were to join in the general competition for the support of the German workers.

The Hitlerites scored their successes at the General Election of 1930 owing to the proletarian confusion created by these Socialist-Communist factions and fractions during 1928-1930. What a lesson this picture should have for the thinking worker in Britain and America to-day:—

The Social Democrats, tolerated Bruning and his policy of emergency decrees, holding that—bad as Bruning was—he was the "lesser evil" compared with what might come after him. The Communists attacked the Social Democrats violently because of their "theory of the lesser evil" and their popular "toleration policy," arguing that starvation under Bruning was no better than starvation under Hitler.

While this criticism was regarded with much sympathy by a large section of the Socialist and trade union rank and file membership, the Communist policy of calling practically all non-Communists Fascists was vehemently rejected.

In the eyes of the C.P. the Bruning Government was "Fascist," the Social Democrat Party was "Fascist," why should they be afraid of Hitler? As a matter of fact they even regarded a Hitler victory as a vehicle of hastening the revolution.

In a Parliamentary speech, on October 14, 1931, Remmele (then one of the leaders of the German C.P., second only to Thaelmann) said:

> "Herr Bruning has expressed it very clearly: once they (i.e., the Fascists) are in power, then the united front of the proletariat will emerge and it will make a clean sweep of everything . . . We are not afraid of the Fascists. They will shoot their bolt sooner than any other Government."

That was the Communist line of thought right up to 1932. "Let the Nazis come, they will provoke the revolution."

And so the "Communists" did not destroy just the Social Democrats, the Mensheviks. They destroyed the proletarian movement itself. They were the real fifth columnists. What a comment of fact upon their infallible Marxian gift for scientifically analysing the situation!

Having denounced the Social Democrats as Fascists—and we are not defending the Social Democrats who play-acted at reformism because they feared to proceed to revolutionary action when the Kaiser fell—the "Communists" turned to a definite "United Front" with the Nazis.

Lynd explains:—

In their blindness to the real development they not only considered the Fascist dictatorship a better means than democracy of serving their own ends, but they even strengthened the jingoist appeal of the Nazis by launching suddenly a programme of "National and Social Liberation" . . . and by participating actively in a Nazi referendum against the Social Democratic Government of Prussia in August, 1931.

In 1932, the "Communists" called a transport workers' strike in Berlin—in conjunction with the Nazis—in opposition to the Social Democrats and the Trades Unions! Here is Lynd's picture of what happened:—

Street collections were taken for the strike funds, and I shall always remember the sight of a Communist and a Nazi standing arm in arm and shouting in an agreed rhythm, while they were shaking their collection boxes: "For the strike funds of the R.G.O. (Revolutionary Trade Union Opposition)"—"For the strike funds of the N.S.B.O. (Nazi Factory Cell Organisation)." The sight of this perverted united front, observed in various districts of Berlin, was so repulsive to most Socialists that they lost all sympathy for the strike they previously had.

When the "United Front" with the Nazis had served the opportunist purposes of the "Communist Party," the Party made further insincere "United Front" proposals to the Social Democrat. These are exposed in our pamphlet, Communism, already mentioned.

and no one can say you ever hesitated to make a contribution. Whether alone or in the crowd, it is up to all of us to do that. Nor can any of us be allowed to believe we are always and for ever right. But let us hope that, by trial and error, we may reach our goal, each contributing the utmost in our power. I think, to Socialists, this is all that matters. Not many of us find any attraction in the popularly accepted attractions of life.

"Give to me the life of love
And let the rest go by me."

And if I may add Voltaire to Stevenson (even if) "I disagree with all you say, but I'll fight to the death for your right to say it."

So—go on saying it.

JOHN MACLEAN

EX-COUNCILLOR Mrs. Jean Mann's MEMORIES

May Day Meeting, Glasgow, Sunday, May 3, when there was some suggestion of Socialist thought and solidarity inspiring the various factions of the Labour Movement, despite difference of approach. Even parliamentarians believed that Socialism meant Anti-Militarism in 1931.

Picture and Letter Press reproduced from the Glasgow Evening News, Monday, May 4, 1931.

MAY DAY.—Mr John M'Govern, M.P., speaking at the I.L.P. demonstration at Glasgow Green yesterday. Included in the company are Mr James Maxton, M.P., Councillor Mrs Jean Mann and Mr Guy Aldred. — Evening News Photograph.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I was told at a meeting of Old Age Pensioners, on May 2, that you had published a photo of John MacLean's class in Kinning Park School, in which I was a pupil. I have very lucid memories of that class. "John" put on a nice clean collar for that occasion, and was in a good mood that day.

I did not know that anyone else knew I was in John MacLean's class in Brodie's school. The photo comes out remarkably well. I can pick out my classmates, and remember them quite well. I am pleased indeed to see it. I may add that, after I learned of it being published, at the Old Age Pensioners Meeting, a number of copies of the May Word were sent to me from various parts of Scotland. And I have heard various comments of appreciation for the "quiet little girl" who preserved such an excellent photo of John MacLean for so many years.

I am afraid that I was a very troublesome pupil, but when I left his class I heard something he had said about me as a pupil and it certainly made me take more interest. I also got a 1st Prize from him; altho' I "put out my tongue" behind his back (promptly told him by the class), brought out to the floor on several occasions, and was a regular nuisance to him.

I went for his "lunch" each day—2 scones on butter, 2d. One day the assistant gave me 3 scones on butter. I had been told to bring 2 and here I was with 3! I settled the dilemma by eating the 3rd and delivering 2 only. I should have told him, and felt troubled about it after the scone was down. I almost felt he knew I ate his scone! So I went home and told my mum, who gave me a licking and promptly went up to school, and told John MacLean. John thought it was a great joke and had a good laugh at it. Reassured, my "mum" came back and said I'd to forget my crime. Afterwards John said I'd to ask and pay for 3 and eat one every time! I didn't need to be told that twice, and was sorry to leave his class and my daily scone.

Children in the class all knew he was a "Rebel." It used to be whispered around about his "Street Corner" meetings. "Teacher was at X street corner last night." But we, in the 3rd standard were rather young to appreciate what our teacher was doing. We did all feel his purposeful demeanour and very serious attitude to life, young as we were, and the pupils who had left and were serving apprenticeships simply worshipped him.

John MacLean got to know I was hungry in the mornings (having "stolen his scone") and was very annoyed to know that I was delivering "Rolls" to Pollokshields at 6 a.m. every morning—I was 11½ years old. He thought it was wrong and the "basket" was "far too heavy for a girl." Of course, I had only one brother (2 years) so I had to tell the teacher he couldn't take the job. I got 1/6 weekly, and for scrubbing out the back shop I got a bag of stale pastry (refused by Pollokshields). So I got up at 5-30 to get my rolls delivered quickly so I could scrub out the shop and qualify for the stale pastry, which was so greatly appreciated by my mother, especially when my father was on strike—always on strike—for "another fordin (farthing) an' oor." Aye! no wonder we're Rebels, and we'll be Rebels to the end of time.

After reading this you'll understand how I felt when I had to sit through the Corporation debates, and listen to some folk telling "what a grand healthy job it was, delivering rolls, papers, and milk in the morning." You'll also understand how well I knew what an extra half-crown meant in a working-class home; when those who could rattle them about in their pockets like pennies, were voting against us.

Some of the other girls in the photo tried to get out of the struggle by marrying well. We all looked for a fellow who could "keep us in a style to which we'd not been accustomed!" We were successful (more or less) and those who do not bother to understand causes of poverty, just go on and tell their girls to do the same.

Altho' we were too young to understand John MacLean, I, for one, when I got older, wanted to know what caused our teacher to be such a "fanatic" and I read and listened. So the influence continued so far as I was concerned, backed up by the facts of life in a Capitalist system. My mother, large family an' all, always backed my father when he was in doubt. "You're voting for a strike, never mind me." I used to marvel at the courage in her frail body, young as I was.

Yes, we have lost fellowship, great's the pity, but I suppose it's the Rebel in us. But there's no reason why we should deliberately hurt each other, altho' we differ in our methods of approach.

I read your pamphlets, of course. I believe in getting as many angles to a philosophy as I can,

"WHEN TRUTH AND JUSTICE TRIUMPH, WAR SHALL CEASE"

THE COMING PEACE

Speech made in the House of Commons, Wednesday, May 24, 1944, by RHYS J. DAVIES, M.P.

(Chairman, Parliamentary Peace Aims Group; Under-Secretary of State for Home Affairs, Labour Government, 1924.)

[Below we reproduce the main text of our comrade's speech, omitting only some of the passing interruptions.—Ed.]

I want to say about this Debate that I am satisfied that we have collected to-day some of the ingredients that this country will import into the Peace Treaty when it is made at the end of this war. There is, however, one thing apparent already. There is, obviously, a clash of opinion arising between the Left and Right parties in the Commons. Let me give one or two instances. From some of the benches opposite we have had the usual talk of punishing the whole of the Germans and of trying war criminals. One hon. Member made almost the whole point of his speech that it was no use trying to establish a world organisation for peace, and another hon. and gallant Member, if I did not mistake him, wanted to punish the Germans too.

(Interruption and a protest by Wing-Commander James, against Rhys Davies' statement that James wanted to punish the Germans.)

Mr. Davies—I would like to know how the hon. gentleman will decide who are the evil-doers; the evil-doers are not all, by any means, on one side during a war; you cannot possibly calculate how many criminals there are in Germany or in any other country at war. What I fear is, if there is any punishment forced upon Germany as is suggested, that it will rebound on the working classes of this country. Statesmen who govern the several countries at war never, somehow, punish each other. I once stood outside the palace where the ex-Kaiser lived in exile in Holland and said that I would not mind hanging there for ten years. What happened to our own miners at the end of the last war? The German miners were working furiously for a pittance providing coal for nothing for France, Italy and Belgium, and our own miners in my division were unemployed and tens of thousands more miners in South Wales in the same plight. That was a consequence of the spirit of revenge introduced into the Versailles Peace Treaty. I want our people to remember those facts before importing revengeful provisions into the Peace Treaty that is to come. I want them to understand, too, the boomerang effects of anything of that sort on tens of thousands of workpeople in this country. Whole districts were made derelict and shipyards became idle for years because we got coal and ships for nothing from Germany after the last war. Some of the more sensible people in this country are now saying that we should not ask for reparations in kind this time; we should demand that German workers should be transferred to devastated territories and work there to rebuild them. Let me ask the House not to have anything to do with a proposition of this kind. First, what would the working-classes of this country say if thousands of them were unemployed and German workmen were brought to this country to rebuild London, Manchester and Coventry?

Viscount Hinchingbroke (Dorset, South)—Why does the hon. Member assume that thousands of people in this country will be unemployed after the war?

Mr. Davies—Because I do not believe that any Government, in Germany, France, Italy or Great Britain, will be clever enough, at the end of this war, to harness the economic and financial consequences of this war. Let me give the hon. Member a case from my own division. Between the two wars I had 15,000 miners unemployed for years, with 22 pits closed down for good. As soon as the manufacture of munitions is finished, I know of nothing that any Government can do to find work for my people. We can put any Government in power, but war must have its consequences; it destroys trade. Half of our merchant shipping is at the bottom of the oceans already. Where are we going to get ships to carry our exports at the end of the war? I was in this House when the late Mr. Ramsay MacDonald stood at the Box, as Prime Minister, and said that the American Federal Reserve Board would not give us any more loans until the Unemployment Assistance Board reduced benefits by 2s a week. We are in the hands of the American financiers now, a thousand times more than we were on that occasion.

I am very apprehensive of the consequences to our people of this great conflict. Hon. Members must not mistake my patriotism when I talk like this. I feel so deeply for my country that I do not like to see it going down to poverty; I do not like to see it descending to bankruptcy. I feel there is a genius among our people that could bring mankind out of this terrible conflict if it were properly employed. I know a little about Central Europe—mentioned in this Debate. I can never understand where we got the conceit that 46,000,000 Britishers can effectively police the whole of the peoples of that vast area. There are 30,000,000 Poles, 20,000,000 Rumanians; then there are Bessarabians, Transylvanians and many other races. I have been over some of these countries, and the House may be interested to know what I have told some of their leaders. Until the people of Central Europe learn how to tolerate each other's religion, language and customs as we do in these islands not all the power of Great Britain, the United States and Russia combined can bring them peace. Peace must always come from within and not from without.

Some little time ago I secured 70 Members of this House to sign a Motion calling the attention of His Majesty's Government to some serious departures on their part from the provisions of the Atlantic Charter. What are those departures? First of all, the Prime Minister told the world that India did not fall within the provisions of the Charter, that Burma and that no other British Colonial territory either is within the Charter. More than that, he said that as a matter of right, neither Germany, Italy nor Japan, nor any of their satellites, can come within the terms of that Charter. What does that mean? I can remember him standing at that Box and saying, "Let the Italians stew in their own juice." When we consider the exclusion of so many nations of the world from the Atlantic Charter the Prime Minister has said in effect that 50 per cent. of the human race should stew in their own juice; that these international provisions do not apply to them. I know, too, a little of Yugoslavia where the Serbs, Croats, Slovenes and the Macedonians are always quarrelling. I am doubtful if even Marshal Tito, the Communist, can ever bring them to live together unless they adopt the mederated principle of government. The same principle applies to Czechoslovakia as well.

Our Government seem to base all their actions on expediency. They have no definite set of principles to guide them in their diplomacy. I wonder whether they take note of recent events in the United States of America. I have been there several times and I know a little about the grand old Republican Party. I would ask the House to remember the tendency towards isolationism in the United States. I know that newspapers will say that the defeat of Wendell Wilkie at the primaries did not mean isolationism.

I am very much afraid that American politics are gravitating once again towards repeating what happened to the late President Wilson. Once the Republican Party disposed of Wendell Wilkie it meant a throwback towards isolationism in America.

There is little chance of a successful world organisation for peace unless the United States is in it. One hon. gentleman delivered a very pessimistic speech on that score; he said that because of language, religious and racial difficulties we could never hope for a world organisation at all. If he has been to Chicago, New York or Philadelphia he has seen there every colour and almost every race under the sun living together in one city. Let me give another example of collaboration. People say that you cannot get these several nationalities to live and work together. What about Switzerland? The French, Germans and Italians are living together in Switzerland. If we come nearer home, we have the Welsh, English and Scottish people living together too.

Mr. Kirkwood (Dumbarton Burghs)—It is not very easy for a Scotsman.

Mr. Davies—I know it is not easy, and it may comfort my hon. Friend when I say that "Haw-Haw" is neither a Scotsman nor a Welshman. The Foreign Office ought to have regard to these tendencies, especially in the United States of America. Let me interpose for a moment about the suggestion that Russia should annex part of the Polish Ukraine.

One suggestion was made in debate that annoyed me about East Prussia. That is sowing the seed of the third great war in Europe. Can anybody imagine that the Prussians would live happily under the Poles?

Mr. Kirkwood—No, but we are going to teach them.

Mr. Davies—Why on earth should it be suggested that people should leave their homes and be dealt with like chattels by the great Powers? I want to protest against the assumption of the great Powers that they are entitled to throw batches of the human race from one Government to another without consulting the peoples. I do not think I am saying anything too strong when I add that the present proposal—because I am not so sure that Poland has asked for East Prussia yet—is about the most foul conception in the whole of this business and, at any rate, is against all the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

I wonder if I dare quote Clausewitz in support of what I am trying to say? He said "Wars are just the continuance of policy in other fields." That is exactly what happens; and if the diplomacy of a nation is not straight and honest, then we are bound to have wars. President Wilson, I think, after the last war made a statement about the reasons for war: "The seed of war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry." I wonder, therefore, whether there is any substance in the statement that we went to war for the independence of Poland? Some hon. Members contradict that. Some hon. Gentlemen said that we went to war for other reasons entirely. Well, we led the peoples of these islands to believe that we went to war for the independence of the Poland of 1939, and now I doubt very much whether the British Government will have a word to say as to the kind of Poland that will emerge from this conflict. Stalin, I suppose, will determine that.

The Committee knows my views on war and peace. It is a great tribute to the House of Commons that it is tolerant; and when I have been to Central Europe and talked to some of the people in authority there I have pointed with pride to the House of Commons. If they learned the toleration that we exercise toward each other, the sort of conflict we have in Europe at present would never have arisen.

My last word is this: The common expression, of course, is that Hitler made this war. What is ten thousand times more important is to find out the causes that made Hitlerism. When the statesmen sit down in Conference, as they will do, to draft the next peace treaty they will not be bothered about Hitler and Mussolini; what they will be concerned with will be tariffs, trade barriers, commerce, shipping, banking, colonies, territories and frontiers. That is what they will be discussing. They will never say a word about fighting for freedom and religion either—that vocabulary will have passed away.

I am sad beyond measure at the state of affairs in my native country. I do not like to see us going down into poverty and unemployment, and I am afraid that General Smuts was right when he said there would be nothing in the till when this war was over. I hope, however, that the British Government will take a hand to see that the poverty and unemployment which prevailed between the two great wars will not come upon us once again.

SOCIALISM AND WAR COALITIONS.

Herbert Morrison Rebuked for Denouncing The "Splitters."

The following letter, published in "The Manchester Guardian" for Saturday, November 20, 1943, from the pen of our comrade, Rhys Davies, M.P., makes sound reading for the consideration of every member of the Labour movement in Great Britain:—

Sir,—The Home Secretary was true to form when he addressed the Labour Party Regional Conference in Manchester recently; he told the "rebels" what he thought of them. He might be interested to know what some think of his own responsibility in these matters.

First of all, it takes some convincing that the working classes should pay their pennies in order to maintain a political machine that becomes an adjunct of the Tory Party. That a Socialist should enter a coalition with the Conservatives in the majority is just as incongruous as if a temperance reformer sat on the directorate of a brewery company.

He complained of the lack of discipline in the Parliamentary Labour Party, suggesting, of course, that the "rebels" are the only sinners; that his own actions have not contributed to the "disaster" which he foreshadows. He mentioned several instances where the "splitters" voted against party decisions, but he avoided mentioning that on the Beveridge Plan he himself flouted the party.

It is no secret that one of the very first instances of this kind occurred when the party decided by a large majority to vote in favour of the purchase tax. Co-operative M.P.s, members of the Parliamentary Labour Party, who were present at the meeting and took part in the debate, voted against the party decision in the House on the ground, we suppose, that the Co-operative party, to which they are also attached, requested them to do so. According to report Mr. Morrison quoted every instance of "insubordination" except that one. Why? Indeed, it could be argued that the slippery slope of indiscipline (if it might be so termed) started on that occasion. It is possible, of course, that the Co-operative M.P.s were right and the Labour Party wrong, but there is no reason to hide this important fact when attacking other "rebels."

The minority were more right than they thought when they voted against the Man-Power Bill. The Coalition Government took powers to conscript all wealth and all human beings. Real wealth, however, has escaped its attention, but over 18,000 workers have been prosecuted and more than 3000 of them sent to prison for offences that were never punishable before Labour joined the Coalition. The very same Government, however, has not yet sent a single employer to jail.

The incident that must trouble Mr. Morrison most, however, is the revolt against some of the clauses of his recent Workmen's Compensation Bill. Let it be admitted at once that thousands of injured workmen will benefit by the passing of that measure, but the sting entered into the proceedings when he laid it down that the single injured workman will not benefit under the Act until his incapacity has lasted at least 13 weeks. As, however, very few cases last so long it will be understood why some of us feel deeply, especially those representing mining areas, about this discrimination against single persons.

But there is something more to it than that. During the proceedings he threatened as he had entered into an agreement beforehand with the employers, insurance companies, and the T.U.C., to withdraw the Bill if opposition to any of its clauses emerged on the floor of the House. This, of course, raised a first-class constitutional issue; the "splitters" refused, as the famous statesman Burke did, to submit to the dictum that they are just rubber stamps for outside bodies.

Then he reminded his hearers of the fate of the old Liberal Party. He might also have reminded himself of the disaster that befell the German Social Democratic Party because it acted during the Great War very much as Mr. Morrison desires our Laobur Party to conduct itself during this conflict. The German Socialist Party fell because its leaders persuaded the rank and file to assist the Kaiser and his military caste, with the usual result that "Parties join a coalition in ignorance and separate in disgrace." Then, some of us can never forget the MacDonald-Snowden episode in considering these things.

The simple fact emerges that a working-class political party cannot conduct itselfeffectively in a Parliamentary democracy in harness with its avowed political opponents, and the feeling is growing that our Labour Ministers in the Coalition are not equal partners; they undertake such doubtful tasks of government that no Tory or Liberal Minister would dare perform if Labour had retained its independence in Parliament.

We are almost the only democratic belligerent country with a Coalition. Party warfare continues in the United States, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and South Africa, and they are all fighting against the Axis with the United Nations like ourselves.

Finally, it becomes more obvious every day that there is no avoiding splits in the Labour Party until it breaks with the Coalition, and the sooner Mr. Morrison realises that the better. In continuing the Coalition Labour is offending its best friends by placating its worst opponents. While it may not do much good to wash dirty linen in public, the blame for it in this case must rest on Mr. Morrison, who prepared the wash-tub.—Yours, etc.,

R. J. DAVIES.

House of Commons, November 17.

CAN WE OVERDO THE WAR?

By The Duke of Bedford.

If you continue to cook a leg of mutton after it is done, you will roast it to a cinder and have to cook another.

If you overdo a war by continuing it too long, your Government will one day feel that another war is necessary.

There is every indication that the present war will be overdone, with very disastrous consequences, if people do not create a public opinion which compels the Government to see reason. Don't therefore be blind to the danger signals, nor carried away by the common idea that "We must see it through to a finish."

Look ahead and think.

It is desirable now to explore the possibilities of peace on the following basis:—

(1) All nations, Axis and Allied, to agree to abstain from political interference in the affairs of countries desiring their freedom.

(2) The world's economic resources to be distributed according to the needs and numbers of the different peoples and without regard to their form of government; all nations to co-operate in the full development of the world's economic resources under a system which allows of no financial or trade hindrances.

(3) Total world disarmament to be arranged and maintained by a fully representative International Commission of Inspection, assisted by a staff of expert advisers, military or civilian. The representatives of every country to have the right to demand of others any facilities for inspection which their expert advisers inform them are necessary for their protection against possible secret rearmament, provided that they are themselves prepared to grant, on behalf of their own government, similar rights of inspection to the representatives of all other nations who may require such rights.

If an Axis Government refuses the terms, war can be continued until it agrees to them.

If Axis Governments agree but an Allied Government refuses the terms, further help in the war should be discontinued in order to compel reasonableness.

Advantages of the Plan.

(1) All the belligerent countries would have to make real concessions in the interests of a lasting peace, but all in return would receive solid and equal advantages.

In return for safety and justice, economic and political—

The Axis would have to evacuate occupied territory; respect the rights of other nations to political freedom; and abandon plans for military conquest.

Russia would have to do the same.

Britain and America would have to abandon a financial system and an economic selfishness which keep their own peoples in needless poverty and render wholly impossible the full development and fair sharing of the world's economic resources.

(2) The adoption of the plan would prevent further war casualties, including, it may be, a long and bloody war in the Far East after the war in Europe has ended.

(3) It would remove the political and economic causes of possible future wars.

(4) It would get rid of armaments and the temptation to use them.

(5) It would deprive untrustworthy statesmen of propaganda grievances necessary to arouse a war spirit among their peoples, and it would also deprive them of war weapons.

(6) It would prevent further war devastation and advance the date on which post-war reconstruction and adequate relief for war sufferers could begin.

(7) It would free the whole industrial effort of every nation for constructive purposes and the raising of the standard of living and culture throughout the world.

(8) It would provide a wide field for international co-operation in which the hatreds and misunderstandings created by war could be forgotten.

Drawbacks to Continuing the War until the Unconditional Surrender of the Axis has Been Achieved.

(1) Further heavy casualties on the Continent.

(2) A war in Asia, possibly long and certainly costly, after the European war has ended, which will drain the nation of its resources and delay post-war reconstruction.

(3) The virtual certainty of a vindictive peace on the Versailles model, which will arouse a desire for revenge among the defeated nations.

(4) Russia left in possession of a huge military establishment which would place her in a position of complete dominance in Europe and probably also in Asia. If she desired to do so, she would be able to disregard the rights and liberties of smaller nations to any extent she chose.

(5) Great danger of ultimate war with Russia due to political causes, economic rivalry, or to the oppressive treatment of other countries, and possibly need for rearming the Axis as allies.

(6) Alternatively, danger of another war with the Axis if they should again find the peace terms intolerable.

(7) The continuation of conscription.

(8) The diversion of a great part of the nation's economic resources to further war preparation.

(9) Continuation of the process of perfecting the destructive character of the instruments of war, with the result that the next war will be even more deadly in character and more uncertain in results than any previous war.

(10) Continuation of the spiritual, moral and social evils which accompany war or the maintenance of a militarist regime.

(11) Continuation of the tyranny of the international financiers of the City and Wall Street, who exploit ordinary citizens in the interests of moneylenders; maintain poverty in the midst of potential plenty; and encourage war against nations of whose financial methods they disapprove.

(12) Completely useless sacrifice by all who have given their lives in this war, owing to the failure to achieve results of the slightest permanent value.

Some weeks ago one of the big London daily newspapers published a report, later stated by the Editor, in conversation, to come from a reliable source, of an intimation by a highly-placed German official, to the effect that Germans would be prepared to conclude peace on terms which included the evacuation of all the occupied countries and appeared to be thoroughly satisfactory. Recently Mr. R. R. Stokes, M.P., asked a question about this report in the House of Commons, receiving from Mr. Anthony Eden the usual inadequate and unintelligent reply that the Government deemed it a ruse to undermine the unity of the Allies.

The Daily Sketch of July 3rd contained the following:—"Political Director of the German Radio, Frische, has challenged us. 'It is up to England to stop her bombing,' he says. 'If she ceases her terror attacks, then Germany will not be forced to use her V.1 weapon.'"

From these two items of news it is apparent that, but for the obstinate belligerency of our own Government, there is a good chance that we might have been spared all the slaughter of the Invasion and all the suffering caused by the flying bomb and that without any injury to our Allies or any failure to restore liberty to the nations under German occupation, who have already made it plain that they do not desire to be "liberated" by the war-method our statesmen insist on inflicting upon them. It is also apparent that, but for the same obstacle of senseless belligerency further casualties and mental and physical agony might even now be prevented.

And what will be achieved if the full measure of sacrifice is demanded in carrying on the war to the bitter end? Merely a further quite unnecessary devastation of Europe and, at the end, a state of affairs as likely to produce a third war and as unlikely to secure lasting peace as can well be imagined. Poland, the original cause of the conflict, will be compelled to cede to Russia far more territory than Germany ever demanded and will be "compensated," contrary to the original provisions of the Atlantic Charter, with territory inhabited by a German population—a super-Versailles blunder indeed!

The Soviet Government, mightily armed, will be given a position of dominance in two continents which will expose them to the temptations of that absolute power, which, it has been said, "corrupts absolutely." Wherever possible, Wall Street and City financiers will, with their gold and international currency, re-establish an artificial poverty in the interests of moneylending and currency-buying.

How can this utter waste and useless sacrifice be prevented? Only by the people of this country coming to their senses and, in sufficient numbers, shouting and keeping on shouting until the Government is compelled to heed them. As I have said many times already, only the people can save themselves, their dear ones, and what is still left of civilisation that is worth having. No one else can do it. It is useless for them to look for salvation to the tiny handful of sane men in Parliament, as though these could, by argument, influence to any appreciable degree the huge majority who insist on a fight to a finish. The tiny handful have done their best, but without effect. Where persuasion has failed it is the people and the people alone who have the right and the power to compel by pressure of numbers.

A stage in the conflict bas now been reached when, by a grim paradox, it is becoming daily more obvious that men are dying to produce the conditions which will make a third war certain and not those which, by any stretch of imagination, can be regarded as favourable to lasting peace. That is the tragedy---and the challenge.

WORLD MONETARY PLAN

By G. H. STOCK

The debate in the House of Commons on May 10th, 1944, on the World Monetary Plan brings to light, first, that the majority of the members are definitely against a return to any form of Gold Standard as an International currency. Secondly, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not prepared to say that the Plan is a return to the Gold Standard. His words being: "I believe there is no foundation for the view that this scheme in any way involves a return to the Gold Standard." But later, he defines what is meant by his definition of the Gold Standard. "The scheme provides for regulating the parity of national currencies in the last resort with Gold, but it is not a question of clamping the national currency to Gold." The members meant all forms of Gold Standard whether (a) the self-regulating Gold Standard; (b) the managed Gold Standard; (c) the suggested adjustable Gold Standard under the Plan, with the variable "adjustable link." Whereas the Chancellor definitely says the Plan means (c), he again says (Hansard, page 2045), if dollars are on gold, quite obviously there must be a parity between sterling and gold.

The members mean one thing and the Chancellor definitely means another. Therefore the Plan is a definite tie-up to Gold, camouflage it as the Chancellor will, with "adjustable links," escape ladders, variability and the like.

It is clear that much confused thinking, intentionally or un-intentionally, arises from the debate. There can be no compromise with the Gold Standard in any form, because any currency linked directly or indirectly with Gold is a Gold Standard. There is no limit to production but flexibility to Gold is limited, and production is subjected to Money. If, as is a fact, dollars are linked to Gold and Sterling linked to Dollars, then Sterling is based on Gold, and therefore we have the old question of a limited volume of money limited to the volume of a Gold basis.

This plan is definitely a return to the Gold Standard, and all the expedients to disguise this fact, such as variability of rates, adjustable link, do not alter the fundamental fact. Nations will be forced to take loans in Gold at interest.

It is essential to get clear that International Trade is barter, and only a barter system of goods for goods can prevent an economic collapse. The scheme provides for the export of goods for International Money, based on gold. In other words, goods for money and not goods for goods.

Reading the Chancellor's speech, one is forced to liken him to a wily angler, fishing for salmon, with an invisible line with a Gold Standard hook, well camouflaged with a variable adjustable link-fly. His whole argument is to persuade the House of Commons that the bait is the fly and a full and fat one, but when you take the bait you discover that you are hooked for good and all to an International Gold Standard.

Why all the concern about American hoard of gold? If this scheme goes through, then the greatest sufferer will be America herself, because she will destroy her own export market, as a return to the Gold Standard would react on the U.S.A. in so far as she desires her own and world prosperity. The effect would be fifteen or twenty million men unemployed in America with six or seven million men unemployed here. If we refuse to shackle ourselves to American Gold and remain on a goods for goods standard, we shall in fact be saving America committing economic suicide, by pursuing her present policy. America has built up vast productive machine capacity, and if she forces exports on other countries she must, no matter what she may desire, take goods in exchange or give the goods away, or lend money abroad and accept promises to pay, which in the end must be redeemed by America taking imports in exchange unless she proposes to buy up the nations of the world, which means war.

If she fails to do this, then her vast volume of production will be thrown back on to the American market, and under the present financial system, which provides no means of distributing purchasing power to its own nationals, would therefore cause a vast slump which would create world economic chaos with all those nations in any way linked to the International Fund.

Again, it is not the American citizens whom the House of Commons are considering in their concern about American Gold, but the few international financiers, who through their greed and avariciousness have accumulated as their private property 85 per cent. of the Gold in America, and who seek world-power through International Money. All this concern, is to save these "gentlemen" from their short-sighted and foolish action, at the expense of the hundred and thirty million American citizens, and the forty-five millions of British people, and the millions of the smaller nations throughout the world, with the ultimate result of another World War, brought about by the economic stresses throughout the world.

Having cornered Gold, set the nations at war, so piling up world debt, they force the nations on to a Gold Standard in some form—thus smash down prices, so that they can scoop the assets of the lowest level, and vastly increase the debt value, which they control, and so enslave the world.

Shortly, it is best that the House of Commons faces up to the fact, that this small group must not be preserved with their hoard of Gold at the expense of the nations of the world.

The danger arising from the debate is that the resolution "provides a suitable foundation for further International consultation with a view to improved monetary co-operation after the War." The Government may now say that the house, by accepting this resolution, has definitely committed themselves to an International monetary system, which the Chancellor alleges is not a return to the Gold Standard (Hansard, 2040), and will claim that the House should not go back on the resolution, which means a goods for money system in International trade, indirectly or directly, linked to Gold, rather than a goods for goods system which has no relation to Gold whatever. The producers want a goods for goods standard, the moneylenders want a goods for money standard.

It is as well that this should be realised before this country is committed to any scheme however camouflaged, which controls through a limited International money, externally controlled, production, trade and employment of this country.

The experts have produced a mumbo-jumbo document that even the mover, Lieut.-Colonel Elliot, M.P., admitted he could not understand, "since these things are so extremely bedevilled with technicalities as to be scarcely intelligible to the ordinary man." This was certainly done for the purpose of getting Members talking about "International Money" and lost in a morass of technicalities which have no fundamental meaning and not related to International trade which is fundamentally barter.

A lily is as fair by any other name. A Gold Standard camouflaged by flexibility and an adjustable link remains a Gold Standard just the same.

It is clear that Great Britain should face up to the fact that we should adopt a policy of International trade based on a goods for goods exchange system, for the mutual benefit and world-wide expansion of trade. This technique can easily be provided, as in the "Volens" system, whereby goods exported are paid for by goods imported, the exporter being paid in National Money, and all members having representatives at the Clearing House, would exchange "Volens" at the agreed rate of exchange multi-lateral with other nations. A credit in "Volens" would have to be accepted in imports within six months or lapse. Thus "Volens" cannot be hoarded, saved or invested, but must be spent in the import of goods. No nation can be forced into unpayable debt by an aggressive over-exporting nation.

War creates an enormous demand for goods, munitions, etc., because war is an unlimited consumer. Therefore, in peace we must create a technique whereby an unlimited demand for goods arises for peace purposes. "Volens" reverse the system of exports in that all nations desire imports and the conditions of spending a credit in imports within six months, forces a nation to import goods, and thus instead of cut throat, mad scramble for export markets, all nations would import at the agreed rate of exchange. Primary producing countries destroyed surpluses of food and raw material and feared a falling price level for their exports.

This means simply a goods for goods International exchange between one country and another for the mutual benefit of all countries and the prosperity and peace of the world.

Co-operation, whether between persons or nations, is fundamentally the same. You associate with your neighbour, invite him into your house as a guest, trade with him, and mutually respect one another. But, when your neighbour gate-crashes on you, forces you to buy goods you do not want and refuses to take your goods in exchange, forces loans at interest on you, gets you into unpayable debt and forces his way into your house, orders you about, eats at your table and sleeps in your bed, then co-operation is coercion and you arise in wrath and kick him out.

It must have been amusing to see the terror-stricken face of the mover in the Treasury room during the artificial "economic blizzard" of 1931 (Hansard, page 1944). "We were down to our last few hundreds of thousands" of pounds when I heard the clock strike on the Saturday for "the closure of business," yet, here we are spending £15,000,000 a day on war. So, the great British Empire ran short of "money" because of the absurd Gold Standard! we could not print and issue our own National Credit Notes although we had all the factories, raw materials, labour and technical ability to produce Abundance. Money is not wealth, but a ticket which should be pulped when it has completed its function of exchanging goods, and re-issued as new money, Debt free by the State as required. As it is we add up the tickets as a Debt on which we pay perpetual interest although the real wealth has been destroyed in war.

We do not know who are the "anonymous" controllers of the proposed "Fund," or the voting power of the members or the "Experts" who produced this mumbo-jumbo "jargon" which its sponsor does not understand. These "experts" seem to be experts in camouflage but not in common sense. "Obscurity has its compensations."

INVASION MUSINGS

By Councillor Charles A. Earl

[The following essay was written on the eve of the Second Front. The author's logic applies most forcibly to the developed situation, and the workers have to weigh the two policies: "unconditional surrender" or peace by negotiation.—Ed.]

On several occasions in 1921 and 1922 I visited France, Holland, Belgium, and Germany. I was privileged, with a French friend, to have a special trip in a Farman Goliath aeroplane from Paris to Brussels, over the battlefields of France and Belgium. It was a perfect summer day and we flew at a height that would be known as "hedge-hopping" to-day, in order that I might closely observe the country over which we were flying. The things that I saw, even 2½ years after the Armistice, have burned themselves into my brain, so that I shall never forget them. The long-winding trenches, the shell holes, many filled with water and covered with slime, the wrecked buildings of towns not yet nearly recovered from their terrible experiences. But most of all the realisation that although there seemed to be hardly a yard of ground that was not pitted with shell holes, men had fought and died in that countryside, for what? "A land fit for heroes," "for Christian freedom and democracy," "a war to end war." What a hope!!!

It does not take much imagination to picture the hell that these men endured, and they endured in the hope that their children should never have to suffer in the same way, and their rulers pledged themselves that it never should happen again.

In Germany I was treated with great hospitality. I visited German homes and folk were very kind to me. But it was in this country that I received my greatest shock, and I feel a sense of shame whenever I think of the incident, and that is quite often, especially these days. I was walking in Hamburg when I came upon some small children. I was horrified to see that they were literally living skeletons. I have seen some pitifully under-nourished youngsters in London and elsewhere, but nothing like those kiddies in Hamburg, and afterwards in other German cities. Innocent children starved by blockade, which was continued months after the Armistice was signed, children who could not possibly bear any responsibility for the crime which had been committed against them, yet they paid, as children always do pay, for the sins of their fathers, and as our own children are now paying for our sins.

Many of these children grew up, and, thanks to that wonderful organisation, "Youth Hostels," arrangements were made whereby the youth from various countries on the Continent were able to visit this country and our youth visited them. It was all very friendly, and I believe that those who visited Germany have very happy recollections of that country and its people, and of course such places as Baden and Wiesbaden were always popular with our privileged class.

In September 1939 all this was changed, and overnight the German and Italian people had changed from decent, friendly folk into the world's greatest blackguards. Why? Young men and women don't suddenly become villains. What happened? Governments decided to go to war with each other. (There is no need for my purpose to attempt to give reasons, it is sufficient that war was declared.) The minute that happened—and indeed before it happened—the propaganda machines on both sides began to work at full blast. Socialists and Trade Unionists forgot that they were ever internationally-minded. Forgot that they ever called themselves the "Peace Party." For instance, the "Daily Herald" on 31st March, 1939, speaking for the Labour Party, says:

Talk of conscription need not be taken seriously. The Labour and Trade Union movement is not prepared to consider it.

Everyone knows now that Comrades Bevin and Morrison betrayed their comrades by introducing for the Tory coalition the vital Conscription Acts.

Youth and adult were all subjected to tremendous hate propaganda. To hate even unto death people whom they had never seen and who had never harmed them. Churches became military-minded and aggressive. The Sermon on the Mount and the second great commandment were positively seditious. All ideas of the Fatherhood of God, and the Brotherhood of Man, must be set aside until after the war. There are more important things, such as blessing battleships, bomber aeroplanes and banners, and collecting money to buy bombs, guns and other useful weapons, to destroy God's German and Italian children. The children from day and Sunday schools were asked to subscribe their pennies to buy these big, beautiful and better bombs, the 8000-pounders that blow little German and Italian children to smithereens. Can these be the little children of whom Jesus said "of such is the Kingdom of Heaven"?

Not only do we render great service to our country by lending our money, but we do ourselves a bit of good as well, because we get good interest on the money that buys these lovely bombs that destroy those dreadful children.

And now we have a second front, the British and Allied invasion of Europe. The people who shouted the loudest for it are those who are too old to go or those in reserved occupations. I have not heard of a single instance where the young soldier himself was so anxious to take on this suicidal job.

We are told by Government spokesmen, such as Comrade Morrison, that we must face serious and grievous losses. We all remember the dreadful ordeal and casualties of Dunkirk and Dieppe, but it is certain that these affairs will look like picnics compared with the sustained suffering the invasion will entail. The casualties will be numbered in hundreds of thousands. Imagine the intense anxiety and misery when our youth attack the youth of Germany and Italy, when English and German husbands, fathers, brothers, and sons are doing their utmost to kill each other and to make wives into widows and children fatherless.

Death is not the most tragic aspect of war. Come with me to Roehampton or Richmond, see men in blue hospital dress, lying, always lying on their backs, unable to walk or sit up. They have been like this for 30 years. They were fine strong youths in 1914, but the Great War left them shattered and useless, and a grateful country compels them to rely on charity (Poppy Day) for a considerable part of their subsistence. The State compelled them to give their all, and then disclaimed full responsibility.

It is only the officers who get reasonable pensions.

The second front casualties, when fully recorded, will make even those dreadful battles of the Somme and Vimy Ridge in the last war seem child's play. The tragedy of it is, the fighting men always think it will be the other fellow and not themselves who is killed or injured.

Can I appeal to fathers, mothers, wives, sisters and sweethearts to use every endeavour, to stop this insane and unchristian war, before they too are wounded and bereaved for life by the loss of their dear ones? I appeal to them to realise that all this talk of patriotism, fighting for freedom and other fine sentiments, are always a necessary accompaniment of every war. Both sides use the same phrases, and on both sides the only people who gain from war are the financiers, arms manufacturers, and profiteers generally. The common people are always losers.

I beg of you, not to be deceived by the fervid orations of Royalty Statesmen, or Church leaders. The very same people said the very same things in 1914-1918. When they talk, just you remember Roehampton, Richmond and St. Dunstans, and say "No."

Remember that, on the 7th December, 1939, the National Council of Labour issued a statement condemning Russia's attack on Finland. It said:—

On the fantastic pretext that Finland threatened the security of the U.S.S.R., the armed forces of the Soviet Government have invaded the territory of a peaceable democratic neighbour. They have set up a puppet Government which challenges the rightful authority of the legally constituted Government of Finland. Soviet air forces are bombing open towns and destroying the lives of innocent people by indiscriminate slaughter. The British Labour Movement regards with deep detestation the action of the Soviet Government, because it has in the past porfessed to be the leader of the world's working-class movement, guardian of the rights of peoples against their oppressors, interpreter of Socialist principles, and the custodian of International peace. British Labour, in the light of recent events, repudiates utterly these claims of the Government of the U.S.S.R. British Labour pays heartfelt tribute to the steadfast courage and resolution the Finnish nation has shown in resistance to the aggressor. It renders homage to the Finnish people who are giving their lives to their homeland. It recalls with gratitude the splendid achievements of the Finnish nation in social legislation and in the building up of a Trade Union, co-operative and political organisation of the working-class on the foundations of true democracy. Therefore on the eve of the meeting of the League Council, it calls upon the free nations of the world to give every practicable aid to the Finnish nation in its struggle to preserve its own institutions of civilisaton and Democracy.

What does the Labour and Trade Union movement say about Finland to-day? Finland is fighting the same war and the same enemy. In less than two years after this declaration we were at war with Finland, calling the Finns the scoundrels and Russians the heroes. What a farce!

In the early days of the war the Allies assisted Japan in their war against China by supplying munitions and closing the Burma Road. But in 1941 they were uncivilised savages.

Let us consider the sincerity of all this protest: see how expediency and self-interest are the only things that matter to statesmen and rulers; and how impossible it is to trust any of the warmongering national executives.

America, the British Empire, and China are at war with Japan, but Russia is not. Why?

Russia and the British Empire are at war with Finland, but America is not. Why?

The answer is plain. Expediencey and self-interest.

Do you intend to allow our youth to be offered up on those altars? Must they go through the hell their fathers went through in 1914-1918?

On the 8th November, 1939, Mr. Attlee, speaking on Peace Aims, said:—

We wish the German people to know that they can NOW secure, if they will, an honourable peace.

If peace could be offered or suggested in 1939, why cannot it be offered or considered in 1944? Is it wrong to prevent further bloodshed and destruction? Must patriotism be wanton and shall Labour support it?

Comrades, get your shoulders to the wheel. Let us see to it that the power of those who can see no future but war for mankind is challenged. Let us see if peace is not possible—peace and the end of war and Fascism.

UNITED STATES PRISONS A SYMPOSIUM

By JULIUS EICHEL

[Julius Eichel is editor and publisher of the "United States' Absolutist," official organ of the Absolutist War Resisters' Association. It is published at 769, St. Marks' Avenue, Brooklyn 13, New York, N.Y., U.S.A. This paper is devoted to the interests of those inspired by conscientious scruples against any form of war service.—Ed.]

"The Health of the nation is periled if one man be oppressed."

Some of our sentimental pacifists have gone into prisons with the idea of reforming them. What they seem to forget is that even if a small part of the system improves with their patching, the remainder will still remain vile and wicked. We have gained enough experience to know it is the government we are up against and not the prisons. We live in an age of immense government hypocrisy and the worst aspects of nationalism are operating to enslave us. And to add insult to injury we find our representatives passing conspiracy laws forbidding groups of citizens to challenge their wicked legislation that keeps well intentioned people divided while our wicked rulers can unite in thinking up schemes to oppress and enslave us. Our problem then is not the reforming of prisons, but the problem of making them unnecessary. However, whichever way we look at it, we have seen enough of the inside of prisons to know they are wicked places under the best conditions, and that no apologies for this evil should be permitted to fool us.

American Absolutists are not engaged in a prison reform movement; nor are we wasting our energies against race discrimination or anti-Semitism to the exclusion of the more important problem of working against all forms of oppression and attempt to get at the root of all these evils. Unemployment, race hatred, and war are the flowers of an evil system which has as its roots imperialism and exploitation. Conscientious objectors to conscription, regimentation, and war, whether they are conscious of it or not, are in opposition to such evils. Americans have always been rights conscious as opposed to class conscious, for if we enjoyed equal rights, exploitation and diserimination would disappear. Our objections, therefore, are based not only on the humanitarian and religious objections to mutual murder, but are based also on a flatfooted insistence on the continuance of civil liberties, and the extension of equal rights to all indiviluals regardless of race, creed or colour.

Our prisons are simply the boils that are symptomatic of the poisoning of our political blood stream. Just as the Bastille was the symbol of Bourbon oppression, so in our day prisons stand as the symbol of our own bureaucratic oppression. Prisons are the end product of our evil system, and in them we see the functioning of our bureaucracy in all its evil phases. The lying, the sadism, and the misrepresentation that goes on here is indicative of what goes on in other branches of the present administration. So in our emphasis on prisons, we are really showing up the evils of the entire system.

Recently Major General Lewis B. Hershey, Director, Selective Service System issued a report in which he stressed the liberal treatment of COs. But that statement is refuted by the fact that under the present administration about 2000 or more conscientious objectors have already been sent to prison, and more men are in prison now for conscience sake than ever before in our history. Also, while the ordinary prisoner can apply for a parole after serving one-third of his sentence, the CO is deprived of that privilege, and after his release is hounded by the Cat and Mouse Act which returns him to prison after his release on the same charge. Army officers often reveal their feelings about the problem of COs. by saying they would dispose of it by either freeing the objectors or shooting them. Considering the pressure and abuse present day COs. are being subjected to, shooting almost sounds humane. Our administration is worse than it is supposed to be, for it is continually paying lip-service to the ideals it denies in practice. Our prisons are worse than they are supposed to be, for those who administer them are continually denying the evils that are practiced in them. Our Congress passed the evil conscription law, and washes its hands of all the abuses under it. Our Congress, judging by its indifference to all the evils pointed out to it, is the most irresponsible body of law makers America ever endured.

One correspondent who served terms in three different Federal prisons for his pacifist convictions wrote:—

"Criminals are not born or made; they are chosen. The State creates the monstrocity called the criminal . . ."

From Springfield, Mo. Medical Centre for Federal Prisoners comes word that Stanley is being beaten again and that perhaps Lou Taylor, too, is being mistreated. The censorship that cuts the public off from all the prison evils must be protested.

In this connection I had occasion to write to about eight officials and Senators regarding the same complaints my brother Albert Eichel was making in the same prison against the same abuses. And if proof were lacking of the irresponsible nature of the present administration, the replies I received would overcome that weakness. Actually out of the eight officials only one replied. The reply was from Senator James M. Mead, dated September 27, 1943, and was as follows:—

"I appreciate your letter of September 24th, but I regret the matter you mention is entirely outside my jurisdiction."

And that was all.

On October 5, I wrote to the Senator in part, and sent on copies to the other seven:—

"Recently at Danbury Correctional Institution Stanley Murphy and Lewis Taylor were on an eighty-two day hunger strike as a protest against their imprisonment for their convictions against conscription, regimentation, and war. When this mess is over, and human beings will again come back to sanity they will marvel at the vindictiveness with which the government treated these two heroic young men. The same vindictiveness is being shown in the case of the men at Lewisburg who cannot co-operate in aiding in their own punishment. . . . These men need attention, and you should do what you can to help these unfortunates."

PRISON ROUTINE AND REGIMENTATION

Within the last few months COs. have not only been compelled to contend against the evils inherent in the present administration and the prison system, but also against the so-called friends of the pacifists.

In an interview with a CO. in 1942, James V. Bennett, Director of the Federal Prisons said:—

"The American penal system is the most authoritarian system in any democracy. If you buck up against it, you will feel the whole weight of the system upon you."

At the request of a friend who believed Bennett was ignorant of the vile nature of his prison system, I wrote in part on August 13, 1943:—

"It grieves me to learn at this date the Federal Bureau of Prisons still asks for facts about abuses . . . The greatest atrocities against the mind and convictions of the individual are being perpetrated in America when conscientious objection, instead of remaining as the right of every individual on the same basis as freedom of worship, becomes the football of our Congress, courts, and militarists who set up an inquisition to test the convictions of conscientious objectors and condemn them to long prison terms. You are committing an atrocity against the spirit of America when you are willing to administer a prison system that tortures them in prison, or even permits them to remain in prison."

On August 17, 1943, I received a reply from Mr. Bennett refusing to respond to my charges for this reason:—

"I decline because I agree with the vast majority of sincere 'C.O s' in our institutions who believe that you are doing the cause they represent untold harm and vast disservice."

And there you have it from the Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons that men are in prison for conscience sake, and that they are sincere.

Another and more potent friend of the COs., and one whose activity has been repudiated by almost every organization and men of note in the pacifist movement, is Rev. Charles W. Palmer. Rev. Palmer, with the permission of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, visited pacifist prisoners and issued reports and indicated in many ways that he could distinguish between the good pacifists that co-operated with the war machine by behaving in prison, and those pacifists who would not co-operate and were proving embarrassing to an administration which was busy pretending it was defending the very freedom it was denying to its own citizens.

On August 20, 1943, I thought I would write to Rev. Palmer and point out the fact that pacifists are in prison because they are opposed to war, and not because they were out to please an administration engaged in war. Among other things, I wrote:—

"We should remember that America belongs as much to the pacifist as it does to the militarist. If we do not restrain people from preparing, and agitating for, and fighting in war, we should be decent enough to let those at liberty that want nothing with war. Otherwise, in defending the militarist's power to imprison men, you are helping to maintain the institution of war which pacifists would love to destroy. I have had occasion to hear of some of your reports on prison conditions that are at variance with the facts; or at any rate they show lack of imagination. In connection with the men at Lewisburg, I have heard of your report that they are well treated. I would say that the men are not well treated when they are herded together in one dormitory where they are confined for months at a time and see very little of the outdoors and have no facilities for diversion. The confinement may continue for years unless we who are free can get them out. Prisons are mighty evil places, but worse than prisons, for the inmates, are your insane asylums. When you get a combination of the two as you do in Springfield, Missouri, you get an institution which can be absolutely terrorizing. To contend with the individuals that refuse to accept such institutions, instead of attacking the government that supports them, is a mortal sin as far as I am concerned. Yet, after your visit to Murphy and Taylor at that institution, you could not see the humiliation, and the degradation, and the terror of confining harmless men to so evil a place. Instead, you made Mrs. Murphy feel she was committing a crime in opposing such arrangements."

On August 27, 1943, Rev. Palmer forwarded the following reply:—

"I have seen over 150 C.O.'s, and spent an average of 30 minutes with each of them without anyone else present. I have been convinced by my observation, by the assurances of Bureau staff, and by what the C.O.s have told me that a very large majority are making great contributions to the improvement of prison conditions by their positive constructive efforts. . . .

"I am too deeply concerned in carrying out the mandates of my Heavenly Father to spend time in correspondence with a man who thus doubts my integrity and my sincerity of purpose."

Dr. Evan W. Thomas, Chairman of the War Registers League, very much wrought up by the circulation of Mr. Palmer's prison reports, on September 22, 1943, issued "A Statement Regarding Mr. Palmer's Reports on Stanley Murphy."

"On two occasions the mimeographed sheet called "Information," sent from the American Friends Service Committee C.P.S., has seen fit to print without comment statements by Charles Palmer relating to the Bureau of Prisons and Stanley Murphy. Mr. Palmer is much impressed with the Bureau of Prisons. . . .

"Mr. Palmer carefully refrains from condemning the action of the prison authorities in the hospital at Springfield in placing Murphy and Taylor in the insane section of the hospital before placing Murphy in a strip cell. He tells us nothing as to how frequently the threat of being treated as insane is used as a punitive measure in the hospital. He seems to have no awareness of the fact that being treated as a vicious animal and placed in a cell without clothing is far more demeaning and psychologically diabolical than physical violence. Instead he informs us that Murphy could have written an uncensored letter to the authorities in Washington telling them of his treatment.

"This is manifestly absurd. How does a man confined without clothing in a strip cell communicate with anyone? If Mr. Palmer believes that authorities who could inflict this kind of punishment would permit an uncensored communication to be forwarded to Washington, he is indeed innocent; yet his innocence takes on strange wiles and subtlety when it comes to discrediting Murphy. I have had prison wardens admit to me that beatings and other things occur in prison which never come to the attention of the warden. Some wardens will deliberately wink at it. Anyone acquainted with prisons knows this to be true. Mr. Bennett knows it In the case of Murphy the warden was responsible for everything except the alleged beating. . . .

"Mr. Palmer evidently believes that obedience to a prison law and moral integrity are one and the same thing. He insists that Stanley and his mother gave the prison authorities cause to question Stanley's motives by smuggling out a letter which was against the rules. He says nothing about the fact that Murphy from the beginning frankly told the prison authorities that he would not co-operate with their rules and never signed consent to have his mail censored at Springfield with the result that he was denied letter-writing privileges. Stanley acted honestly in accordance with his own premises."

MURDER WILL OUT

After months of continued agitation against atrocities in our Federal Prisons and the constant airing of the most serious charges ranging from battery and assault to murder of prisoners which The Absolutist continually insisted demands a Congressional investigation, the story of those atrocities finally broke full bloom into an influential part of the press early this year, and which promised to force the long overdue Congressional investigation such charges merit. The Absolutist from the beginning of its existence insisted that imprisoning objectors to war was a sure proof that our prisons were being used as instruments of terror. We had no illusions about that. Terrorism on so wide a scale cannot be kept secret unless our officials and administration, our newspapers and our educators, and ministers conspire to keep it secret. Now the ground has been broken to return to our self-respect and integrity as a nation by exposing, condemning, and obliterating this terror and infamy from America.

Jay Nelson Tuck, World-Telegram staff writer, began his exposures on Wednesday, February 9, 1944. His first article was rather restrained, but the ensuing ones continued the exposures with an ever increasing crescendo that promised to shake the Prison Bureau to its foundations. Other newspapers confined themselves to pointing out that James V. Bennett, Director, Federal Bureau of Prisons, and the Attorney General's office were to do some investigating. Those of us who were aware of a whitewash of a similar scandal a few months ago could not be satisfied by that.

Jay Nelson Tuck continuing his articles in the New York World-Telegram of February 14, 1944, wrote as follows :—

STRONGER PRISON PROBE DEMANDED

Documents in possession of the "World Telegram" to-day charged that inmates of the Federal Medical Centre at Springfield, Mo., were kept from talking to investigators sent there last August by the Federal Bureau of Prisons and that one prisoner was "beaten into insanity" for attempting to tell his story to the investigators.

The documents were smuggled out of prison by Louis Taylor, of New York, now serving a term there and sent by him to Dr. Evan W. Thomas, whose brother, Norman, the Socialist leader, has demanded congressional investigation of the institution.

Both the Thomas brothers have expressed complete lack of confidence in an investigation of the "World Telegram's" charges concerning the institution now being made by James V. Bennett, Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

"Mr. Bennett is an interested party to the administration of the prison," Norman Thomas said to-day. "I don't care what he says or what he does. Any prisoner seeing Bennett sitting there knows what he stands for.

"The full truth can only come out through an impartial outside investigation in which the prisoners themselves have confidence.

"The probe of his own institution last summer was ordered by Mr. Bennett after Stanley Murphy, New York Consientious Objector, confined there charged that he had been brutally beaten and confined naked in a stripped stone cell in which there was no furniture of any kind and which was equipped with a hole in the floor for a toilet."

Under the heading "And No Hush or Whitewash!" the editorial of the same paper had this to say :—

The "World Telegram's" disclosures of alleged shocking brutality to prisoners at the Medical Centre of the Federal Bureau of Prisons in Springfield, Mo., are too well documented with first-hand testimony and sworn affidavits to call for anything short of full, disinterested, unsparing investigation.

Prisoners beaten, kicked or starved to death, their bodies sent home covered with welts and bruises, others crippled by beatings or thrown naked into "strip" (bare stone) cells—and such atrocities charged, not to Jap savages but to government-paid guards in a United States prison hospital! Nor is it the first time that such charges have cast a sinister shadow in this federal institution. There was a similar scandal there last year.

Under the circumstances, the announced investigation to be conducted by James V. Bennett, director of the Bureau of Prisons, and a representative of the Public Health Service can hardly inspire full public confidence. Both these government bureaus are interested parties to the charges.

Neither is confidence deepened by Mr. Bennet's reported stressing of the point that some of the alleged victims were conscientious objectors or crackpot members of strange cults. As if that made a difference.

Whether conscientious objectors, cultists or whatever else, all prisoners held in confinement by the United States government are entitled to decent treatment befitting American civilised standards.

Either the Bureau of Prisons-Public Health Service probe should be strengthened and balanced by the addition of wholly disinterested probers, or, better still, Congress itself should promptly start an investigation by a committee or commission, none of whose members can feel the slightest interest in whitewash.

AIR CRASH

BY LADY DUNN

I stood in my garden watching the "airmen" wheel, turn, dive, and manoeuvre, what marvellous flyers they were! almost like birds!

In fact, on looking closely they WERE birds, a flock of happy jackdaws, rejoicing in the spring sunshine at nesting-time.

Later on, looking into the garden from the kitchen window, the tragedy had happened, one of the little airmen had "crashed."

There he lay "pancaked" (I believe that is the technical expression). I ran to him, but found him dead although with no sign of injury on him.

Sadly I picked him up, thinking how very beautiful he was with his lovely black and dark slate grey feathers, arranged as only God could, or would trouble to arrange them, in perfect order and sequence.

His two little slim black legs, with what seemed imploring little black hands at the ends, were stiffly stretched out as in mute appeal for help; an appeal which found a ready answer in my heart, carefully I took him into the kitchen and over a warm stove tried, quite uselessly, to revive him.

So back I lay him on the cleft of a tree, whilst his mates flew round and wondered.

Hoping against hope, I found him there the next morning, and consigned him to the salmon stream running so swiftly at the end of the garden, on his back with outstretched wings and little claws still uplifted in prayer, he drifted from my view, and I?

I was, for a moment, ashamed of my PITIFUL HEART.

Ashamed, until I remembered a beautiful voice full of pity, which on seeing some palpitating atoms awaiting sacrifice had said:

"Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one shall not fall to the ground without your Father knowing it."

Could the beautiful voice full of pity be wrong? could God really care about a sparrow? or the imploring little hands of a crashed jackdaw?

We must believe He does, and if so, what does He think of our daily announcements such as:

"We shot down 76 enemy planes, 42 of our bombers did not return."

WE may have grown callous, but of these crashed airmen, surely it must be believed that they are more precious than many sparrows.

I am NO LONGER ASHAMED of my PITIFUL HEART!

For with it, I believe very humbly, I SHARE THE FEELINGS OF GOD HIMSELF!

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Tuesday, 18th July, 1944.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.
PEACE TERMS (GERMAN PEOPLE)

Mr. Rhys Davies asked the Prime Minister whether the Allied Powers, in deciding upon the policy of unconditional surrender for the enemy, envisaged the possibility that rather than submit to the consequences of such a policy, the workers in Germany before or after the conclusions of hostilities, might overthrow the present Nazi Government and establish a Communist regime instead, following the example of the Russian proletariat against Tsarism at the end of the war of 1914-18; and are the Allies prepared for such an eventuality.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Churchill): Yes, Sir.

Mr. Davies: If the point was considered by the Allied Governments of the possibility of the emergence of a Communist Government in Germany with the overthrow of the Nazi regime, may we take it that His Majesty's Government will not act towards a Communist Germany as the right hon. Gentleman and his Gavernment did when the Bolshevik regime emerged in Russia at the end of the last war?

The Prime Minister: I should not like to go into this matter, but I am quite sure that German criminals have no right to escape merely by suddenly embracing the Communist faith.

Mr. Austin Hopkinson: Can the Prime Minister tell us the exact difference between a Nazi and a Communist regime?

The Prime Minister: I really could write quite a short brochure on the subject.

Mr. Davies: Would His Majesty's Government and its Allies' Governments welcome the emergence of a Communist regime in Germany?

The Prime Minister: I think it is not at all helpful or useful to put a number of complicated hypothetical questions on these matters. I think we had better get on with our work.

Which means that if and when Revolution comes in Germany, as it will very soon in some form or another, the Socialist and Pacifist Movement will have to unite against Vansittartism in a great "Hands off Revolutionary Europe" campaign? Are our Labour Militarists capable of such an effort?

OUR LETTER-BOX

Dear Sir,—Please allow me to lodge a vigorous and most indignant protest against the suggestion advocated by the Moderator of the Free Church Federal Council, and other Free Church leaders, to "keep our Free Churches open for purposes of private and individual prayer as soon as word of the Invasion is made known." Is it only then that one should be allowed to go into a church to offer a prayer? And should one be disappointed if one should hear Vade Retro Satanas?

The two special invasion prayers set forth by the Archbishop of Canterbury recall to my mind the words of Milton, "With these and the like deceivable doctrines he leavens all his prayer"; and finally I cannot help but again quote John Ruskin on the "Infidelity of England":

"The form which the infidelity of England, especially has taken, is one hitherto unheard of in human history . . . With the shrewdest thinkers in the world, we have not yet succeeded in arriving at any national conviction respecting the uses of life."

Alas! some might ask, and perhaps some dignitaries of the church might ponder, whether John Ruskin did ever depart from this planet. Will the people of England ever wake up to follow the Cross—and not the cross-bones?

Sincerely yours,

West Croydon. STEPHEN ROHAN.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Your fighting organ reaches us monthly.

My being trained as engineer and earning my living in that trade for many years past, has resulted in very difficult circumstances as I have resisted compromising my objection to war. I feel keenly the contemptible attitude of those who greedily volunteered to work in the munition business seemingly without any reflection.

I was on the "H.O. Scheme" at Newhaven Camp in 1917; in the same hut as myself was Wm. C. McDougall, of Glasgow. We belonged to a group of about six who persisted in forming their own opinions without reference to anyone or anything in the way of dictation from without. We read "Freedom," "Satire" and "The Spur" which were regularly vivisected and exhibited to us in all their "futility" by our fellows of the then Labour parties, S.P.G.B. and every other working class shade of thought in the camp. They all disagreed with the Anarchist Group and with each other. We survived. Time, I think, has shown that we were right.

Yours fraternally,

Leicester. H. GREGORY.

Dear Guy,—I am quite glad to see you reporting in the "Word" the fine courageous speeches by Rhys Davies.

It would appear to me that such a stand as Rhys Davies takes must require an especial type of courage each time he has to confront the reactionary muddleheads in Parliament.

Keep that trusty right arm going.

Fraternally,

Paisley. HUGH LAMBERT.

Dear Sir,—I have read a number of your booklets and have enjoyed especially "Dogmas Discarded." I have handed these writings round the work. You can appreciate the discussions they have aroused. The readers include the following four persons: a strict Baptist; an ex-Catholic; a leading speaker for the P.S.A. movement; a Christian Socialist.

My opinions are a good deal like your own, although I feel that there must have been a beginning of things. I agree with you that Jesus, in his day, was a revolutionist.

Now and again I go to quite a plain service (Congregational), where the Minister is a Pacifist and stands his ground in spite of severe criticism. He helped my two sons, who are conscientious objectors. He is also a member of the F.O.R., but does not force religion down one's throat.

I left the Labour Party because its so-called leader betrayed Labour's fundamental principles. My faith in parliamentary action is gone completely.

Yours sincerely,

C. E. MOSS.

Dear Guy,—A lot of my evenings are being devoted to the campaign against A.A.I. You have seen some of the literature sent out by the Committee. I asked the Secretary to write you. I am on the Committee as a delegate from the Anarchist Federation. It is by no means a happy position; and, if you have received no invitation, your position is more happy than my own. The politicians have collared the situation, and have canalised it into a purely legal and constitutional pleading, in which the accused will be reduced to robots and victims, and no real fight will be defined or advanced. So long as the money comes in, lawyers will plead from court to court, and fees will be paid, and counsel and solicitors and their clerks will be saved from the bread-line. Aneurin Bevan is the only M.P. who says the fight is a workers' fight and not a lawyers' discussion.

More Anarchists are to be elected to the Committee. I don't think that that will make any difference. I am positive that Anarchists will not be asked to adorn any of the big meetings. That is reserved for the M.P.'s and the prospective M.P.'s—men with careers to maintain or make. Anarchists may be allowed to sit on the platform and applaud while the M.P.'s take the breath of the audience away by stating how much money they want to collect for legal expenses. It is all very foolish and so opposed to the principles of the real struggle.

The Trotskyites are satisfied so long as they are allowed one speaker each meeting, for a few minutes. It is the first time I have come in contact with them. They are a very inexperienced and immature crowd and mouth revolutionary phrases which few of them understand. I think they are sincere but I do not believe that their enthusiasm will stand up to persecution. I hope I am wrong, because the struggle must go on until social liberty is established.

Yours in the Cause,

London, N.W. M. KAVANAGH.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Please accept my thanks for "It Might Have Happened To You." This paper may well prove to be a valuable document which will become part of ineffaceable history. To you one cannot do less than accord appreciation and recognition of a valuable service to the cause of a better civilization which may ultimately become worthy of the name Christianity.

Yours faithfully,

Eye, Suffolk. RONALD N. CREASY.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Very many thanks for sending me the copy of "It Might Have Happened To You!"

You and Mr. Wynn are indeed to be congratulated on compiling this fully documented Investigation Report, and one day, I hope and believe, your work will be acclaimed as a public service. Even if "vengeance or damages" were sought, it is doubtful whether the balance could ever be fully redressed, judging by the dreadful disclosures; but liberal monetary recompense and an unequivocal certificate of complete vindication are surely, the least that a proud nation can offer the unfortunate victims of this unprecendented injustice.

For my part, I have always held that 18B (1a), although aided and abetted by political factors and some natural apprehension after Dunkirk, was primarily of alien inspiration. It is too much to believe that our national charcater could change overnight to one of injustice and cruelty. Specious misrepresentation alone can have fogged the issues and given the impression of sudden moral astigmatism.

Perhaps later you will be able to crown your splendid work by founding a kind of Companionship of Suffering. Into it all those who, innocent, have passed "through great tribulation" would be admitted. Until that day comes, all those of us who have the best interests of the country at heart must remain saddened by the spectacle which we indeed thought could "never happen here"—significant and sinister phrase! Meanwhile, it has happened here, and we can only wonder to what further depths the enemies of Christianity will seek to debase us.

Yours sincerely,

Sutton, Surrey. CUTHBERT REAVELY (Capt.)

Dear Mr. Aldred,—"It Might Have Happened To You" is particularly interesting to me, since I have been detained under Defence Regulation 18B, and I must sincerely congratulate you for assisting in such an effective way to make known the true position regarding 18B. I appreciate very much your point that you are concerned purely with the justice of the matter, and are not influenced by the fact that the majority of us that, to date, have been detained, are not of your own political views.

Yours very sincerely,

Dear Mr. Aldred,—The Archbishop of York (in his "Times" letter, June 19, 1944) takes up a very un-Christian attitude as regards the Pope's humane suggestion for a negotiated peace, provided of course satisfactory terms could be agreed—with good statesmanship they could be.

If wars rid us of the scum and disturbers of peace, these wars would be a blessing. But unfortunately most of those killed, if they had lived, would have helped to make life more worth while, especially if our money was created properly, spent and awarded wisely into existence; a scheme which has been prepared.

To continue murdering, destroying and slaughtering the cream of manhood is not only insane, it is most un-Christian and disputes can never be settled satisfactorily that way. If ever there is to be peace and security, then the chief cause of strife and war must be removed. This can never be done so long as a small group—who are spared solving the difficult problems of invention and production—are permitted to create nearly all the money, which they do by means of book entries. These were the people Disraeli evidently had in mind when he said: "The world is governed by very different persons to what is imagined." We can never have an honest government until we have an honest money system. There is no hope that the "experts" will give us that, as their schemes are primarily designed to satisfy the money creators, who have been able to "buy" nearly all the gold and many other things. During the last two wars our "debts" to them have been increased by many thousands of million £s.

Our only hope of enjoying the incalculable benefits of a good money system is to be found among the proposals of amateur money reformers, whose only consideration is the benefit of their country and humanity. Since money reform is far more of a logical matter than a financial question, a judicial enquiry should be set up to examine the most promising schemes; the best features from them should be adopted with the least possible delay and be given a trial.

Yours sincerely,

A. VERDON-ROE.

RHYS DAVIES M.P and GUY ALDRED

State Case

"The case for a negotiated peace" was dealt with by Mr. Rhys Davies, M.P., and Mr. Guy Aldred, Editor of "The Word," of Glasgow, at a well-attended meeting at Friends' Hall, Lancaster, on Saturday evening.

Mr. Douglas J. J. Owen, of Manchester, presided. Mr. Arthur Knowles, Lancaster, was also on the platform.

Mr. Owen said that in all wars it was the masses who suffered. The joint committee of peace lovers who had arranged the meeting and many others were of the view that something should be done to stop war for all time, and this one in particular.

Mr. Davies said he had travelled over most of the world and found his own type, therefore he declined the philosophy of the Hitlerites that all the Jews were rascals; likewise he despised the philosophy of the Vansittarts that all the Germans were scoundrels.

"We should say to the Germans: 'Throw over your government and we'll show you what kind of a peace we'll agree to.' The Germans will say: 'We agree if you give up your kind of government,' and I agree with that too. I have travelled enough to know that the military gangsters do not differ very much in different parts of the world.

LAST WAR SUGGESTION

"The Lloyd George memoirs show us that in 1916, in the middle of the last war, the British Government considered seriously having a negotiated peace with the Germans instead of a knock-out blow, and history tells you now that Europe and the British people would have been 1,000 times better off if peace had been negotiated in 1916 instead of waiting for the knock-out blow.

"Don't you make a mistake by thinking that the British Government are not making attempts now to get a negotiated peace with Germany; they wouldn't tell you, and they won't even tell me. If you take a long term view of this issue of war between us and Germany, I am positive we would all be better off if peace were negotiated than if you proceeded to a knock-out blow, and I am not so sure that anybody is going to win this war in the traditional military sense.

"In my view this war will continue for a very long time yet if you are going to continue it on a military plane."

MUTUAL REGARD AND LOVE

Mr. Aldred said he supported negotiated peace from the angle of mutual regard, love, understanding, and respect. Under the cover of fighting Fascism they were introducing more and more Fascism into this country, and Bevin was the central figure of the Nazi-Fascist State. It was a war of imperialism under the cover of an ideology.

Negotiated peace meant let's have a talk together; let's get on our high horses and consider matters. With all the means of communication to-day, did they mean to say that they could not talk to the German people?

All the peoples needed food and shelter and an equal right to the raw materials and fruits of the earth, and they needed a brotherly agreement about it all; let them discuss it.

The power of Hitlerism would decline in Germany because people would say, "We are not going to have war any longer if you are going to stand between us and a possible peace."—"The Morecambe Visitor," Wednesday, June 21, 1944.

DOES FREEDOM OF SPEECH EXIST IN BRITAIN?

BY C. H. NORMAN

There is a widespread belief in England that all citizens are entitled to express opinions on every kind of public question on the platform or by writing without risk of prosecution, provided such opinions are not expressed in obscene or indecent language, and are free from incitements to violence. This view of the legal position is erroneous. No such liberty of expression is the right of British citizens under the Statute Law or the common law, either in peace—or wartime.

Acts of Parliament beginning with 1, Edward VI, render liable to severe penalties any person who should question the divine origin of the Bible, the divinity of Jesus Christ, or should use certain expressions in derogation of the Book of Common Prayer, or in relation to the administration of the Sacraments. For a prohibitionist to describe the drinking of wine at the Holy Sacrament as a sin would be blasphemy. These Statutes have certainly not fallen into disuse; yet no enlightened mind has any belief in the divine origin of these persons, books, or ceremonies.

21, George III, c. 49, is a Statute to "prevent profanation of the Lord's Day," which forbids "public debating on any subject whatsoever upon any part of the Lord's Day called Sunday." By this Act any prosecution would be well-founded against the delivery of political lectures on Sunday, and the magistrates would be bound to convict, or treat the Statute as a dead letter, which recent decisions show it is not. Incidentally the sitting of the House of Commons on September 3, 1939, when war against Germany was decided on, would appear to have been unlawful under this Act.

There are also Statutes aimed at any general criticism of the truth of the authorised doctrines of the Church of England, which are reinforced by Statutes against the use of obscene language and the printing of obscene publications. In practice, these Statutes are only used to ensure the prosecution of inconvenient books or pamphlets. The prosecution of the translator of M. Zola's novels was launched under these Acts; he was convicted and imprisoned. A prosecution is rarely instituted against the mass of vulgar literature of a fictional character which is devoid of literary or any other merit.

There are Statutes making all criticism of the powerful in the land such as the monarch, the judicial body, or the officers of state, in the exercise of their public functions, punishable as seditious libels or sedition. Writings calculated to bring the administration of justice into contempt, or holding up a judge to personal ridicule would come within the legal definition of seditious libel. The judges are further protected by the powers at common law and under Statute, whereby any person impugning their honesty, or mocking their dignity, can be proceeded against for contempt, as happened to the Birmingham Post, which was very uncivil on one occasion to Lord Darling.

The Crown is protected by a rampart of Statutes by which persons abusing the personal character of the monarch, criticising the morality of the succession, casting doubt on the chastity of the Queen, attempting to seduce certain officers of state from their duty, endeavouring to enter into marriage with persons of the blood royal without the monarch's assent, or even reflecting on the morality or decency of the late monarch, may be severely punished for committing treason, treason-felony, sedition, or seditious libel, or calumniation of the royal character. It would seem from the events of 1936 that no monarch can sit on the throne who offends against the vested interests in religion and morality.

It is an offence to advocate the changing of the institutions or forms of government in England by means of violence; but the advocacy of Republicanism is not illegal, provided it is not accompanied by any proposals for the overthrow of the existing monarchy, or deposition of the monarch.

Any writing calculated, in the opinion of a jury, to be defamatory of a person in the sense of holding him or her up to hatred, ridicule, or contempt it a libel; but the defendant can repel any action by establishing that the words were true as a matter of fact. Where, however, a person is accused of a criminal offence in any publication, then the publisher or writer, or printer on a prosecution for criminal libel, must prove that the criminal offence was in fact committed, and that it was a matter of public interest to disclose the fact. If a man knows another has served a term of imprisonment, he is not entitled to reveal that information merely for the sake of gossip or tittle-tattle, but only from a sense of public duty.

By the Army Act and the Naval Discipline Act, and the regulations promulgated thereunder, anyone who seeks to seduce a soldier from the absolute obedience exacted by the military oath, or endeavours to undermine the unquestioning obedience demanded from a naval rating or marine, can be heavily punished. Any person attempting to persuade a soldier from obeying orders in an industrial dispute, or inciting a soldier to take sides in such a dispute to create a revolution, would be guilty of a most serious offence under several Statutes.

Whether the mere advocacy of trade union principles in the Army, the Navy, or the Police Force is in itself an offence is an undecided question. Under the Police Act, it is an offence to ridicule the duties of the police, or to cast reflections upon the tasks they are ordered to carry out. Soldiers, sailors (or policemen who agitated in their various forces to secure the setting up of trade-union organisation as a method of redressing grievances) would soon find themselves in difficulties under the Articles of War, the Naval Discipline Act, or the Police Regulations. The same principle would apply to any critic of the morality of the Air Force in bombing sleeping populations.

By the Aliens Act and the regulations thereunder, deportation orders can be issued against aliens for taking part in political agitation in this country without any trial in a court of justice. Under these regulations, the right of asylum for political refugees has been practically abolished, as the King's Bench Judges decided that the Aliens Act conferred an absolute discretion, in this respect, on the Home Secretary, with which the judges could not interfere.

Under the Emergency Powers Act, 1920, the Government can or may do so through the Privy Council. Once a "state of emergency" is declared, as in 1926, the Government can direct regulations in suppression of freedom of speech, or writing, or movement of person, for a limited time. It is questionable, however, whether martial law could be instituted under this Act. In that respect it is different from the Defence of the Realm Acts, which conferred power on the Government to declare martial law. There is now power to declare martial law by Royal proclamation.

Another remarkable power vested in the authorities is under a Statute of Richard II. whereby inconvenient persons may be convicted as "rogues and vagabonds," or "disorderly persons," and ordered to find sureties for their good behaviour for a period up to twelve months. This power was used in the Suffrage agitation against Mr. George Lansbury, and against the police strikers, as in the Stoneham case in 1920. This Statute is still law.

The censorship of plays and dramatic performances is exercised by the Lord Chamberlain. It is invoked against the propaganda play of ideas rather than against the indecencies of the music halls, or the vulgar inanities and suggestiveness of the musical comedy. The Lord Chamberlain can maintain an absolute veto on any play regarded as dangerous to public morality in its outlook; but such a play could be presented by Societies like the Incorporated Stage Society, the Play Actors, and cognate societies. The existence of these societies—most of which ended in 1939—was the only check on the complete suppression of any performance of fine dramatic work. There is also a censorship exercised upon film production, which operates much in the same manner, though under a different authority and very effectively.

All printed publications must bear the imprint and address of the printer. This law is aimed at preventing secret printing of the kind required in revolutionary propaganda in times of public agitation. The provisions concerning registration of periodicals provide the authorities with powers which could be resorted to very harshly against unpopular or revolutionary journals; but few attempts have been made in recent years by the postal authorities to utilise their authority in this respect: yet the weapon is there.

The Official Secrets Act is designed to prevent the unauthorised publication of official documents or papers of a secret character by Ministers and officials, or by persons into whose possession official papers may come on death, or by purchase, such as newspaper editors, historians, or biographical writers. It is a valuable protection to the existing order, which is safeguarded from disclosures of great propaganda or historical value, by the mere knowledge among editors and publishers of the existence of these suppressive powers. Recent cases in which the definite threat of this Act was used concerned the proposed memoir of the late Roger Casement, and the memoirs of George Lansbury.

The last example of restriction on propaganda is the application of the law of libel as regards this subject the law is in an unsettled state. No more mischievous phrase has even been coined than the Latin tag for the words: "Of the dead, say reflections on the character of dead persons. On nothing but good." The dead should not be the target of the slanderous, but the fair maxim should be: "Of the dead say nothing but the truth." There is nothing more contrary to the public advantage than beslavering dead rulers and statesmen with ridiculous economiums of their non-existent virtues. It was Lord Granville who remarked that four of Queen Victoria's Prime Ministers had committed adultery: but mention of that fact would not be found in their biographies!

Reviewing these various prohibitions on the free discussion of questions of public importance, it is clear that the authorities have the means of suppressing any outspoken critic of any established institution under one or other of the laws on the Statute Book, the regulations made under Statutes, or by the common law. The pathway of criticism on most topics of public debate is strewn with traps, into which the most cautious of writers could easily stumble, as was shewn several times during the War.

What is the remedy? How can the Labour movement protect the honest and conscientious writer from the risk of governmental prosecution? Does it want to? There is no evidence that Labour, Socialist, or Communist Cabinet Ministers are any less reactionary on this subject than Tory or Liberal Cabinet Ministers. While this mass of repressive machinery can be set in motion against the critical or revolutionary-minded citizen, Freedom of Speech or Writing can only be regarded as phrases of the liberal bourgeoisie. In fact the Communist and Fascist Governments are entirely against freedom of discussion, and Leo Tolstoy would certainly have been interned by M. Stalin or Herr Hitler alike had he produced a "War and Peace" applicable to the war of 1939. True liberty in these categories of mental activity can only exist when the faculties of the mind can be directed against the structure of government, and the moral and religious sanctions on which it reposes, without any fear of unpleasant consequences of fine or imprisonment befalling the writer, as the result of some cutting analysis of the existing order.

The Labour and Trade Union movement should take the earliest opportunity of impressing upon its political leaders the urgent need for removing these hindrances upon freedom of discussion. The Labour movement must deny any class monopoly in the right to know, and should instruct its leaders, on their next accession to office, to strip the Statute Book of these infringements upon liberty of thought, so instituting an era of real toleration. The most convenient method of achieving this end is by the introduction of an omnibus measure, which would give statutory warrant, in plain terms, to the principle of toleration in propaganda, even for those theories which are regarded as most subversive of the existing order of society. The terms of the new Toleration Bill might run somewhat on these lines: Be it enacted from and after the passing of this Bill that

(1) No person shall be proceeded against for having written, spoken, published or printed any words in defamation of the Constitution, the doctrines of the Established Church, the Houses of Parliament, the administration of justice, the public actions or conduct of the Royal Family; or for having spoken, written, published, or printed any words subversive of discipline in H.M. Naval, Military, Air, or Police Forces.

(2) No person shall be proceeded against for the advocacy of trade union organisation in the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, or the Police Force.

(3) Where any official or person shall be prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act for having disclosed any information obtained in his official capacity, or communicated from an official source, no conviction shall be recorded where the jury is satisfied that such disclosure and/or communication was made in the honest belief of such official or person that it was in the public interest to make such disclosure and/or communication.

(4) The Lord Chamberlain shall cease to act as Censor of Plays from and after the passing of this Act; and the presentation of dramatic works, music-hall performances, or film productions, shall be free from any licensing or censor authority of any kind.

(5) No person shall be proceeded against for not having placed upon any printed document that he or she may have written, printed, or published, any imprint stating the place of publication and/or the name of the printer.

(6) All publications shall be entitled to be registered as newspapers or periodicals where the said newspapers or periodicals are published periodically, and otherwise comply with the regulations as to format and size set out in the Post Office Handbook.

(7) No proceedings of any kind shall be instituted in respect of alleged defamatory statements concerning deceased persons.

(8) No alien, temporarily or permanently resident in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, shall be deported for any written or spoken criticism of a political or religious character directed against the Constitution of Great Britain, or of any other State.

(9) No proceedings shall be taken for blasphemy, nor in respect of the denial of the alleged divinity of any religious book and/or doctrine of any kind whatsoever.

(10) All Statutes and/or regulations issued under Statutes in conflict with, in contradiction of, or inconsistent with, the principles set out in the preceding sections of this Act are hereby repealed, and no proceedings of any kind shall be instituted thereunder.

With such a measure on the Statute Book, the right to discuss all beliefs and theories, however sacred and however profane, would have been established, and every citizen could speak and write freely on all those topics which are the proper concern of every conscientious member of the community.

Who in the House of Commons will introduce such a Bill? The answer is: No one, because English people do not really believe in toleration, notwithstanding all the pretences that are made in the Capitalist Press, and by Capitalist propaganda, anent the latest piece of political bunkum called the Four Freedoms.

THE ORDER OF THE HOUR

BY RUDOLF ROCKER

[The following essay speaks for itself. Rocker, and our attacks on him, are mentioned in another column. The essay was published in Yiddish in "Freie Arbiter Stimme," New York, November 28, 1941.]

That the present war, which spreads itself over all continents and is engulfing mankind like a bloody flood, cannot be measured by the standards of military conflicts of the past, is beginning to be realised even by those who believe that historical facts can be denied through aged theories.

The habit of considering every historical event as the outcome of fixed economic laws which ultimately lead to a higher stage of social life, is a terribly blind belief and has contributed in no small measure to the development of the present situation. Even though one is the bitterest opponent of the present economic system, to assert that the present war is being waged solely in the interests of capitalistic groups is such a twisting of the truth that worse could not be invented. Even if it is accepted that certain capitalist circles are profiting from the great slaughter of the people, it nevertheless cannot be denied that the present catastrophe is transforming itself into a bloody menace to capitalism itself, and is against the interests of its servants and representatives. A social earthquake on such a vast scale must become a threat to every social system; that is why this fearful catastrophe is not simply a problem of certain classes, but of the whole of society itself.

It is a poor consolation to assert that the workers could have prevented the war if they had been more alert to their "class interests." That they had the power to do so no one wishes to deny; but that they nevertheless did not prevent it, and that the great tragedy of our time has come just the same, is also a fact. To-day we know already that the broad masses of the French Labour Movement have aided in weakening the opposition to Hitler's hordes. Had the German workers done the same, it might have been a gain; but they did not do so, and the internal collapse of France therefore led to the bloody yoke of the German occupation upon the French Labour Movement.

The same story repeats itself in every European country. Just because the workers have too closely understood their so-called "class interests" and have underestimated the menace which threatens everybody, they, together with the whole of society, became the victims of the bloodiest tyranny in history.

The present war is not only an economic issue. It is first of all a power problem between two different forces of social evolution. One of these leads back to the epoch of absolutism, to the common enslavement of mankind, whereas the second slowly raises the people to a higher social and cultural level, and carries with it the historical legacy left to us by the revolutions of the past.

The abolition of feudal absolutism and of the economic reign of feudalism through the democratic and liberal revolutions, was necessary in order to provide the pre-conditions for the development of the modern Labour Movement and Socialism. Without the political rights and liberties which have been achieved the social movements of our epoch could not even have been thought of. Through them social aims have been developed. The rights which we now enjoy to-day in the democratic countries have not been received by the nations as gifts from their governments; they are the results of hard and bloody struggles and were often paid for with great sacrifices. Whoever fails to take into account these rights and is in agreement with Lenin's phrase that "freedom is but a middle-class prejudice" is altogether lost for a movement which strives towards social liberation.

One doesn't serve social liberation by squandering, without a struggle, rights already gained, but only when one is always ready to broaden these rights and create for them a wider field of effectiveness. It is not less rights and smaller liberties that we demand, but more rights and greater liberties. Whoever thinks differently is ripe for dictatorship and for the totalitarian state and is consciously or unconsciously assisting the development of social reaction.

If it is true that democracy and liberalism have prepared the way for the modern Labour Movement and the social aims of our time, then it cannot be denied that the abolition of all democratic and liberal achievements must automatically lead to the abolition of the Labour Movement and of all libertian aims. That this is not a vain assertion can be seen from the present bloody reality. The totalitarian regime has made a hell for liberty; and if this was not understood at the beginning, it was a great error which is now being paid for in blood.

The terrible tyranny in all countries which have been poisoned by the totalitarian cliques in the occupied countries; the cowardly and conscienceless murdering of so-called living hostages; the daily executions of anti-fascist workers and peasants in Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, Czecho-Slovakia, Roumania, Serbia, Hungary, etc., create the existence of the totalitarian state. The ancient laws against the Jews; the frightful condition of millions of people in Europe who have been placed outside the law; the fear of the concentration camp; the barbaric suppression of all cultural achievements will bring about the collapse of civilisation in general, if Hitler should unfortunately be victorious.

To assert that to us it is all the same who is victor in this terrible conflict, means to aid the cowardly murderers, and to prepare the world for the "blessing" of Hitler's "New Order." The struggle against totalitarian slavery and its bestial achievements is the first duty of our time, the first condition for a new social development in the spirit of freedom and social justice. But the fact that we are making the struggle against dictatorship and the human-debauchery of the totalitarian state the order of the present hour does not mean that we believe even for a moment that the citizenship-society is the best in the world. It only means that we recognise the possibility of a higher development under better and more human conditions.

When the world is liberated from the militarism of social life, from all forms of the totalitarian ant-state—only then will new possibilities be opened up for constructive creating and building. Freedom does not recognise a pre-determined ultimate aim; it is but the means which can open for us the doors to a new future. Since the creative forces of society were not able to build up a dam against the bloody flood of the war, let them at least learn from the newest terrible history in what manner it can, once and for all time, prevent similar catastrophes.

Not the slave-state of a so-called "Aryan" race will be the aim of humanity, but a federation of free nations, such as has been foreseen by Saint-Simon, Proudhon and Bakunin. That is the only basis on which a new life can be developed, and which will make our existence worthy and with a purpose.

THE MARK OF VANDALISM

(Concluded from Vol. V., No. 12, p. 139.)

The Concord Daily Monitor for December 11, 1942, reproduced an editorial note from the Catholic Review from which we quote :—

quote :—

A MONUMENT TO INGERSOLL!

In the House of Representatives on Monday of last week, Representative William T. Pheiffer of New York, introduced "by request," a joint resolution, authorising "in Washington, District of Columbia," a monument to the memory of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, the atheist, who tried to make atheists of countless Americans. . . .

That resolution was introduced in a room in which there is said every day at the opening of Congress, a prayer for Divine Guidance.

In these days when millions of all creeds are storming heaven with prayers for Divine Help, in the most terrible war that modern times have known, one would think that men's hearts would not only turn to God but would shrink from thoughts of the defiance of God. Without God's help the world cannot be saved from chaos.

We are talking about writing new pages in history.

Well, that was a queer page which was written in the Halls of Congress on Monday of last week.

Some Americans have entered upon strange paths.

A strange path! A queer page! What comment to make on honouring the memory of one of the greatest orators and one of the most inspiring monuments the English-speaking world has produced!

This pious commentary inspired vandalism. Here is an extract from The Peoria Star for March 29, 1943 :—

Some time Sunday night the cast bronze statue of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which had stood at the North Perry Avenue entrance to Glen Oak park, was pushed from its pedestal.

A crude sign, printed on cardboard and nailed to a small stake, was stuck in the ground beside the statue.

On one side of the crudely-printed sign were the words, "The wind did it. But he would sure make a swell anti-aircraft gun." On the other side was printed, "Roses are red, violets are blue, you put him in the scrap pile, this was all we could do." . . .

The Ingersoll statue was placed in Glen Oak park almost 30 years ago, money to pay for it having been raised by popular subscription. Resentment against the statue being in the park has occasionally been expressed by a few Peorians because of Col. Ingersoll's agnosticism.

"Around the Town" column in The Peoria Journal Transcript for April 9, 1943, stated :—

The Colonel Ingersoll statue is back on its granite pedestal in Glen Oak park but the recent vandalism of its overthrow keeps on buzzing. . . .

The bronze figure is seven and a half feet in height and weighs in the neighbourhood of 4,500 pounds. It was undamaged in the fall except slightly below the knees where the trousers wrinkle and repairs are so well made no noticeable trace remains. . . .

Mehlenbeck Bros., contractors, completed the job of replacing the statue Thursday, April 1. It required powerful apparatus to swing it into position. It is now welded to a steel anchor in the massive granite base.

Clearly, the act was one of vandalism not only by bigoted so-called believers but by self-supposed super-patriots. They were of the same mentality as the vandals who attacked the Bedford statue in Russell Square. Consequently, if we resent the one outrage, we ought to resent the other.

This, of course, is not the view of those capitalist-society power-drunk opportunist careerists, miscalled and self-styled "Communists."

In February, 1943, the latter-day exhibitionist "Communists" erected a memorial bust to Lenin close to his old London home of exile. It was unveiled by the Soviet Ambassador and ex-White Guardist, Maisky, who, as pointed out in these columns, took up arms on the side of Kolchak against the Soviets and all that Lenin represented. Around Maisky were gathered representatives of degenerate militarised Bolshevism and of the City of London, the capitalism that oppressed and slandered the living Lenin.

To please their bourgeois big-business Allies, the Stalinists created a fictitious Lenin. The capitalist press welcomed the fiction. They welcomed the erection of a memorial to their fiction. Some Fascists, being more honest reactionaries despoiled this statue. And so the bourgeoisie were willing to contribute towards the erection of a second memorial to replace the damaged one. They had to express their hatred of vandalism. Such was their gratitude to "Communism" for having made Lenin "harmless."

In doing this, the militarists of oppressive society were applying to Lenin the words that Lenin once wrote of Marx :—

During the lifetime of great revolutionaries, the oppressing classes have visited relentless persecution on them and received their teaching with the most savage hostility, the most furious hatred, the most ruthless campaign of lies and slanders. After their death, attempts are made to turn them into harmless icons, canonise them, and surround their names with a certain halo for the "consolation" of the oppressed classes and with the object of duping them, while at the same time emasculating and vulgarising the real essence of their revolutionary theories and blunting their revolutionary edge. At the present time, the bourgeosie and the opportunists within the labour movement are co-operating in this work of adultrating Marxism.

The hypocrites, who respect the graven image of Lenin, and in life prayed and conspired for his death, would destroy the graven image of Francis, Fifth Duke of Bedford, to express their hatred for the living twelfth Duke of Bedford. Yet Lenin, who was defended by the twelfth Duke, and the fifth Duke, as also his descendant to-day, all represent the same principle—peace and anti-militarism. It is impossible to wish to preserve a plaque of Lenin from vandalism without experiencing the same regard for a statue of the fifth Duke of Bedford.

Francis, fifth Duke of Bedford, was born on July 22, 1765. He succeeded his grandfather, John, fourth Duke, in 1771.

The fourth Duke was leader of the Bedford Party and "Bloomsbury Gang." He was sometime Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1762 was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to France. He signed the preliminaries of peace with France and Spain.

Francis died at Woburn as a result of an accident on May 2, 1802. Following the accident, he underwent an operation for strangulated hernia and passed away in great pain. He was aged 37.

During the period that he sat in the House of Lords he made a great stand for public liberty. Reference was made to that stand in these columns for April, 1943.

On January 25, 1795, the Fifth Duke moved a resolution in a hostile House of Lords in opposition to the war on revolutionary France. He defended boldly the French Revolution.

On May 30, 1797, the Duke moved his Address to the King, praying him to dismiss his ministers. The protest was signed only by the Duke and Lord Chadworth. Later in the year the Duke took the initiative in the secession of the Opposition from Parliament.

On March 22, 1798, the Duke repeated his motion for the dismissal of the Ministry.

The Lord Chancellor's reply reads like that of the present Lord Chancellor, replying to the present Duke of Bedford. The Lord Chancellor said that the Duke's motion was a mere abstract proposition which could not, with more propriety, be entered upon the Journals than any similar proposition with respect to politics or morals. . . . The effect of adopting the motion might be to dispirit the country and to encourage the enemy.

The Duke of Norfolk defended the Duke of Bedford's motion, and said that it had been brought forward only to do away with the bar which seemed to be laid in the way of peace by a certain part of His Majesty's Speech to both Houses of Parliament on the first day of the session, which conveyed an idea that no peace could be entered into with the present Government of France. If this motion of the noble Duke was to pass a weighty obstacle to peace would be removed.

His contemporaries declared that he was deficient in wit and imagination. He was a fluent but not a lively speaker. By perspicuity of statement and solidity of argument, he arrested and secured the attention of his audience. According to Lord Holland, he had one great defect. He treated the understandings of his adversaries with contempt and was utterly indifferent to the goodwill of his audience.

The Duke joined the circle of the Prince of Wales's friends and was one of the two unmarried dukes who supported the prince at his marriage to the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, on April 8, 1795.

"My brother," wrote Lord John Russell, "told me that the prince was so drunk that he could scarcely support him from falling."

The speeches delivered by fifth Duke on May 30, 1797, and March 22, 1798, make excellent reading to-day. They apply as forcibly to current events as they did to the circumstances at the time of their delivery. Politically the world has not progressed too well. Which fact explains the fifth Duke's statue being honoured with the mark of vandalism.

On February 3, 1800, Charles James Fox delivered his famous speech "On Peace with France." Every word of this remarkable and bold declaration should be read to-day, for it is one of the most useful and most logical and powerful statements ever uttered by a politician. In this speech, Fox defends the fifth Duke for having complained against letters being intercepted and published by the Government.

We believe that the present Duke is more concerned with the contemporary struggle against war and authority than the traditions of his house. Hence he will not have considered that some of his speeches, complaining of letters being intercepted, are a repetition of the complaint of his ancestor.

Fox defended the fifth Duke for having urged that war led to a scarcity of corn. A Government apologist in the Commons had said of the fifth Duke, in language almost identical with much that is employed to-day, that he "Must treat with indifference the intellect of a man who can ascribe the present scarcity of corn to war."

Fox replied to this ignorant sneer vigorously and directly in this sentence addressed to Mr. Speaker :—

Sir, I think that there is nothing either absurd or unjust in such an opinion.

In 1803, the year following the libertian and pacifist Duke's death, Fox paid a further House of Commons tribute to "this great and excellent man."

Such was the man whose statue was defaced by the stupid night-prowler vandals of twentieth-century militarism. The orthodox capitalist militarist "Labour" press ranked such ignorant vandalism—patriotism!

"A CALL TO MANHOOD."

Our new pamphlet, A Call to Manhood, consisting of about 20 essays, published in various journals between 1907 and 1943, is passing through the press now. It is being priced as cheaply as possible. Meantime we repeat our appeal to every comrade who wishes to help this work to send a donation. Every comrade making a donation to this special effort will receive a free copy of the book as soon as it is issued. Mainly anti-war and anti-militarist, this work covers a wide range of social enquiry and discussion.

If possible, as soon as you receive this paper, make your gift. This will speed publication, especially as all our work is published at a loss. If only every reader would respond—many did last month—this begging would cease.

THE CHURCH AND BOMBING.

By The Duke of Bedford.

That section of public opinion which has preserved its capacity for sound judgment amidst the follies and hatreds of war has been deeply shocked to hear of the rejection by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, by a majority of several hundred to about twelve, of the proposal that the Government should be asked to reconsider their policy of the wholesale bombing of German cities. The Assembly, after maintaining that bombing and war were contrary to Christian doctrine, actually went on to declare their wholehearted support for, and approval of, the Government's policy.

This extraordinary declaration appears to be defended by the militarist section of the Assembly on the ground that, as Christians live in a world where the majority of people depart widely from Christian standards of conduct, they, the Christians, are often compelled to make the unhappy choice between the greater evil and the lesser. They accept the view of those Government experts who declare that wholesale bombing will shorten the war, and they therefore support such bombing as the lesser evil.

Whether regarded from the standpoint of a betrayal of a spiritual Lord whose mind, by reason of their training and profession, they should have been well able to ascertain so far as the issue in question was concerned; or whether regarded merely from the standpoint of educated members of a nation which in the past has enjoyed a reputation for shrewdness and intelligence, the voting was as lamentable an exhibition as can well be imagined of the mental and moral paralysis induced by war propaganda.

In the first place, Christians, because they live in an un-Christian world, are never compelled to choose between the greater evil and the lesser. There is always a third alternative available to them which is not the way of the world and is not evil, namely the way of Christ, or in other words, the way of love, reconciliation, and, if need be, martyrdom. This is the only way which, as a body of Christians, the Assembly had any business to commend to the world as the right course to follow. This fact, however, seems to have been entirely overlooked by those who opposed the restriction of bombing and also, in a measure, it may be, even by the small minority who favoured restriction. To admit that a thing is contrary to Christian doctrine and then, in the next breath, to give it cordial support, is a policy of utter confusion.

If the Assembly had felt called upon, as an act of charity to suffering human beings, to make a suggestion which, even on the assumption that the latter were still not ready to accept the way of Christ, might nevertheless involve them in less misery than the way they were following, they should have made it absolutely clear at the very start that this was their approach to the question. Having done so, the advice they gave should have been sound and not foolish.

Religious men possessed of reasonable intelligence might well have doubted whether the judgment of persons with the character and outlook of the Government experts who favour wholesale bombing is reliable on any such subject; they might also have realised that in regard to war-suffering, the time factor is not necessarily the most important. A short war which kills enormous numbers of civilians and destroys many cities and much industrial plant, may, both at the time and later, cause more suffering than a longer war which kills a smaller number of Service men and destroys mainly military objectives. The Assembly's line of argument also, of course, logically induces the rather startling conclusion that any method which shortens the war—even gas, the distribution of disease germs, and the poisoning of water supplies—is preferable on grounds of humanity to one which, by avoiding the use of these ghastly weapons, permits of a longer struggle.

Even assuming, however, that an arguable case exists for those who consider that the opinion of the Government experts who favour wholesale bombing would, on balance, cause lack of judgment in assuming that no other alternatives existed except the continuation of the war with wholesale bombing and continuation with bombing restricted to military objectives. There was an obvious third alternative which does not make any unreasonable demand upon non-Christians and is infinitely better than either of the others—a negotiated peace. This alternative the Assembly was not prepared to support, yet no one with the rudiments of knowledge of human nature could imagine that, at this stage of the war, Hitler's personal character and trustworthiness matter in the slightest degree, or that, if Germany as well as other nations received fair treatment, he could get the support of his people for another war if it were on a weak and unjust issue. No one, moreover, with the slightest intelligence could imagine that the kind of peace now too plainly foreshadowed in the event of an Allied victory is worth further sacrifice of life. It is now as clear as daylight that such a peace would give to Stalin in Europe, and probably also in Asia that absolute power which, it is said, corrupts absolutely. By allowing Russia to rob Poland of Polish territory and Poland to rob Germany of German territory the peace following the unconditional surrender of Germany would repeat the worst blunders of Versailles and sow the seeds of another war of revenge. By setting up monetary and foreign trade arrangements under the control of the financiers of Wall Street, such a peace would, in the interests of money-lenders, also re-establish in Europe after the war the old paradox of poverty in the midst of potential abundance. If, as she well might do, Russia resisted the plans of the financiers, another war would certainly result, in preparation for which the Axis would have to be rearmed as indispensable allies.

Truly where there is no vision among their spiritual and temporal leaders, the people perish.

"ANARCHIST" MILITARISTS

In our sheet, Hyde Park, published in September 1938, we published an article indicting Rudolf Rocker, formerly editor of the London Yiddish journal, "The Workers' Friend," under the heading "Anarchist Pretenders." Many comrades objected to our indictment as being too scathing. Since the attack was factual, and there was no abuse of language, we do not yield to this criticism. The working-class movement has been injured, not only by Social Democratic or Labour parliamentarianism, but also by a mockery of Anarchism or Syndicalism.

We mentioned Rocker in "The Word" for March 1942, when we reprinted our 1915 translation of his "Workers' Friend" replies to Peter Kropotkin's Militarist articles of 1914. The Anarchist movement never forgave us for being the first Anarchist to indict Kropotkin militarism and for our insistence on the anti-Socialist and anti-proletarian character of his intense Nationalist Imperialism. His name and works ought to have been forgotten long since, and it is absurd to see so-called Anarchists walking round selling his pamphlets as though he were the apostle of Anti-Militarism and Peace.

In 1941 Rocker went the way that Kropotkin went in 1914. In Rumbo, Havana, and La Protesta, Buenos Aires, he published Spanish essays supporting the war. These we translated and published in 'The Word.' We reproduced the description of him published by our Italian Anarchist Anti-Militarist contemporary, published in New York: Rocker, "who for many years has styled himself an Anarchist." The "has styled" is correct: for the description was never meant to be real and vital.

The Freedom Press has published a reply to Rudolf Rocker's pro-war Anarchism, under the title The Issues in the Present War.

Graham translates from Freie Arbiter Stimme for November 28, 1941, Rocker's defence of the present war. We reproduce this essay that it may speak for itself. No reply is necessary. Strangely enough, the Graham pamphlet carries advertisements of writings by Kropotkin and Herbert Read. The record of neither ought to be considered seriously by an Anti-Militarist movement. Kropotkin thought and wrote himself out of the working-class movement. Herbert Read needs to make considerable atonement for a most unsatisfactory past and a far from heroic present before he can be taken seriously as an Anarchist propagandist, or an apostle or contributor even to the thought of a new world order.

Our old description stands as a firm and unanswerable challenge: "Anarchist Pretenders." The activities of such persons must end in tragedy for a world in chaos seeking order and rebirth.

STERN RETRIBUTION.

The crimes you commit, O foulest of foes,
On the human race cast shadows of shame.
To express our full horror at what you have done,
We'll treat you in a manner precisely the same.

Our cities you bomb, our children you kill:
The vilest of sins, as all good men agree,
So we'll smash your cities, bring death to your homes—
And thus hope to prove how much nobler are we.

METAMORPHOSIS.

I stood to watch the soldier lads
Go marching down the street;
I heard the proud bands playing, and
The firm tread of their feet.
Their rifles, gleaming in the sun,
Made up a sparkling show,
And in their faces, clear and strong
I saw their bright youth glow.
Then, as I stood, the music failed—
Became a low, sad cry.
With sound of wind-blown, withered leaves
The footsteps shuffled by.
A thick and choking cloud of dust
Made all the colours dull;
And every rifle was a cross,
And every face—a skull.

THE SIXTH YEAR OF WAR: NOTES AND REFLECTIONS

BY THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

If, as many hope, the war in Europe is drawing to a close, it is doing so under conditions of degradation, disillusionment and utter futility which more than justifies the point of view of those who, sometimes in the face of severe persecution, opposed it from the start and advocated at all stages, and still advocate, its conclusion by a negotiated peace.

War and air-raid conditions have produced a vast increase in immorality and crime, certainly not offset by the undoubted, though limited, gain of evacuated town children who have acquired a fondness for country life. Disease has increased, notably tuberculosis, and the amount of mental sickness and derangement, due to nerve strain, is utterly beyond computation and is likely seriously to affect many who are now quite young.

In Europe wholesale destruction of works of art and monuments of culture and beauty by the Allied forces, often for no defensible military gain, is likely to evoke from future generations the comment that if the Germans were Huns, the Allies were unquestionably Vandals.

The heartless and revolting area bombing of German and other cities, often, again, for no adequate military reason, has provoked the terrible flying-bomb reprisals against our own towns. The V.1 weapon in its turn has given rise to an indignation campaign in the British and American Press which, in the far-fetched nature of the arguments used to prove that the German weapon is more indiscriminate in causing civilian casualties than the Allied air operations, surely reaches a new high—or low—water-mark in humbug and hypocrisy! Persons inclined to be influenced by this propaganda ought only to need reminding of such incidents as the wiping out of the residential quarters of the wonderful old Hanseatic cities of Lübeck and Rostock which provoked German reprisals against Exeter and Bath at a time when mass air attacks on cities had mercifully died down; Mr. Brendan Bracken's statement, "Our plans are to bomb, burn and ruthlessly destroy, in every way available to us, the people responsible for creating this war"; Air Vice-Marshal Saundvey's statement that "In the ruins of Hamburg, Düsseldorf, Cologne and other great centres of production civilised life, as we know it, is no longer possible"; the report of the "Sunday Express" of January 16th, 1944, that in the attack on Brunswick, a town of two hundred thousand inhabitants, "A great force of Lancasters in three minutes dropped a heavier load of bombs than the Luftwaffe dropped on London in a whole night"; and the Swiss newspaper report of the conditions of Hamburg, quoted in "Reynolds News" of August 8th, 1943, "We passed whole streets, squares and even districts that had been razed. Everywhere were charred corpses and injured people had been left unattended. Charred adult corpses had shrunk to the size of children. Women were wandering about half crazy. That night the largest workers' district of the city was wiped out."

It is only fair to point out that many of the actual victims of the worst-bombed areas are wise and fair enough to realise that they are only receiving what their Government has given to others. The contemptible display of those who cannot themselves "take" without storming and whining, what they triumphantly applauded when it was "given" on their behalf, comes largely, as one would expect, from the propaganda agencies.

The bombing of cities in the Occupied Countries, again often without adequate military excuse, has largely, if not entirely, destroyed any disposition on the part of the people of those countries to regard the Allies as liberators—a natural result indeed, in view of the fact that there is no reasonable doubt that they could now be freed by means of a negotiated peace, without a single further casualty! It is said that in Caen, as a result of the determination of Allied statesmen to "liberate" by no method other than that of war, no less than a tenth of the inhabitants have lost their lives. The "Scotsman" of June 20th contained a piece of grim and quite unconscious humour on the subject of "liberation." "Montebourg has been liberated"—Allied communique number 30." In another part of the same paper on the same day the statement was made on the authority of Reuter's correspondent, "Montebourg is no more. . . . There is nothing here but rubble and black desolation—no sign of life. The city is dead."

Reports also indicate that British troops are disillusioned with regard to the "liberation" business, especially as they discover that the Germans did not maltreat the civil population and were not hated by them in the way they were led to believe. I have seen a letter from a soldier in Normandy who wrote: "My observations on conditions here are much the same as in Sicily. These people were not unhappy until we came and they are not yet starving. Various French acquaintances have asked me if it is really necessary to steal their vegetables and surreptitiously milk their cows —what is one to answer? The Germans, under instruction, or through innate decency, did leave a decent impression."

The troops are still sufficiently under the influence of propaganda to feel that they must "finish the job," but they are said to show no vestige of the "crusade" idea and feel that they have again been let down by the politicians in the interests of Finance and Big Business.

Most significant of all is the fact that an Allied victory, if gained in Europe, will be accompanied by the utter defeat of every moral aim for the sake of which the British Government declared that it had entered the war. Truly, God is not mocked by those who try to attain good ends by evil means!

We are supposed to have gone to war to prevent the spread of a totalitarian philosophy which subordinates the individual to the State. At the end of the conflict, however, there will be far more totalitarianism than there was at the beginning. Russia is completely totalitarian; Britain herself is now largely totalitarian; and there is no reasonabe doubt that most of the post-war European Governments will also be totalitarian in one way or another.

Then we are supposed to have gone to war to protect small nations, and particularly Poland, from aggression, and the right of peoples to manage their own affairs was further emphasised in the Atlantic Charter. Recently, however, it has been made clear that the democratic Baltic States, which greatly desire their independence and which were disgracefully treated by Russia prior to the war, are once again to be swallowed up by the Soviet. The future of Poland at the time of writing is still under discussion, and it cannot be foreseen with certainty what compromise may be arrived at as a result of Stalin's possible unwillingness to give undue premature offence to public opinion in countries whose military aid he still requires; and as a result of the desire of British statesmen to save their faces, anyhow to a small extent. It can hardly be said, however, that at the moment the portents are very favourable. The demands of the Soviet's puppet Polish Government for German territory are extravagant and foolish to a degree; while the chances of Mr. Eden's pledge being kept to the other Polish Government to which Britain gave official recognition early in the war, appear to be distinctly remote. It will be remembered that in July 1941 Mr. Eden sent a note to General Sikorsky in which he said: "I desire to assure you that His Majesty's Government do not recognise any territorial changes which have been affected in Poland since August 1939"; and on January 26th, 1944, he said: "We do not propose to recognise any territorial changes which take place during the war unless they take place with the free consent and goodwill of the parties concerned."

Seeing that Soviet pledges that there were not to be any territorial aggrandisements by any of the Allies were given in their adherence to the Atlantic Charter and again in May 1942, it is pretty obvious that the third moral alleged war aim—the vindication of the sanctity of international pledges—also goes by the board. History, including very recent history, proves that all countries, including Britain, break their pledges whenever it appears to be in their interests to do so, but that Germany is a quite unpardonable and almost unique offender in this respect is, of course, the story that we are constantly being told.

Finally, the British Government, which rejected with scorn the idea of the further appeasement of totalitarian Germany, will, at the end of the war, have no choice but to appease and go on appeasing another totalitarian Power—Russia—which, not so very long ago, they were in the habit of denouncing with equal indignation!

It must not be thought that I am against trying to make the best of Stalin, though I dislike some of his actions as much as I dislike some of Hitler's; but I cannot help feeling a certain cynical amusement at the spectacle of our warmongers, as a result of their own warmongering, being, at the finish, compelled, from necessity, to do in regard to the most powerful Dictator, what I would have done voluntarily, as a matter of common sense, in regard to all Dictators. Moreover, they have to pretend to "enjoy" their medicine and to be most optimistic with regard to the benefits which will accrue to the civilised world as a result of an extremely long course of it!

If the war in Europe should end shortly, there will remain, of course, the war in the East, for which Mr. Morrison recently expressed considerable enthusiasm. This enthusiasm, I gather, is by no means shared by the British army fighting in Europe, but possibly if Mr. Morrison would consent to lead the van through tropical jungles, it would not only put new heart and fresh enthusiasm into the troops, but expiate finally his offence of being a pacifist in the last war. This offence, I find, ardent militarists in some cases still rather unkindly hold against him, notwithstanding the yeoman service he has rendered to the country's defences by his administration of Regulation 18B.

Information about Japan's entry into the war and her alleged treacherous attack at Pearl Harbour has been rather scanty. "The New Leader," however, let one cat out of the bag when it revealed the existence of a White Paper of a U.S.A. State Department which, when dealing with the period of Hess's visit to this country, records that on May 11th Mr. Cordell Hull approached the Japanese Ambassador with a proposal that, if Japan desired a friendly settlement of the Pacific situation, no serious difficulty stood in the way. The Japanese responded eagerly, but when Hitler invaded Russia, the U.S.A. decided on a complete change of policy, and Mr. Cordell Hull admits that the American Government proposed impossible terms to Japan and expected a declaration of war in consequence.

Recently I discovered another emergent feline in Dorothy Hutchinson's excellent booklet, "Must the Killing Go On?" published by the American Peace Now Movement. This booklet reveals that directly after the Atlantic Conference on September 3rd, 1941, the United States Government threatened Japan with an economic blockade unless she would guarantee the non-disturbance of the status quo in the Pacific, or, in other words, unless she would leave unmolested the white man's empires in the Orient, of which the British Empire comprised about 90 per cent., both in area and population. This economic blockade progressed inexorably until the "New York Times" could report, five days before Pearl Harbour, "Japan has been cut off from about 75 per cent. of her normal imports as a result of the Allied blockade. Japan to-day is on the verge of economic collapse." The Kurusu Mission came to Washington to negotiate because of Japan's desperate economic situation. When this mission received from the United States Government no concessions whatever but an ultimatum instead, Japan chose to fight rather than to submit to what promised to be perpetual economic enslavement.

That the Roosevelt Administration clearly foresaw what was coming, is shown by the repeated but unheeded warnings of impending attack which it sent to Pearl Harbour during two full weeks prior to December 7th. Moreover, nine days before Pearl Harbour, an American naval expedition, according to Lieutenant Clarence E. Dickinson, sailed from Hawaii under shoot-on-sight orders, which were equivalent to undeclared war on Japan.

As Congressman Sumners of Texas said: "This blaming of the Pearl Harbour tragedy on the treachery of the Japs. is like the fellow who had been tickling the hind leg of a mule, trying to explain his bunged-up condition by blaming the mule for having violated his confidence."

Much of Japan's conduct in China has been indefensible, but so has much British conduct in the same country, as well as some American conduct in the Philippines at the time of the American conquest of those Islands. In the East, as in the West, sanity demands that the possibilities of a negotiated peace fair to all parties be explored without delay.

With regard to conditions and feeling in America, I do not receive very encouraging reports. The people seem even more ignorant of, and indifferent to, monetary reform than in Britain. War conditions have not resulted in a restriction of the output of civilian goods comparable to that which has occurred over here, and the huge creations of new money for war purposes have produced considerable prosperity. Many Americans seem, therefore, well content that the war should continue indefinitely, especially as some of their leading men draw gloomy pictures of post-war unemployment, of the simple solution to which problem lack of knowledge of monetary reform leaves the people in a state of ignorance.

The only sufferers are the bereaved, and many of these no doubt are partly consoled by the patriotic dope of war propaganda. This state of war-complacency is, however, a bit hard, to say the least of it, not only on America's suffering Allies in Britain, but also on her own exiled or suffering sons in the Services.

So much for the gloomy present. Is there any hope for the future? To this question we must not return a too emphatic negative, although undoubtedly the future contains tremendous problems and dangers which "victory" would make far worse, but which a negotiated peace might largely mitigate.

Much depends on the amount of sense displayed by those in the Services when at last demobilisation restores to them some measure of freedom. The more depressing reports of Service feeling declare that Beveridge is apparently their one hope and aim. If this should be the case, I trust that they will soon awaken to the fact that monetary reform would provide them with a better 'ole, or, if I may be forgiven the pun, an infinitely better drink!

Other observers are much more optimistic and are confident that in the Services, not only is there a healthy contempt for the politicians of all the older Parties, but much real thought going on as well. Let us hope, therefore, that in due course this thought bears fruit before a third war is upon us, confounding utterly the suicidal politics of the present visionless politicians, and resulting, contrary to all apparent probability, in the establishment of a brave new world.

NEW ZEALAND LETTERS

[Below we publish some interesting correspondence from our readers in New Zealand.

Lincoln Efford was mentioned in the striking exposure of the New Zealand "Conchie" Concentration Camps contributed by our comrade, the Rev. Charles H. Cole, of the Unitarian and Humanist organisation, to these columns for June, 1944.

Michael Young will be remembered as the leading member of the New Zealand P.P.U. and No Conscription movements whose remarkable letter from the Parparua Prison, Canterbury, appeared in this journal for September, 1943 (Vol. V., No. 2, p. 22). We published his declaration before the C.O. Appeal Board, Wellington, October 20, 1941, under the title "WHY I AM AN ABSOLUTIST" in our issue for January, 1944 (Vol. V., No. 6, p. 66). The following month we published a letter from his wife, Winifred Young (February, 1944, Vol. V., No.7, (p. 84).

Schwarz is an Anarchist comrade, whose letter recalls the activities in Austria, Britain, and U.S.A., of Rudolf Grossmann, who assumed the literary name of Pierre Ramus. Soon after our entrance into the Anarchist movement in London in 1906, we became intimately associated with Grossman, who used the name of Karl Morleit, at that time. Grossmann was a magnificent and tireless propagandist. He wrote a few times to our former paper "The Spur," at the end of the last war. It is our intention to pay a tribute to his memory as soon as opportunity to do so arises. At present we are engaged in an anti-militarist struggle and it is regrettable that the Anarchist movement has never realised the need to show solidarity in aiding our work in that struggle. After all, our imprisonments, and our long years of struggle in the Anarchist cause, have earned us some right to be heard. Were such loyalty shown, perhaps the movement itself could have been made more useful and more worthy of respect. Munition-making Syndicalism and A.E.U. membership is not Anarchist propaganda. Nor is it proletarian idealism. The so-called Anarchist movement has reduced its tragedy to a farce. Comrade Schwarz must face that fact.

The letter of Monica Townend is interesting. Elsewhere we reproduce Sidney Townend's Statement of Conscientious Objection, made on November 14, 1942. Also his excellent essay, "Foundations of Peace." The Duke of Bedford reviewed Wilfred Townend's "Paying for The War" in these columns for February. As a result of the circulation of this journal in New Zealand, his sister-in-law, Monica Townend wrote us and made known her husband's stand against war. Both Wilfred and Sidney Townend believe in Social Credit: but one supports the war and the other opposes the war.—Editor.]

Dear Mr. Aldred,—I am enclosing a petition that I drew up and presented to the House of Representatives last week. In a month or two I shall have to go to Wellington to give evidence on it before the Petitions Committee of the House, which will then make a favourable or unfavourable recommendation to the House. It is the latest attempt on our part to get the treatment of the conscientious objectors here improved. I did not mean the petition to be a "mass" one but decided to try to gain the signatures of representative people—mainly not identified with the peace movement. I got fifty-six in the two or three days I was able to give to it. Sixteen professors and lecturers on the staff of the local University College, presidents and secretaries of the main trade union and Labour Party organisations, clergymen, and a few others. The petition had a fairly good report in the Christchurch morning paper. All our attempts so far to bring the Government to make amendments in the direction suggested have failed, though I have been assured several times in the last few months by Cabinet Ministers that the matter was under consideration and that a final decision would be given soon. With Mr. Fraser off to visit Britain, I see little hope of anything being done yet.

I congratulate you on The Word, and admire the work you do. C. H. Cole, to whose career and writings you give a good deal of space, was a friend of mine when here, and we worked together in the peace movement. I only wish we were able to operate a paper on your lines in this country. I was doing something in that line at the beginning of the war, but the police seized my printing press and I was prevented from carrying on. There is now no paper in this country of a similar kind to yours. I get the Words you send to the Book Society in Christchurch and distribute them here. I should be glad of another copy of The Word "Special Investigation Report of 18B."

With best wishes for your work.

Yours sincerely,

LINCOLN D. W. EFFORD.

Christchurch, N.W. 1, April 4, 1944.

Dear Guy,—You will note the change of address. I have completed 2½ years in prison. Sentences: Three months, refusing to join army; 3 months, ditto; 2 years for publishing subversive pamphlets. From prison I was taken to the military camp and again refused a military order, so now am awaiting the police, as all alleged conscientious objectors must appear before a magistrate. He will in all probability sentence me to detention in the defaulters' camps for the duration of the war. He can give me three months in prison first, and if he is particularly nasty, he can do as the Wellington magistrate intended doing, keep sentencing me to three months' imprisonment (with no breaks) until the war ends.

I have always opposed these concentration camps—how this phrase gets under the skins of the authorities—and shall non-co-operate. This means I shall spend the duration in prison in any case. There are 50-odd comrades scattered through our prisons, and, I should say, 750 in the camps.

Petitions are being circulated at present which are urging the Government to bring the law into line with that in Britain and also to end these indeterminate sentences. The changes now likely to be affected are such as will leave the most earnest objectors in camps and prisons. That is where the Government wants us.

I cannot say that I agree with your appreciative estimate of my Appeal Board statement. Reading it over at leisure in prison, I was concerned to note that parts of it were almost identical with sections of a P.P.U. pamphlet! The construction and thread of argument seem to me, now, to be extremely poor, and as at that time I represented more than just myself, I feel ashamed that I defined my position so carelessly. My only excuse is that I was overworked. The statement was prepared only the evening before the hearing. With all its errors, it did represent my viewpoint at the time.

Some day I shall tell you of the dozens of pamphlets, articles, bulletins, etc., our enthusiastic little group in Wellington prepared; of the methods we employed to distribute them in numbers amounting to hundreds of thousands. The comradeship was wonderful to experience. Those chiefly concerned are deliberately separated into different prisons.

Life in prison is tolerable so long as one has a regular supply of books from outside. The prison libraries are filled with junk!

Here is the daily prison round:—

6.30 a.m., up and wash in cell (all individual), empty slops into drum outside when door is unlocked, and take breakfast off tray. Lock-up.

Before the next unlocking at 7.50 a.m. blankets are folded and cells swept.

At 7.50 a.m. dishes are put outside door and one proceeds out into the work gangs in the assembly yard, all to continual commands. The gangs are generally on the jobs by 8 a.m., and the work varies from prison to prison.

At Mount Eden and Paparua, the two largest prisons, the quarries are the chief income-producers.

At 11.45 a.m. one is locked up for dinner, and unlocked at 1 p.m. to proceed out to work again. In summer work finishes at 4.30 p.m., and half an hour earlier in winter. So, as in England, prisoners are in solitary confinement for nearly 17 hours a day.

On Saturdays and Sundays doors are unlocked at 9 a.m., and the days are spent mooching around an exercise yard. There is no provision for recreation, handicrafts or education.

At Paparua there is a school twice a week for the youths who have had a very meagre education, but this affects few. In winter a series of 13 weekly lectures are given on Saturday night on any old subject. That is the beginning and end of reformative practices in prison. Even the person sentenced to "Reformative Detention" experiences nothing different.

At the Wellington prison two years ago permission to give one concert during the year was refused because the warders "had too much to do."

Our prison medical service is exceedingly lax, too. One is accustomed to their perfect indifference (amounting almost to abuse) of the doctors. Just two years ago a prisoner from Paparua died as a result of neglect. I should hate to get appendicitis while in prison, for one would be almost dead before being taken to hospital.

Food is in plenty, though mostly starch. Breakfast—Porridge and dry hash and tea; dinner—meat, potatoes, and a vegetable and tea; tea—porridge! and cocoa. Twice a week stodgy duff is served. In addition, there is a weekly issue of 12 ozs. sugar, ½ lb. butter, ½ lb. syrup, 1½ lbs. bread per day, and ¼ pint milk per day.

Only too often the meals arrive in black corroded tins.

The sanitary conditions are primitive. Prisoners have no access to conveniences between 4.30 p.m. (4 p.m. winter) and 8 a.m., and 11.30 a.m. and 1 p.m. As in English prisons, one has to keep food, eat, sleep, wash and relieve oneself in the cell.

One cannot mention in letters prison conditions while one is actually in prison, so I am taking advantage of my temporary release (awaiting return to prison) to tell you about things. At any time I may be called for by the police, so am hurrying to write all the letters I can.

Numbers of us have clashed with the authorities and have experienced the "dummy." The usual sentence is three days bread and water. One has to sleep on the floor. In winter three blankets are graciously permitted!

It is against the regulations to lend books in prison. The authorities would rather the regulations be observed than that any development in a prisoner's social consciousness should take place. That in fact sums up the New Zealand prison system. The purpose is to develop the social consciousness by denying in every way possible the means of such development. How typical of a capitalist institution.

I shall now close. The Word is excellent. The Humanists puzzle me. You, who are an avowed atheist, and stress the fact so uncompromisingly, flirt with them. That means that a Humanist is not necessarily a deist.

With every good wish.

MICHAEL YOUNG.

Rolleston Detention Barracks, Canterbury, New Zealand, April 9, 1944.

Dear Guy Aldred,—In the last copy of "The Word" which I received, the Duke of Bedford wrote a brief review of "Paying for the War," by Wilfred Townend. I think you would be interested in the enclosed pamphlet on the cause of war by his brother, Sidney Townend, who is serving a second sentence of 3 months' imprisonment, after a period of 14 months in various detention camps.

My husband's original appeal against armed service on conscientious grounds (which I enclose) was dismissed, and he was subsequently committed to prison and detention. This second sentence of imprisonment was incurred as the result of his refusal to go on co-operating with the detention system when a request to have his appeal re-heard was for the second time refused.

We are deeply interested in your paper and are impressed with the high degree of unorthodox opinion you manage to get across. Such outspokenness is absolutely ruled out in this country, where we have the unhappy spectacle of a Labour Government going to the extremes of suppression and intolerance in its patriotic fervour. I hope to write to you soon at greater length on some aspects of life in New Zealand at the present time.

With all good wishes in the great struggle.

Yours sincerely,

MONICA G. TOWNEND.

Christchurch, New Zealand, April 13, 1944.

My husband was tried in the Magistrates' Court and sentenced to 3 months' hard labour. He went to Paparua, about 11 miles from here and for 4 Saturdays I had the joy of a ½-hour visit. Then a week last Thursday (May 11), I came home from work and found a letter from the Superintendent of the prison, saying: "Your husband, Sidney Townend, has been transferred to Hantu Prison. His address will be—." It was a knock-out blow. I felt stunned for quite a time.

A week passed before I heard from Sidney and then I got two letters together giving me some facts about his transfer and a description of his new quarters. The dreadful thing about his actual journey north was the grim suspicion with which he and Bruce McAlpine (the C.O. who went to Paparua with him) were regarded.

They had 2 escorts and were hustled on to the train and ferry—never given a chance to get a message to their families, and taken to Mount Crawford, the prison near Wellington where they picked up 11 more prisoners and proceeded on their way the following afternoon.

"But imagine our surprise," Sidney writes, "when out of the whole number, Bruce and I were shackled together" and they remained thus until reaching a place about midnight when they left the train and proceeded in open truck.

Over and above this, Sidney and Bruce had 2 escorts whereas only 2 were provided for the 11 other prisoners. Did you ever hear of such idiotic, disgraceful and barbaric treatment? Well yes—you did; they did worse things than this to C.O.s in the last war but I thought we'd advanced a little.

Bruce and Sidney were parted—but they are both in prison farms in the National Park area—away up in the centre of the north island in a most ungettatable spot.

Yesterday I wrote 8 letters of protest to various ministers, M.P.s and people but oh lord—its hopeless. These are the very ones who give the orders. Do you know—I can't even get a reply from the Minister of Justice. I have now written 3 letters to him requesting replies to specific questions and he hasn't the courtesy even to acknowledge them. And to whom else can I appeal?

Actually, apart from the rotten way in which they transferred Sidney, I am glad for some things that he has gone to Hantu. It is a much smaller place—only about 30 inmates I think, of whom about 20 are C.O.s, who have refused to co-operate with the detention system. I am told that there are some excellent fellows there and Sidney remarks on the good spirit amongst the men.

Another advantage is that they are in huts—not cells and are unlocked for ½-hour each evening.

At Paparua, Sidney was working absolutely alone — it was just solitary confinement — and I thought he was more depressed than I'd ever known him. The atmosphere too, at Paparua, lay like a ton of bricks upon me whenever I visited, and I hated the place.

I am thinking of how soon I'll manage a visit north. I'm afraid that Sidney will be up there now for the duration unless legislation is passed in the meanwhile for the release of C.O.s for productive work and I don't think there is a hope of that.

Even if I went to the north island to work I couldn't visit Sidney very often because Hantu is so utterly remote and I believe you have got to stay at the one and only hotel in the district—about 10 miles distant, when you do go—and then either walk or get a car if possible, to the prison. A jolly little spot!

Christchurch, May 22, 1944.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Thank you for the punctual forwarding of your excellent paper; it is always eagerly waited for. You are doing a good job in your nailing down the C.P. and you have assembled a very fine team of collaborators. Now, Bolshevism having officially gone bankrupt, I am sure the people would welcome other sincere and practical suggestions for a better world. The myth of 1917-18 is still being exploited, while things have changed diametrically, as shown most clearly and frankly in an article by Alexander Werth in the "New York Times Magazine" of 15/8/43, which you ought to read by all means.

Not without connection with all the foregoing, I have one thing particularly at heart, and that is the memory of "Pierre Ramus," otherwise Rudolf Grossmann. The second anniversary of his death falls in June. You did not even mention the fact in your paper! Were it not for the actual state of affairs in Europe, scores of papers, friends and foes, would have devoted some space to his memory. I think, if nothing else, you should pay a debt of honour to those who cannot speak there, by commemorating this man's powerful fighting and constructive personality. His wife, whom you know, I believe, could certainly help you in this respect. Do, please!

Best wishes.

Yours truly,

LINCOLN EFFORD'S APPEAL

In another column we publish a letter from our tireless New Zealand comrade, Lincoln D. W. Efford. We reproduce below text of the petition mentioned in his letter. Whilst approving of his courage in defending so fearlessly the cause of conscience and the victims of oppression, we make the general comment that it is time democracy dispensed with "humblys" and addressed itself in clear precise terms to its alleged representatives. Elected persons, especially "Socialist" careerists, like these phrases—we detest them.

Comrade Efford's petition was addressed to the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives of the Dominion of New Zealand in Parliament Assembled. It "Humbly Showeth, That":—

WHEREAS it is provided in the National Service Emergency Regulations, 1940, that those who "conscientiously object(s) to serving with the armed forces," i.e, who "hold(s) a genuine belief that it is wrong to engage in warfare in any circumstances," shall be exempt from such service; and,

WHEREAS in the opinion of persons who have had long and intimate knowledge of those concerned, many whose appeals have been dismissed, and who are now confined in prison or detention camp, are conscientious objectors within the meaning of the Regulations; and,

WHEREAS it appears that in many cases Armed Forces Appeal Boards have failed to give due weight to evidence of genuine conscientious objection tendered by, or on behalf of appellants; and,

WHEREAS in all good systems of law, in order to give greater security that justice be done, there are higher Courts to which an aggrieved person can appeal from the decision of a lower Court.

FURTHER, WHEREAS over 700 men are now confined in prison or detention camps in terms of an indeterminate sentence, i.e., "for the duration of the war;" and,

WHEREAS

(a) such indeterminate confinement is in itself repugnant to a good system of justice:

(b) the long-continued confinement — in the majority of cases now over two years, and in some much more than that—is having adverse effects on the mental and physical health of many of those confined:

(c) much of the work performed is of little real value to the community; is uneconomic and wasteful, and is carried out at great cost for supervision and control:

(d) it is a great direct and indirect loss to the community to have men, many of whom are skilled tradesmen or have professional or scientific qualifications, working in confinement in unskilled occupations for which they are not trained, particularly when there is such a great need for their services in their own occupations and professions:

(e) while the general spirit of the men when they entered prison or the camps was altruistic and social, the trivial and monotonous nature of the work, which allows little scope for the full use of talents and abilities or for the desire to be of real service to the community, and is carried out under restrictions of an irritating and humiliating kind, is leading to an increasing sense of resentment and frustration.

(f) the treatment of those claiming to be conscientious objectors to military service in this country compares unfavourably with the treatment in countries like Great Britain and Australia.

WE THEREORE PETITION YOUR HONOURABLE HOUSE that the National Service Emergency Regulations, 1940, and its Amendments be so amended as to bring these Regulations, in so far as they affect conscientious objectors, into line with the parallel British Regulations, and in particular to:

(a) set up an Appellate Tribunal with properly qualified personnel to re-hear the cases of those who wish to appeal from the decision of the Appeal Boards. This right of appeal to apply retrospectively:

(b) abolish the system of "indeterminate sentence," and limit the term of confinement that can be imposed:

(c) give the right of further appeal to the Appellate Tribunal on the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment or detention of three months or more, as in Britain:

(d) give those serving in the Armed Forces the right of appeal to the Appellate Tribunal for release on conscientious grounds. . .

The very terms of this petition expose how conscience is treated under a "Labour" Government headed by a Premier who was a "conchie" in the last war.

18B and CONSCIENCE

Sometime ago we received the following letter from our friend, Mr. John Wynn, who compiled the exposure It Might Have Happened to You.

Mr. Wynn wrote :—

June 30th, 1944.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—You forwarded me recently a very interesting letter with MANY enclosures from Mr. H. H. Beamish, who was M.P. for Hartley in 1939.

Apparently he was locked up in Southern Rhodesia under an equivalent regulation to 18b for 3 years; he is over 70. He is the brother of Beamish the M.P. for Lewes, Sussex, and his father was Admiral Beamish, C.B., who was A.D.C. to Queen Victoria.

My best wishes to you and The Duke in the fight for freedom.

Yours Sincerely,

JOHN WYNN.

A correspondent has sent us a copy of The Rhodesia Herald for July 21, 1943, containing the following interesting item :—

MR. H. H. BEAMISH RELEASED.
EX-M.P. WHO WAS INTERNED.

A reader of the "Rhodesia Herald" has sent the following for publication :—

"Mr. H. H. Beamish, who represented Hartley in Parliament prior to the 1939 general election, and who was arrested on June 10, 1940, by order of the late Minister of Justice, Mr. R. C. Tredgold, was released unconditionally on July 3.

"The Government have agreed to supply him with furnished accommodation, a maintenance allowance and have or will return to him all papers and documents confiscated from him when he was arrested.

"The total period of his internment was three years and 23 days, a total of 1,118 days, of which 215 days were spent in the Salisbury prison."

Official Statement.

The "Rhodesia Herald" showed the statement to the Department of Justice and received the following reply :—

"The statement above is substantially correct.

"The late Minister of Justice, Mr. R. C. Tredgold, offered to release Mr. Beamish in January, 1941, provided he undertook to reside on a particular farm and not to engage in subversive activities, but these terms Mr. Beamish refused to accept 'in view of the fact that numbers of friends of mine in England, Canada and elsewhere are still in prison and have been refused both parole and release.'

"Mr. Beamish's age and the subsequent progress of the war have influenced the Government to the view that his unconditional release is justified."

We honour Mr. Beamish for his refusal to consider conditional release whilst others were interned without charge or trial. His fearless attitude sternly defined the constitutional right of the citizen in time of crisis. If we are told that the citizen has no constitutional rights at such times, then we reply that civilisation has been reduced to chaos and that might has become right when right ought to be might.

In the June, 1944, debate on 18B in the House of Commons, Rear-Admiral T. P. M. Beamish rightly voted against 18B and the Government. We would like to think that he was moved in this matter by a regard for principle and not from mere affection for his brother. Family devotion is an excellent quality but it has no right to be substituted for public affection. 18B would be wrong even though Admiral Beamish's brother had not been interned in South Africa under its equivalent. We make this comment because, whilst we agree heartily with the Admiral's vote on this matter, we deplore his conduct in another issue of civil liberty, every whit as urgent and as important as 18B.

In a later issue we intend to deal with the case of George P. Elphick, F.O.R. Secretary at Lewes, who has been prosecuted ten times and imprisoned for refusing pit guard duties. Rear-Admiral Beamish is M.P. for Lewes and has received a large number of letters of protest. The repeated prosecution has been condemned by orthodox papers like The Church Times and The Christian World.

The Rev. Kenneth Rawlings, Rector of St. Michael's, Lewes, to his eternal credit, gave notice that as a protest against the Council's persistent attempt to coerce a man whose integrity of conscience was without question, he would from that date stop fire-watching, and would disobey any direction which the authorities might issue to him. The only condition on which he would continue would be if he were allowed to fill the vacancy to which George Elphick had been directed. He did not object to fire-watching as such, but had the strongest objection to tyranny, and could no longer allow this C.O. to stand alone in his resistance to it.

In his New Statesman article "The Present Position of Conscientious Objection", (reprinted as a pamphlet by the C.B.C.O.), Dr. C. E. M. Joad made scathing comment on the policy of the Lewes Council in George Elphick's case.

Dr. Joad was one of the members of a Daily Express Brains Trust which took place at Lewes on June 13. As Kenneth Rawlings and Clarence E. Tritton, district Advisory Bureau secretary, were giving out copies of Dr. Joad's pamphlet while the crowd was leaving, one good lady, Mrs. Wigmore, began in high-pitched tones a spirited tirade against conscientious objectors, receiving support from a section of the crowd, some of whom began to tear up their copies of the pamphlet.

Prior to this incident, Rear-Admiral Beamish had long telephone conversations with Nancy Browne, Secretary of the Central Board of Conscientious Objectors, and with Rev. Kenneth Rawlings, and had also met the latter and Joe Brayshaw at the House of Commons; all three were left with the impression that Admiral Beamish deplored the action of the Council. He insisted that the work he had already done for George Elphick had been grossly under-estimated.

The Sussex 'Express and County Herald of June 30, reported the Admiral as having sent the following letter to Mrs. Wigmore :—

"Dear Mrs. Wigmore,—I understand that you made a great stand and courageous protest on the subject of the pamphlet issued by the Central Board of Conscientious Objectors. I think the pamphlet was one that was written by Professor Joad. May I congratulate you on your courage? Yours sincerely, T. P. H. Beamish."

The Admiral should have reflected that those who defended his brother and other 18B victims have been subject to hysterical denunciations from the Mrs. Wigmores of this world.

The Sussex Express commented :—

"It is to be hoped that the Admiral will carry the matter still further."

Yes : the Admiral should enquire what stand the Sussex Express has taken on the imprisonment and detention without trial of 18B victims.

In an article in The Brighton Gazette of June 20, the Admiral had made a number of comments adverse to both Elphick and the C.B.C.O.

We do not share the views entertained by most of the 18B victims, but we do share the fundamental opposition to war that dictates the outlook and conduct of most conscientious objectors. Nevertheless, we are opposed to all so-called Socialist and Pacifists who defend, or will not question, the 18B internments. We are no less opposed to Admirals who live in glass-houses : who believe that 18B internment is wrong, but pander to hysterical hooliganism, and attack conscientious objectors. Suffering should educate even admirals.

ALBERTO PACITTI

In this issue we are unable to discuss the very full 18B debate that took place in the House of Commons on Friday, June 16. Pending our summary, we would refer the reader to the official Parliamentary Report which should be obtained and studied by every believer in civil liberty. The recent release of the former Glasgow Secretary of the Partita National Fascisti compels us to return to the cases of Alberto Pacitti and his friend, Gino Bertolini.

The Duke of Bedford called attention to the internment of these young men and the fate of their fathers in his famous House of Lords speech. We have pleaded for their release in these columns and we repeat our plea. The Pacitti and Bertolini families are well known in Glasgow, and they are known to be thoroughly decent citizens and neighbours.

In November 1942 Mrs. Pacitti asked a Glasgow Labour M.P. to take up the case of her son. He put the facts before the Home Secretary, who has investigated the cases of both Alberto Pacitti and Gino Bertolini since then, and each time regretted his inability to reconsider his decision. We ask that the decision be reconsidered now.

Mrs. Pacitti's letter makes good reading today and we reproduce it accordingly, only omitting, at his request, the name of the Labour M.P.—for he is scared of the party machine and must not voice freely his true sentiments—to whom it was addressed :—

23rd November, 1942.

Dear Mr. ——

My son, Alberto Pacitti (Bertie), 28 years of age, who is at present detained in Camp "M," Peel, Isle of Man, was educated at St. Mungo's Academy, Glasgow, and later graduated with honours in June, 1938.

He was on holiday in Ireland a short time before Italy entered this war, when he was approached by a Mr. Romanno, Hairdresser, Gallowgate, Glasgow, to become Secretary of the local Partita Nathional Facsisti, in place of a Mr. Tronchetti.

My son's sole recreation was, and still is, gymnastics and football. His employment as teacher and gym. instructor at St. John's (De La Sal) Reform School, Springbolg, Shettleston, very often kept him on duty until 8 p.m. He felt that he had not the time to devote to the duties of a Secretary's post, and he had no interest in politics. He very reluctantly agreed and was made a member of the party when he took up the post.

My son was popular as an amateur footballer and played for many teams, including St. Mungo's Academy, St. Roches, University, Jordanhill and Glasgow Shopkeepers. But he had no real interest in politics.

At his Advisory Committee hearing at London in 1940, letters of recommendation for release, were sent by Drs. Scanlon and Rosemary, Monseigneur Daly (Glasgow Cathedral) and the Headmaster at St. John's (Bro. Michael).

My son was very much attached to his father, who perished on the "Arandora Star," and he abhors war for that reason.

I have had a bitter struggle to keep this shop open and pay my rates. Actually I need his help in the financial struggle, for the shop does not pay itself and his wages would help greatly.

I have two girls and a boy still at school, and my own father has to be looked after.

I wish to express my heartfelt gratitude for your promise to place our case before the Home Secretary for his early consideration.

Yours very gratefully,
(Mrs.) G. PACITTI.

Tronchetti was a most active and militant Fascist. He is released. In Alberto Pacitti's case the association, as stated before in these columns, was one of language association and good-natured helpfulness. Socialists and Anarchists who are customers at the Pacitti shop know quite well that more fair-minded, more helpful, or better-natured citizens and neighbours exist nowhere in Glasgow. To view these people as Fascist enemies of democracy is absurd. We ask the Labour movement to investigate and to press for the unconditional release of these young men.

FOUNDATIONS OF PEACE

By Sidney Townend, B.Sc., Ph.D.

Portrait taken in Leeds, July, 1932. The scholar expecting to conquer the world. To-day, a prisoner for conscience in New Zealand. See letters, pages 15 and 16 and story, page 20.

Causes of War

Before discussing any foundations of peace, it is absolutely imperative that some agreement is reached as to the principal causes of war. This is emphasised because there is stilll a not inconsiderable number of people who, through their religious institutions and peace societies and as individuals, speak and act as if the war was the result or reflection of ill-will and hatred felt by the people of one country against those of another. I am convinced that such a contention is wrong; based on my own experiences, I believe that most of the people of the nations involved in this war are decent, honest human beings despite the conditions under which they live. I say "despite" because as a result of the present systems under which man live, his good motives are frequently thwarted, his initiative and originality are dulled while his less noble attainments are applauded and often materially recognised. This state of affairs applies to the democratic countries as well as those under dictatorship rule.

I do not try to fool myself into believing that most men are saints—the weaknesses of human nature are very real—but I do believe that the aggregate of human weaknesses and vices cannot possibly be related to the inhuman iniquities inflicted on whole societies through the failure of economic systems to deliver goods and service. Very few individuals could be found sufficiently wicked to desire the destruction of food while people suffered semi-starvation and yet during the pre-war years in England and in the United States and other democratic countries such destruction was carried out on an incredible scale while millions of people suffered from malnutrition. Surely no man could accuse the Scottish trawler owner who threw half of his catch back into the sea or the English or American farmer who ploughed part of his crop back into the land or the orchardist who allowed good fruit to rot on his trees of individual intent to inflict suffering on the people who were in need of the food. These men hated destroying thir catches and their crops but under the present economic system there was no alternative if they wished to live and keep their trawlers, their farms and their orchards.

Similarly it is impossible to associate the horror and bestiality of modern war with the character either of the men in the fighting services or of the war effort. In this war although Germans are inflicting death and suffering on the British people and their allies and vice versa, before the war, there could not possibly have been any real hate between the peoples concerned. The majority of people on one side had no personal knowledge of those on the other and the comparative few of our people who had made acquaintance with the people now regarded as enemies had found friendliness and hospitality. War of to-day is definitely not the upshot of enmity and hatred seething in the hearts of the people of one country against those in another. On the contrary as a result of the slaughter and misery inflcted, war ferments ill-will and bitterness which it takes years of peace to eradicate. If then this is true—and thousands in every country can vouch for it—the sooner this fact is recognised by the religious institutions, the peace societies and by individuals and at least some attention given to the fundamental causes, the sooner will a lasting peace be realised.

It is the desire of many people to lay the full responsibility for this war on Hitler but even the London Times has to recognise that

> Beyond doubt one of the fundamental causes of this war has been the unrelaxing efforts of Germany. . . . to secure wide enough foreign markets to straighten her finances at the very time when all her competitors were forced to adopt exactly the same course. Continuous friction was inevitable.

It must be realised that "Hitlerism is an effect, not a cause" and that the cause has its roots in an archaic debt-ridden monetary system which is still operated in most, if not all, the leading countries of the world. Through this system it is impossible for a sufficiency of purchasing power to be distributed to the consuming public without incurring debt and there is an abundance of evidto show that in an age of plenty the resulting poverty within a country is closely related to the conditions which lead to war abroad.

No country can under the present monetary system consume that which it produces (or the equivalent amount) regardless of the standard of living of its people without mortgaging the future at an ever increasing rate. As a result there has been that inevitable growing desire for overseas markets so that an outlet might be found for the goods—not necessarily surplus—but for which no purchasing power was available. (When goods can be got rid of in this way, more can be made and thus more purchasing power can be distributed to the people, enabling them to buy a portion of what they have produced or its equivalent in other products.) The desire has never been to import the same quantity as that exported. Under such a system of international trading, through the activities of powerful financial groups and diplomats, nations are continually being grouped to serve vested interests and economic wars are being fought. It can never be argued that such conditions are conducive to a lasting world peace.

When the outlet of overseas markets for the unpurchasable goods fails, they are either destroyed or production is restricted or diverted into the greatest of all man-made consumers, the war machine. The preparation for war and its prosecution are the most effective and yet the most terrible of all palliatives which mask the inability of the monetary system to distribute a sufficiency of purchasing power. Arsenals and war projects are started up in depressed areas and the people enjoy (as long as food is available) a square meal again and are quieted. These palliatives—the destruction and restriction of goods and the equipping of the war machine—are accompanied by the piling up of mammoth debts to financial institutions. All the large democratic countries were even before the war struggling under irrepayable debts, the bulk of the indebtedness being to privately controlled financial institutions. The controllers of these institutions are in no way representatives of the people nor have they at heart the interests of any individual countries. They are international in a sinister sense and through the power they wield they control the lifelood of nations; they have the power to decide on the degree of activity of any particular industry and even to dictate the policies of supposedly democratic governments. These international financiers have made a mockery of democracy and have proved themselves to be silent dictators of the most serious type. To suit their own interests, by means of selfish control of news services, they have manufactured at will synthetic enmity or friendship between the peoples of different countries. There is ample documentary evidence to validate these strong indictments should they be questioned.

No person who is prepared to face facts can deny that this privately controlled debt-ridden monetary system lies at the root of the cause of economic rivalry between nations and of war itself. The same monetary system which has been responsible for the bread queues in the United States while her grain silos were full, for the fourteen million people suffering from malnutrition in England in 1936 when there was no real shortage of good and for the depression in this country less than ten years ago, was also responsible for the serious economic depression in Germany which threw her people into the hands of a dictator who promised them a sufficiency of the necessities for healthy physical life. In the cause of Hitler's rise to power lies the root cause of war and whether the man and all his colleagues and confederates are beaten, if this cause is not eradicated, world peace will be little nearer.

A Sane Monetary System.

It is more urgent than ever that people are aware of the essentials of a sane monetary system, the reason being that changes in the present system are almost certain either at the end of the war or even before. The very fact that within a short period of time almost every one has come to realise that there is something radically wrong with the money machine and now takes it for granted that it will certainly not survive this war, gives grounds for concern. This idea has received wide publicity of recent months and is even being propagated by organs which have previously been wedded to "Sound Finance." Articles have appeared in the London Times drawing attention to the necessity for a change in the monetary system—a little alarming in view of the fact that Montague Norman is one of the controllers of this paper's policy.

The ideas of Federal Union which emanate from the United States and which are undoubtedly viewed sympathetically by High Finance include so-called monetary reform. The ultimate aim here, however, is that eventually there will be a return to the gold standard. In view of such signs it is evident that one of the imminent dangers is the introduction of superficial modifications to the existing monetary system which will leave the fundamental flaw still unchanged and the same private control—possibly in different guise—still in power, the people having meanwhile been led to believe that the necessary monetary reform has been accomplished. Should such a change take place, certain moratoriums might be allowed, certain debts scaled down and other alleviations introduced, but if the fundamental flaw is not correctel, a repetition of the old order with its production restrictions, trade rivalries and wars can undoubtedly be expected.

During the past twenty years many books have been written on the subject of a sane monetary system. These—by C. H. Douglas, C. Marshall Hattersley, and Maurice Colbourne—can be referred to by the reader desirous of detailed information. In this leaflet only a few fundamentals can be touched upon. They are nevertheless such essential requirements that any new proposed system must be able to withstand the searchlight of their examination.

In a sane monetary system money must be the servant of man; it must always be related to real wealth and must facilitate both production and consumption. For these desired conditions to be established and safeguarded it follows that private monopolistic control of money must end in view of the evil effects which in the past have resulted from such control. Therefore the first essential requisite is that the control of a nation's money—that is its financial credit—must be in the hands of servants of the people. This control would preside solely over a department concerned with national bookkeeping and accountancy and would be in no way influenced by party politics.

Secondly the quantity of money to be put into circulation during a given period of time would be scientifically estimated, such an amount being based on a statistical knowledge of the consumable goods likely to be available. The amount would not be conditioned by the number of people in employment as at present nor would it be related to a metal stowed away in a vault. If the goods and services were available and awaiting consumption and use, then the necessary quantity of money tickets would be distributed regardless of whether all the employable population could find work. In other words, ways and means would be found to finance consumption and without piling up debt. The money over and above wages, salaries and dividends, which in any given period of time was found necessary to fill the gap between consumption power and production, would be distributed in the most equitable way to every citizen. If this adjustment were made it would be possible for the first time to appreciate fully the significance of this power age and each new labour-saving device would be truly welcomed according to its intrinsic worth to man. What is physically possible would then also prove financially possible.

The monetary system would be made self-liquidating so that after money had passed through its cycle and was cancelled no train of debt would be left behind. The system would then reflect the true fact that the real and only cost of production is consumption. The passing on of colossal public debts for future generations to reckon with violates and is abhorrent to the axiom that "The Earth belongs to the Living!" What men do in any particular generation is their responsibility and not that of future generations. The heritage which man receives might be passed on to the next generation richer and finer or it might even be impaired, but whatever its state, it must be handed on.

To facilitate the introduction and smooth working of this sane monetary system, a mechanism would be set up to stabilise the general level of prices in order to prevent any attempts at price soaring which might be made by misguided interests determined to prove the system unworkable. The present war period affords plenty of examples of the practicability of the operation of this type of mechanism.

Foundations of Peace.

For the establishment of a lasting and unenforced international peace, it is essential that there is peace within the individual countries and surely this can only be attained when the individuals in those countries are at peace. Worthwhile peace proposals must therefore be founded upon the recognition of the individual's right to happiness and upon the determined resolve to make it a potential reality. The new world order must be so fashioned that individual freedom is experienced to its fullest possible extent and so that economic security is determined solely by the richness of nature's resources and man's skill and inventive genius to use them. Once these conditions are attained, it will be possible to give adequate consideration to the requirements of the people in the few countries where there is an actual shortage of goods and services in view of the superabundance in the world as a whole.

To sum up—in the democratic countries of the western civilisation since the last war, a faulty monetary system has been indisputably responsible for witholding from the people one of the greatest essentials for happiness—economic security. Under the reformed system no production will be restricted, no goods will be destroyed which are justifiably desired by the people and the future piling up of public debts will cease. When money is made the measure and not the measurer of real wealth, that is, when people can buy that which they produce or equivalent quantities, trading between nations will resolve itself into a fair interchange of surplus goods and services. Each country will aim at a true balance of trade in which exports equal imports. An excess of exports over imports will no longer be regarded as a favourable balance of trade, but will prove for that particular period to be economically a direct loss to the people and can only be considered an act of generosity. With such an economic relationship between countries the air will be cleared considerably for the settling of the vexing and conflicting problems of to-day concerning empires, colonies and overseas possessions, especially when it is remembered that the modern world so far is not troubled with any scarcity problem. Previous to the war, no country had difficulty in getting the required imports; the problem was always one of finding a market for exports.

When the sovereign right of the people to create and control their own money is excerised, the international financiers and the satellite financial and industrial interests will lose much of their power. This will mean an immediate lessening of international intrigue as a result of which the reactions between countries will reflect more truly the feelings of the people concerned. It is of course realised that other important problems such as the private manufacture of armaments for profit, must eventually be tackled. There is much evidence of how armament rings have deliberately exploited grievances between nations and even precipitated wars. Yet even in the light of such menaces it is still felt that the root cause of war and of the grievances exploited lies in the faulty monetary system.

For these reasons it is therefore imperative that whenever peace proposals are formulated, they must—if they are to be at all practicable—be founded on a sound national economy.

It is the urgent duty of every nation genuinely desiring peace—and inherently the people of every nation long for peace—to rid itself of its privately controlled, debt-ridden monetary system and to restore to itself its sovereign right of the control of its credit and currency. It might be argued that New Zealand now controls its own money machine and that since the outbreak of war Great Britain is also temporarily exercising that power, but in both cases the laws of "Sound Finance" as devised by the financier are being adhered to and irrepayable debts, which will act as burdens on future generations, are being piled up at an accelerated rate to the banking institutions. If freedom is ever to triumph and peace is to reign this debt stranglehold must be broken.

The question as to how this reform is to be achieved, comes down—in the final analysis—to the individual. Every person has the duty and privilege of citizenship and the amount of attention which must be given to affairs of the State should surely be determined by its condition. The chaotic and tormented state of society at this time demands of us an unprecedented effort to play our part in bringing about happier conditions. This applies to all people whether they are of the professional or artisan class. Full recognition should be given to the importance of the spiritual development of man but at the same time it must be emphasised that man cannot be parcelled up into spiritual and physical entities, each part being catered for separately. The religionists, preacher and worshipper alike, must face these vital practical problems on which all progress of civilisation ultimately depends.

The urgent necessity of to-day is for the enlightenment of man as to the cause of poverty and war. For many years a victim of propaganda in its multifarious forms, he has become befogged and duped. Once he sees clearly through the false beliefs and artificial conventions of the present system to the true and real things of life, he will—even in his present imperfect state—become aware of his individual responsibility and in that awareness, will act.

THE CHURCH AND BOMBING.

Several words were omitted in setting from the Duke of Bedford's article on "The Church and Bombing," in our August issue, page 12, column 2, 2nd paragraph. The passage should have read:—

Even assuming, however, that an arguable case exists for those who consider that the opinion of the Government experts IS TRUSTWORTHY AND THAT WHOLESALE BOMBING WOULD, ON BALANCE, CAUSE LESS SUFFERING BY SHORTENING THE WAR, THE ASSEMBLY SHOWED A DEVASTATING LACK OF JUDGMENT in assuming that no other alternatives existed except the continuation of the war with wholesale bombing and continuation with bombing restricted to military objectives.

The words in black caps were omitted. We regret this error, which made nonsense of a sound argument.

DEFAULTERS AND "CONCHIES."

In view of possible confusion in the minds of the public in regard to conscientious objectors and defaulters, the N.Z.R.S.A. Dominion executive committee decided last evening to issue the following statement:—

Persons whose appeals against military service on grounds of religious belief have been upheld by the appeal boards are not regarded by the N.Z.R.S.A. as defaulters. Any man whose appeal has been dismissed by the appeal board and then refuses to perform the military service or such alternative service ordered by the tribunal becomes a defaulter.—"Wellington Evening Post," New Zealand, 19th April, 1944.

The above definition explains the cases mentioned in our New Zealand correspondence this month.

NEW ZEALAND WAR RESISTER

SHARES THE VIEWS OF THE DUKE OF BEDFORD

Sidney Townend's Stand

In this issue, we publish an essay on the Foundations of Peace, written from the Social Credit viewpoint, by a New Zealand war resister, named Sidney Townend. We also publish in part, two letters from his wife, Monica Townend, describing his stand and experiences as a conscientious objector.

Sidney Townend was born in Leeds on September 20, 1906. He was educated at Blenheim School, Leeds; Woodhouse Technical School, Leeds; Leeds College of Technology; and Leeds University. He graduated B.Sc. (Honours, Engineering), at the University in 1932. Did textile research for the Wool Industries Research Association, Torridor, Leeds, 1932-5. Was awarded the Blair Fellowship for one year's research in some foreign country, and conducted research in U.S.A. and Germany, 1935-6. On his return to Leeds, resumed his research work at Torridor and wrote a thesis, for which he was awarded the Ph.D. degree, Leeds University, 1937. Appointed Textile Research Officer to the New Zealand Government, he went to New Zealand in August, 1938. And so, to-day, he finds himself, not an official of the New Zealand Government, but a prisoner—condemned because he would serve his fellows with his knowledge and research but is not prepared to murder them.

Two years to the month before going to New Zealand—in August, 1936—Sidney Townend married Grace Monica Dean, B.A. Both were members of the Social Credit Party in Britain and both are members of the same party in New Zealand. Before uniforms were banned in 1936, both wore the greenshirt of the Social Credit Party.

Monica Townend never expected to be the wife of a much abused prisoner when she went to New Zealand. She has given broadcast talks to women in New Zealand and has written several articles for the woman's page of the Auckland Mirror.

The background of both is somewhat orthodox. So orthodox that we would not have expected to call either comrade. Their stand against war is firm, however; and this pacifist steadfastness creates a bond of union.

In his first statement of appeal, made on October 10, 1942, Sidney Townend averred :—

The principal relevant beliefs which I hold and on which I base this Appeal are:—

1. That the root cause of war is economic rivalry between nations and that this rivalry is inevitable under the existing financial system.

2. That ends never justify means but rather means determine the ends.

3. That thought and action prompted by truth can never damage a legitimate cause; it must strengthen it.

The first mentioned belief on the root cause of war is in contra-distinction to the idea which many are led to accept that war is the result of ill-will and bitterness between peoples. The converse is the truth; war itself generates hatred and bitterness.

The stand that I am taking against war is a logical development of holding this belief as to the root cause, which I have helped to propagate for 10 years. . .

In the normal operation of what has proved to be a faulty monetary system, a shortage of purchasing power in the hands of the people is inevitable. Because of the ineffectiveness of the home market to buy the goods and services available, there has been a continuous scramble for foreign markets and favourable trade balances—though favourable to one must be unfavourable to another. This economic rivalry must lead to friction between nations. ...

That the home market has been ineffective has accounted for the anachronism of acute poverty and enforced idleness in an age of plenty. Out of these depressed conditions dictators have arisen. Palliatives used to prop up the faulty system include public works schemes, re-armament programmes and war and have always been at the expense of rising debts to financial institutions controlled by a group of international financiers. The interests of these individuals are not those of the people of their respective countries. They have tremendous power over governments and control directly or indirectly every powerful means of propaganda.

I maintain that any practicable solution if international trade rivalry is to be avoided, must be based on the restoration to countries of the sovereign right to create their own credit on the introduction of a sane monetary and economic system. There is still not the slightest indication that any government of the United Nations contemplates taking these essential first steps without which all talk of lasting peace after this war, is empty and futile.

The second belief which I stated, namely that ends cannot justify means may even be more poignantly expressed by saying that out of wrong actions we cannot expect to achieve right. Killing, or inflicting suffering on a person against whom you know no personal wrong, must impair the objective no matter how much it might otherwise be justified. Many are prepared to support the bombing of an arsenal even if it means killing workers employed in it. Few, however, can honestly support the killing of the wife and children of a worker in that arsenal and yet because they live in close proximity to the factory, this must frequently happen.

As science gives ever-increasing aid to war, the lethal weapons become increasingly deadly and less discriminating; killing and maiming is done at more and more remote distances. A young lad in his early 20's in a hideous high-powered bomber operates a lever releasing a stick of bombs; he sees a pyrotechnic display and returns to his base to report that he got his target. He never sees the mangled bodies of the men, women and children whom he probably has murdered and everything is done to deaden his imagination so that he might not even see it in his mind's eye. As modern war develops such crime which I personally cannot possibly justify, must unavoidably increase. For this reason alone, worthwhile results — so ardently hoped for—become impossible. As a result of these acts and of the insidious propaganda let loose in war, more and more bitterness is roused and man's mind is ever coarsened. Rather than progressing towards peace, freedom and happiness, we are slowly reverting to barbarism. Because of the foregoing facts, I have been driven to the conviction that only the stand of non-violent resistance is capable of redeeming the dignity of man.

The 3rd belief that thought and action inspired by truth can never damage a legitimate cause is the impelling force behind my present stand and conduct.

I have stated publicly that I share the same views relating to war as Mahatma Gandhi, the Cardinal Archbishop of Ireland, the Duke of Bedford, and Dr. Alfred Salter, all of whom are pleading for a negotiated peace at the earliest possible moment. Many will argue that at this stage, propagating for peace will damage the Empire's cause. Since I believe that truth is always opportune, I am convinced that such action must be in the interests of the great mass of the people.

I now wish to give a few more personal details in support of my appeal.

In 1932, I was introduced to Social Credit and slowly realised how peace between nations and economic security and freedom of the people were inter-related and that their fruition was prevented by a faulty money system . . . Since 1933 I have been a member of various Social Credit Movements. In England I have paraded in the streets with posters, sold and distributed Social Credit literature and addressed indoor and outdoor meetings for this cause. In 1935 I felt compelled to resign from the church which I served for many years, as it, together with those of most other denominations, failed to shoulder its responsibilities on these matters. I attended numerous peace meetings, including the War Resisters' International Conference in Denmark in 1937 . . . I have tramped on the Continent on 3 occasions with International Youth Movements and have travelled in several countries in connection with my studies and work. My attitude towards war is formed on this background of experience.

Since coming to this country in 1938, I have continued to work for the removal of the root cause of war. I have protested against the war to the Prime Minister and every M.P. . . .

While now not a member of any religious body this appeal is made with my whole physical, mental and spiritual being. It is truly religious in the deepest sense and I assert that in taking this stand, it is in a deep and sincere desire to serve society to the best of my ability.

In view of my complete sincerity I cannot help but feel that it is this court of law which is being tried before the principles embodied in this statement.

Before the magistrates at Christchurch in April, 1944, Sidney Townend gave the reasons for the attitude of non-co-operation, adopted by him at Balmoral Detention Camp, on April 10 last.

Comrade Townend told the Court:

REASONS FOR NON CO-OPERATION.

The stand of non co-operation which I have taken is I feel the only method left available by which I can protest against a decision made against me by an Appeal Board in October, 1942. This was to the effect that my refusal to serve in the Armed Forces was not accepted as being based on conscientious objection. In the eyes of the law I was and still am regarded as a liar—to put it quite bluntly. The stand I have taken against war I can but reaffirm is truly a sincere one.

If this separation from my wife and segregation from society to which I am subjected was because I would not fight, then I should have to oppose the law itself and not the administration of it. The subsequent sentences passed against me are, however, based on the Board's decision that I was considered as not being true to my conscience. I have continually rebelled against this decision, and while in prison a year ago, I restated my case in a letter to the Minister of Justice and applied for a re-hearing of my appeal. I was notified that it was considered I had not supplied any new and material evidence which would justify a re-hearing. In February of this year, I again made application for my case to be re-heard and this time submitted evidence regarding my character and the principles I held, from certain gentlemen with whom I have been associated since coming to this country in 1938. The only reward for this effort was a memorandum note from the Controller of Detention to the Balmoral Camp Supervisor stating that the evidence which had been submitted was not considered to "constitute new and material evidence," and therefore a re-hearing could not be granted. I believe that the most ardent criminal could rightfully expect more personal consideration from the Minister's Department.

I could protest strongly against the detention system with its appalling waste of manpower, mentally and physically; against the unjust indeterminate sentences and against the iniquitous conscription system, but I feel that I must restrict this stand I have taken to a protest against the invalid judgment passed against me . . .

I have not arrived at the decision to non co-operate without giving it much thought and for over a year I have obeyed the letter of the law in prison and camp as I think my records will show. But for a long time now I have been convinced that to go on obeying the laws which are at present dictating how I must exist, is both servile and compromising. There is no virtue in accepting conditions when those conditions can only be imposed on men whose consciences have been judged insincere. I therefore resolved to make the only gesture which it was left to me to make—that is to cease co-operating with the detention system as token of my revolt against the original sentence passed on me.

I repeat—I am true to my conscience in the stand I have taken against war and I shall continue to press for the repeal of the indictment made against me. In making this protest I feel that I am contributing to the defence of the principles of justice and honest government, the preservation of which must be the desire of all freedom-loving people.

UNITED STATES NEWS-LETTER

Dear Friend and Comrade,—I wish to tell you how pleased Mrs. Floyd and I were to see the two pages in the April "Word" regarding William Floyd and his last book. It was a fine account and review. I also wish to thank you for your kind mention of me, but wish the printer had spelled my first name Sherman instead of Therman.

I call "The Word" the "Arbitrator of Britain," and you the William Floyd. Also in a review of your "Richard Carlile," published in "The Arbitrator," I called you the modern Carlile. I have long been interested in Carlile, but it took your pamphlets really to make me admire him. I have also long admired Robert Taylor, and bought copies of his three books back in 1918-1919 when I was in Washington, D.C., during the last war. What have interested me most in "The Word" are the references to the Rev. Adlard and the series on South Place. I knew of Adlard when he was in this country, and have a notion that I may have met him, as I know many Unitarian ministers and used to meet many casually. I am a great admirer of Moncure D. Conway and published a tribute to him in "The Truth Seeker" in 1926. When in London in 1932 my wife and I attended a meeting at South Place. We knew Conway's daughter, Mrs. Sawyer.

I am so interested and pleased that you are anxious to come to the U.S.A. to visit the intellectual shrines. I, too, admire Theodore Parker and Lucretia Mott, and I included them in my "Humanist Calendar" in "The Arbitrator." My wife is a Parker descendant and I a Coffin. Lucretia Mott was born a Coffin.

Another of my heroes was Abraham Lincoln. It may interest you to know that I am a native of Bloomington, Illinois, in the heart of the Lincoln country, and my grandfather, Wakefield, was one of his friends. Lincoln's close association with Bloomington was neglected by his biographers until I published a book, "How Lincoln Became President," in 1936.

I have also written articles disproving Lincoln's authorship of the famous letter of condolence to Mrs. Bixby of Boston.

Altho I was born in Illinois and my grandparents were pioneers in that State, I am of pure New England ancestry, beginning with the "Mayflower" in 1620.

Among "sacred groves" in this country I have visited are sites in Bloomington, Ill., where Lincoln made his first great speeches and where he became a Republican and most important founder of the party. Phoenix Hall, where Lincoln spoke many times, was built and owned by my grandfather. I have visited the places in New York and New Rochelle where Thomas Paine lived. In New York and Peoria, Illinois, I have visited the sites of Robert G. Ingersoll's homes. I have visited the homes of the great around Concord, Mass. But, unfortunately, the great New England renaissance is a thing of the past. Elizabeth Cody Stanton is even more of a "hero" than Lucretia Mott, and I had the honour of knowing very well her wonderful daughter, Harriet Stanton Blatch. Her granddaughter, Nora Stanton Barney, our good friend, is holding high the torch handed down to her.

I, too, have "sacred groves" in England where Paine dwelt and first thought on the rights of man, Carlile struggled and Taylor turned Deistic preacher. When in London in 1932 my wife and I had an unforgettable evening with F. J. Gould and memorable visits with J. M. Robertson and Joseph M'Cabe. As the granddaughter of Robert G. Ingersoll, my wife belongs in the main Humanist tradition and has the same "heroes" that I have.

I am now reading an interesting book by Fred Gladstone Bratton called "The Legacy of the Liberal Spirit" (N.Y., 1943). It takes up many of our heroes, but is written from the non-Humanist Unitarian point of view and sometimes (I think) gets off the main Humanist line. I am making a study of the Humanist tradition and hope sometime to get something into print. I miss not having "The Arbitrator," and wish some "angel" would finance a similar paper here. The loss of William Floyd is irreplacable.

I greatly appreciate the work you are doing. —Fraternally yours,

SHERMAN D. WAKEFEILD.

New York, 10, June 15, 1944.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—I notice that the "Word" is being sold in this city. I would like to see the sales and circulation organised here from one centre. That would mean building up the United Socialist Movement in this city. Please think of this.

I received to-day an interesting and arresting manuscript from Dr. George Hartman titled "Challenge to Socialist Pacifists." May be this essay could be published in your columns as a contribution to the thought and study of the United Socialist Movement of Britain and the United States.

I have shown the Duke of Bedford's pamphlets to several people. I believe that you will receive several orders for them in consequence.

The people of the United States will be more interested in "The Word" if they read in its columns items about events and people in the United States. Letters from the United States could discuss Socialism in relation to the Presidential Election or the activities of the Communist Party.

I attach examples:

SOCIALISM AND THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

The year of 1944 will be a great year in the life of the United States. The people of the United States feel that their votes this year are important. It is a year of destinies.

Anti-Parilamentarian Socialists are few in this country. The time of election is the time of spread of the Socialist message. It is time when people go to meeting halls to get the Socialist message.

So the Socialist Party who had for many years a declining vote, is hoping to-day to regain the vote of Debs. What program will be presented to working people of the United States will be decided in a Convention at the city of Reading. The city has a Socialist Mayor. It is obvious that Norman Thomas will be the Presidential Candidate.

There is another Socialist Party that will, too, wage a campaign for Socialism, this is the Socialist Labour Party. Minority Parties who have not the means of propaganda displayed by the Political Parties of the Capitalist, have to suffer the consequence of not being able to reach the larger mass of the public opinion. The election laws are very disfavourable to minority parties.

The Socialist Movement is a world Movement. Socialists in the United States feel that success in their campaign ought to be a message of courage and inspiration to all working men and women throughout the world. Therefore they look for support and understanding from the Socialists of Britain. They want criticism, but criticism that develops their movement, clarifies their policy, and raises their propaganda activity to a world discussion.

"COMMUNIST" SUICIDE.

Suicide with music. We have here in the United States a strange tribe called Communists. Once upon a time they left the Socialist Party of the United States because the Socialists were not aggressive enough in fighting Capitalism. With cheering mobs, and bands of music they advertised the Socialist as not loyal to the working class. All the mean means of assassination, blackmail and outright treachery were used to destroy the Socialist Movement under the guise of being more revolutionary than the Socialists.

Now at great meetings in every large city of the United States with bands of music and hoorays they announce that they will not exist any more as a Communist Party. They find Capitalism good for the United States. Revolution is not needed any more. More than that The Capitalists of the United States have to be protected.

No tears will be shed over the "Communists'" grave. Not more than those that will be shed over Hitler's grave. The sooner the better. And we can hope that such ugly movements will not rise again to plague mankind.

If the science of psychiatry is to gain more importance in solving human problems, it will gain, if it can give any explanation of how human beings in a free country can cheer their own death.

I look to your co-operation in giving notes and news, criticisms and comments, from every angle, on the movement in the United States.

Greetings to all the comrades.

Fraternally,

DAVID BERKINGOFF.

Bronx, N.Y., 19 4/44.

THE COMMUNITY CHURCH Of New York

Dear Mr. Berkingoff,—I rejoice to hear from you, and to know you as one who knew our late friend, William Floyd. My friendship with him was a very close and intimate one, and extended back for more than thirty years. It comforts me to read this tribute to him in "The Word," and I feel very happy that this paper republished my tribute as spoken at the funeral. It is indeed a part of the mystery of life, isn't it, that this paper in far-away Scotland should pay this handsome tribute to this modest and self-forgetting man here in New York.

With highest regards, I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES (Minister).

10 Park Avenue, May 15, 1944.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Thank you so much for the pamphlets and for the copies of "The Word." I find them all very interesting and think you are doing fine work. I am not a conscientious objector and my husband is a corporal in the army, but I would do anything to further people's right to object to military service if they cannot conscientiously do so. The thing that fascinates me so much about "The Word" is its direct and obvious descent from Carlile's journalism.

Do you by any chance know whom Robert Taylor married? I tried vainly to find out.

Thank you so much for the pleasure your correspondence and writings have given me. There are too few people of courage in the world, and I like being in correspondence with one of them.

I had a letter to-day from Dr. Ruth Borchardt at London University asking me for information about Carlile. I do not have it, but I am going to do my best to find it for her. If only I could find where Theophila Carlile settled in this country.

I am glad you like Thoreau. I think "Civil Disobedience" is one of the greatest political essays ever written. I read it to my classes this year, and was surprised to discover that they were quite impressed by it. The New England group were wonderful, weren't they? They were fired with a spirit that we seem to have lost to-day, and to the spirit they added excellent powers of expression. I have a relatively low opinion of current college scholarship. It lacks what the New England front possessed so abundantly.

I am going to send you a reprint of an article of my husband's and mine on William Vaughn Moody's poem, "An Ode in Time of Hesitation." It is an anti-imperialist poem, written at the time of our aggression in the Philippines. Everything else I've ever written has been dull and pedantic.—Yours truly,

ADALINE GLASHEEN.

Norton, May 27, 1944.

Dear Comrade Aldred,—Your air mail letter reached me on June 5th, 30 days after you wrote it. The booklets you sent by common mail came to hand the next day. I have put you on my exchange list, and I am greatly in your debt for all this good literature. I will distribute it around to the best possible advantage.

I regard Bedford's "Straight Speaking" as the very best thing that has come to my attention and most timely for use in our present National Party campaign. It is right in line with the Party's disapproval of "Unconditional Surrender." I assume it is okeh with you and the Duke for me to republish it in my little village paper, the "Boise Valley Herald."—Best wishes,

A. CORNELL.

Middleton, Idaho, June 19, 1944.

My dear Dr. Aldred,—I am taking advantage of our national holiday, July 4, to write you more fully as to the Pacific International University, which has received the immediate and unanimous approval of all liberals both here and throughout the world. Several colleges have communicated with us from various different countries requesting the privilege of affiliating with this International University. Everyone welcomes it as the greatest and most significant development in higher education of modern times. So we welcome your generous words of interest and appreciation. I am enclosing herewith a brief "Blue Print" of the University of sufficient interest to your American and British readers, to print in "The Word." We have an Option on the Chapman College property to purchase, and have arranged a lease which will enable us to fully occupy the property and to announce a full University program beginning this coming September—two months hence.

We are nominating the former Anglican priest and now Unitarian-Rationalist minister of the famous old Manchester church, the Rev. F. H. Amphlett Micklewight, M.A., Manchester, for a Doctor's degree at well as for the Humanist Friend's Ministry. We have a good old Londoner on the Board of Trustees of the University, Mr. Alexander Henderson Morgan, who is also a member of the Rationalist Press Association, of which Mr. Micklewight is such a distinguished member.

Mr. Morgan is a minister of the Humanist Friends' Society.

Another word regarding the University: we are expecting the noted author, Miss Pearl S. Buck, to act as Chairman of the "International Council", which is in fact an Advisory Board for the University, to include outstanding names of friends of international education throughout the world. We naturally expect that you will be among these as well as to serve as one of our official representatives in the British Isles. Dr. Chellew, of Oxford University, will also serve as an official Representative. Speaking of Oxford, reminds me of your friend, the Rev. F. H. Amphlett Micklewight, M.A., of Oxford University, whom I have mentioned before in this letter. It will interest friend Micklewight to know that I know very well and very personally our mutual good friend, Dr. Pryns Hopkins, Editor of "Freedom" Magazine and friend of the University. I also know by his books and his "Unity" Magazine, Dr. Curtis Reese of Chigago, one of our greatest Humanist leaders.

You mention the early publication of the revised British edition of "Conscription of Conscience" book.

In closing, I wish to thank you for the very fine way in which you have presented the various chapters of my book to your readers through "The Word." A number of people here in the U.S. have read the articles and written us, commending both you and the articles. You are reaching as well as making many fine friends throughout this country with your fearless magazine.

Fraternally yours,

LOWELL H. COATE.

Dr. George W. Hartmann, Chairman

Dr. Dorothy H. Hutchinson, Vice-Chairman
Miss Bessie Simon, Corresponding Secretary

Dear friend and fellow-citizen:—We are placing before your readers a copy of an "Open Letter" to the President of the United States. It is a serious appeal, and we trust you will give it wide publicity.

In the "Christian Century" for February 2, Oswald Garrison Villard has an article entitled A Last Plea for Europe. It is a cry "on behalf of the millions now condemned to die." With the author, we ask who will "take the lead now in demanding that no single stone be left unturned to save Europe and America from the horror that lies before us"?

Surely it is right that some solemn effort be promptly made by all persons of good will to find a peaceful alternative to the gruesome undertaking —War to the limit of unconditional surrender.

While this project is conducted by the "Peace Now" Movement, we want the Open Letter to reflect faithfully the real sentiments of all those who are willing to attach their signatures to it, and to imply nothing more nor less than just that.

By appealing to the President, you are not committing yourself in any way to the general aims and methods of our organization or placing yourself in the position of aproving our past, present, or future activities. Your signature will represent your individual views only and not those of any public or private innstitution with which you may be associated. All we seek is to encourage other groups and personalities to labour independently along similar and parallel lines.

Our letter is going to every member of Congress and to many other outstanding people in this country. We ask your U.S. readers to petition the Chief Executive and his advisers to make every effort to find some way to avoid the supreme tragedy of continuing this war to the bitter end?

If readers can dedicate themselves to this urgent task, let them write the President along the lines indicated below and mail immediately.

Yours fraternally,

BESSIE SIMON.

AN URGENT PUBLIC APPEAL TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Hon. Frankin D. Roosevelt,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. Roosevelt:

All over the world war-weary peoples yearn for the coming of peace. The most pressing need of wounded Humanity is for peace, not next year or five years from now, but as soon as the technical details for the cessation of hostilities can be arranged. As citizens of the great American Republic, we plead with you to use the great power the inhabitants of this country have temporarily placed in your hands to follow your Inner Light and thereby lift the burden and curse of war from all mankind. One stroke of your pen as Commander-in-Chief of our Armed Forces could compel an armistice and peace discussion within 24 hours.

We believe all nations are ready to silence their guns, if, with the aid of a Congressional Peace Aims Commission, you will immediately proclaim to their peoples your advocacy of definite terms for a new Universal Treaty or World Constitution that will appeal to the best and noblest in man everywhere. As matters stand to-day, neither the American people and their colleagues within the United Nations nor the people of Germany and Japan know what will result for them and their children if the war is pursued to the point of a complete military triumph by ourselves and our allies. Surely our fellow men and women deserve to be told for what purposes they are being asked to die or to risk their lives—and to be informed with some exactness what their probable future will be.

America to-day need fear no foe. Democracy needs to conquer economic security but it need fear nothing from the forces of Nazism and Fascism.

Under the conditions of modern warfare, international and civil wars tend to wreck and ruin more individual and social values than they preserve or create. Therefore, rather than committing this nation to limitless death and destruction for the sake of obscure goals, we hope you will so shape American foreign and domestic policies during the coming weeks that, in friendly co-operation with all countries, we can resume our lofty cultural mission of blazing the trail to Peace, Plenty, and Freedom for the entire Human Family.

Such an approach from America, by far the strongest single economic and political power in the world, could not be construed as an act of weakness, but would be interpreted as a magnanimous and statesmanlike proposal to end this war and all war for the good of all.

If this suggestion seems politically and diplomatically feasible to our Allies and Associates in the struggle, perhaps you could personally electrify the world by flying to Berne or Stockholm, and from such non-belligerent soil broadcast to the multitudes in both hemispheres the minimum essentials of a democratic and humanitarian peace on the basis of which an armstice might be concluded immediately. Millions everywhere now silent for fear their neighbours would interpret their constant longing for peace as disloyalty to the community they truly love could then rejoice in Thanksgiving with them at the ending of this incredible tragedy of Total War.

Were something like this unprecedented act of practical idealism to occur, it would redound to your own imperishable glory and to the everlasting honour of our great country.

Respectfully and sincerely yours,

Dear Friend,—For a long time now I have been contemplating writing you to acknowledge the donations to the Labadie Collection which never fail to come. Enclosed you will find listing of them. I thought you would be glad to know they are being well preserved and are placed in the Collection to be readily found. I think you are doing a big work. I hope that it is being placed and preserved in other places also. Libraries do endeavour to save things, but it is as well to follow up gifts to see how well.

I was interested in reading your "Richard Carlile-Agitator" (1941) to read that the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, under Brougham, was organised to counteract such works as Paine, Volney, Diderot, and Carlile. Carlile wrote a letter to that society that was later reprinted in The Free Enquirer, published by Robert Dale Owen and Frances Wright in New York from 1828-1832 (October-October). We have that in the Labadie Collection. Four complete years lacking only two issues.

I always like to come across something by, or about, your late colleague, Rose Witcop. Her three sisters are in this country now, as you know, and meet together at Towanda, Pa. I hear of them through a mutual friend. I picture those early days in London, when you were producing the Herald of Revolt (1911-14) and The Spur (1914-1921), and she was producing the paper during your long anti-militarist imprisonment.

I send you a list of the Strickland Press and Bakunin Press publications to be found in the Labadie Collection of the University Library. The Strickland Press publications seem complete and are arriving regularly. We want all The Spur, except for one issue, Vol. VI., No. 5, October, 1919. We have this copy. Perhaps comrades in U.S.A. who received this paper from you regularly, or some one who has a bound volume, would make a donation to this important Radical collection of literature. It is very important to have The Spur complete.

The same remark applies to The Commune, which you seem to have issued in two series, covering the years 1923-1929. We have only February 1927 and April-May 1929 issues. But we would appreciate a complete set or bound volumes. I am sure that U.S. readers could help us in this matter.

We have, in the Labadie Collection, some rare pamphlets published by James Watson and others, and a work by Thomas Spence. That group, Spence, Thomas Skidmore, George Henry, and Frederick William Evans, and George Houston, interest me very much.

The Labardie Collection grows all the time. It has better housing facilities and is officially recognised. I hope you will be glad to know that your own work, and that of the Duke of Bedford, have a place in it, and always will have that place.

With my warm greetings and appreciation, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

AGNES INGLIS.

Labadie Collection, University of Michigan-Library, Anne Harbor, U.S.A., July 30, 1944.

Dear Mr. Aldred,—Thank you for the issues of The Word which wou have sent. We hope that the name of our library is kept on your mailing list.

We will be pleased to receive the three year

SNELL TRIBUTES: A Commentary

In July we published a study of the late Lord Snell's career. Such straight speaking will not increase our circle of friends. Second thoughts are said to be best: and our second thoughts would reject decisively the hypocritical maxim, "speak only good of the dead." Of the dead as of the living, and by the grave as by the cradle, we would speak the truth, so long as it is relevant. We reject the custom of eulogy. The tributes paid to Snell's memory evoke our iconoclastic humour.

On Sunday, April 23, the South Place Ethical Society's tribute was delivered by Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe, who was, at one time, editor of The Echo.

Ratcliffe declared that Snell was "the first man in England to rise from the level of the rural poor to a position in the titled governing class." We are not sure that this statement is true or that the sentiment is creditable.

Ratcliffe declared that Snell was a shining example of integrity and "displayed this character and spirit as a lifelong adherent of ethical religion." We would ask if Snell displayed this spirit when he subscribed the House of Lords' Oath of Allegiance in place of simple affirmation for which Bradlaugh, his hero and mentor, fought. Ratcliffe's tribute was so much hypocrisy and lamentable sentimentalism.

The cremation was at Golder's Green on April 26. Mr. Attlee, Deputy Prime Minister, was present, and there were members of both Houses of Parliament. Many Members of Ethical Societies and the Rationalist Press Association were present. Mr. H. J. Blackshaw, minister of the Ethical Church, conducted the service. Then Mr. Attlee spoke from the standpoint of the Labour and Socialist Movement, the Executive of the Fabian Society, the L.C.C., etc. Our membership of the Labour Movement goes back forty years and we speak with more active and actual knowledge of the real movement than Mr. C. R. Attlee, whose entire career has been professional and mediocre and thoroughly self-advancing because it adapted Socialism to Capitalism in war-time and in peace.

It was stated in the House of Commons that Lord Snell had been "asked to undertake an inquiry into the selection of aliens to be sent overseas in the Arandora Star." We are not clear as to the work done by his Committee. We do not wish to be unjust to Snell's memory but to our mind the investigation seems to have achieved nothing. We know that many of the victims of the Arandora Star were Anti-Fascists and Freethinkers, Humanists and Ethicists, and members of the Socialist Movement. The victims were not all Fascists. Were their memories not worthy of being recalled? Had we been in Attlee's place, paying tribute, the ghosts would have haunted us. Even the alleged Fascists were humans and had left loved ones behind. If we must have sentiment beside the coffin, let us be thorough. In the name of Socialism, Humanism, Freethought, and Rationalism, please do not let us salute only the accepted great.

Two days after the South Place Tribute came the Westminster Abbey Service. Cabinet Ministers, etc., assembled. The very poor were not there. The Dean and Chapter, arrayed in their capes, proceeded to their place. And then came the Order of Service of the Established Church. Some Rationalists were inspired by this tribute. We were not impressed. The Pagan Christian State had honoured the memory of its most correct statesman.

On June 5, the newspapers announced that Lord Snell had left £21,487!

"A CALL TO MANHOOD."

This pamphlet will be ready next month. Contents listed in our next issue. We make a last appeal to every comrade who wishes to help this work to send a donation. Make your gift now.

FRANCIS RUSSELL
Fifth Duke of Bedford.
Born 1765. Died 1802.
Painting by J. HOPPNER, R.A

Full length figure, life-size, standing in Peer's robes. The face is seen in three-quarters to the right, looking at the spectator. His left hand supports his robes, and the right grasps a roll of paper. A curtain and column, with writing table, occupy the right portion of the background, and an open landscape, seen through an arch, fills the remainder. Canvas 96 in. by 59 in. To be seen, South Corridor, Woburn Abbey.

Several references to the political forthrightness of the fifth Duke of Bedford have been made in these columns. He was the rigorous enemy of war and tyranny and a bold defender of civil liberty.

The fifth Duke took his seat in the House of Lords on December 5, 1787. Sharing the Whig views of his family, and accepting Fox as his political leader, the Duke developed a strong sympathy with the ideals of liberty and peace, and a stern antagonism to war and tyranny.

In 1792 the Duke of Portland called a meeting of Whigs at Burlington House to consider the propriety of supporting the proclamation against seditious writings and democratic conspiracies. Fox had not been invited because of his extreme radicalism and opposition to these measures. The Duke of Bedford withdrew.

Though he revealed much character, the Duke owed little to his education, which had not fitted him for public life. He explained to Lord Holland in 1793 that he hesitated to address the House of Lords from fear of expressing himself in incorrect English and so exposing his deficiencies. His friendship with Lord Lauderdale strengthened the Duke's attachment to Fox, developed his Liberal outlook, and encouraged him to overcome the defects of his education. He nerved himself to participate in debate and became, in the course of two sessions, a leading debater in the Upper Chamber.

When the Bill for suspending the "Habeas Corpus Act" was passed in May 1794, the Duke signed a protest with four other peers. Eight months later he brought forward the motion for peace with France. This was defeated by 88-15. In the House of Commons, a similar motion, moved by Fox, was rejected by a large majority. The peace minorities were right. The compact war majorities were wrong.

In November 1795 the Duke strenuously opposed the Government's Bill extending the law of treason.

"WHY GO ON BLUNDERING ON?"

As stated in our announcement columns, the Boise Valley Herald, in its issue for Thursday, June 29 last, (Vol. XXXV., No. 29), commenced the reproduction of the speeches made in the House of Lords by the Duke of Bedford. The first speech selected was that made on June 2, 1942, dealing with "Peace and Reconstruction."

In an editoral, headed "The Series That Begin in This Issue," our fearless contemporary states:

The Boise Valley Herald, in this issue, is beginning the publication of a series of articles that is a direct and forthright challenge of the ideology or thought patterns that total up to this war and the causes behind it.

The main title of this series is "Why Go Blundering On?" For the convenience of our comment and that of our readers, we are adopting the policy of numbering the paragraphs in each instalment, so that comment can cite the paragraph by instalment number and paragraph number. For example, Par. 7, Inst. 1 (this issue), allusion is made to one of the officials of the Bank of Montreal making a statement that, to our mind, constitutes a possible lead to the root cause of war. Without saying that we will be able to find room for them, immediately upon receipt of them, we do invite short letters of comment on the startling and well-expressed commitments that our readers will find characteristic of this series of articles."

The Boise Valley Herald takes for its motto the definition of a newspaper proclaimed by Joseph Pulitzer in the following passage:—

"The newspaper must be both a school house and a forum—both a teacher and a tribune—an instrument of justice, a terror to crime, an aid to education, an exponent of true Americanism; it must be forever unsatisfied with merely printing the news — Forever fighting every form of wrong — forever independent — forever wedded to truly humanitarian ideals forever aspiring to be a moral force—forever rising to a higher plane of perfection as a public institution.

This fearless paper should be read and circulated widely throughout the United States and the English-speaking world.

True to this definition, in its issue for June 22, our contemporary said:—

ANNOUNCING A NEW SERIES.

The "Boise Valley Herald" has lately come into possession of a line of comment that attacked war administration from a vantage point wholly at variance with all the rules of the books.

Since the war has been in progress, a new voice has been raised in the British House of Lords that, so far as we have seen, strikes us as being truer to the cardinal points of the pole-star of truth regarding social, economic and human welfare-progress for a new and better world and is being done with such a mastery of language that it is not at all surprising that, so far as the general press is concerned, there has been, so far as we have seen, no hint of its existence, and yet it has historical significance.

This has not come to our attention by any of the commercial distributing agencies but rather through the good offices of a rebel source of distribution. Its title is "Why Keep Blundering On?"

ISOLATED PACIFISTS.

There must be a large number of pacifists who are prevented for various reasons, from attending meetings and other social gatherings, and who are thus deprived of making personal contact with others of similar outlook. It is felt that one way perhaps of helping to solve this problem, would be to start a pacifist pen-friendship Circle.

The Circle would send out fortnightly or monthly letters of an individual character, and these would provide a medium for an exchange of ideas, and for the expression of personal views of pacifist interest including pacifist literature. The aim of the Circle would be to strengthen Pacifist friendship by endeavouring to maintain a helpful relationship with those who are "ploughing a lonely furrow." All those who are interested, are cordially invited to write to the undermentioned. As the scheme would be voluntary, any gift such as stamps, etc., towards postage expenses would be appreciated.

ANARCHISM AND INTEGRITY

The other day a comrade walked into the Strickland Press and handed over three issues of the one-time London Anarchist or Kropotkinist monthly journal, "Freedom." They were for July, August, and September, 1907, Vol. XXI., Nos. 219, 220, and 221. He said:

These issues contain the signed articles you wrote thirty-seven years ago. I will look out for other numbers containing your articles of that time. You have certainly lasted the distance. It is funny that the Anarchists don't appreciate you, seeing how you have spoken and written so faithfully and been imprisoned so much, always defending yourself, and standing up for our ideas in all the courts of the land from the lowest to the highest. No other man in the Anarchist movement has such a record.

The same day another comrade called to ask my advice about some prosecution he was facing. He said casually:

I was at the Anarchist meeting yesterday. Someone asked a question about you. The speaker said that you were not an Anarchist and had never been one. He said that if they wanted to understand Anarchism they must read Peter Kropotkin and Herbert Read.

A little later, a working-man came in and asked for some books or pamphlets on Anarchism. He threw aside, in truculent disgust, our "Studies in Communism," "Pioneers of Anti-Parliamentarism," "Socialism and Parliament." At last he said:

I want a book by an Anarchist, A REAL ANARCHIST! I want something by Herbert Read.

I thought: "Poor soul! What humbug!" And I resolved to come to grips with the question of Anarchism, war, and integrity. We believe that, without integrity, a man cannot be an Anarchist.

Our "Freedom" essays have been reprinted or else will be collected with our various essays. There is no need to summarise them here. They defended and defined the principles of Anarchism very clearly, whilst one attacked Capitalist literature and journalism, and explained why we broke with Fleet St. in our youth. More important to consider is the Kropotkin myth.

Kropotkin liquidated his Anarchism in a most reactionary militarism and imperialism. He was never a real Anarchist but rather a political liberal and would-be reformer. Only the Czarist setting caused him to be mistaken for an Anarchist. The movement he founded ended in complete purposelessness and futility. What remains of it to-day is a bogus syndicalism, men denouncing war in their spare-time, but drawing wages from the manufacture of bombing aeroplanes. Words! but no sincerity.

The evidence of the Kropotkin futility is before us when we have a false gloss put on Kropotkin's career as a basis for Anarchist propaganda and the proletarian youth are invited to regard Herbert Read as an authority on Anarchism. It is a pathetic sight to see so-called agitators—probably Capitalist news-agents seven days a week but spare-time Anarchists — selling Herbert Read's "The Philosophy of Anarchism" or his "Poetry of Anarchism" and pretending that here are the classics of Anarchist thought destined to emancipate the common-people.

Reviewing the first book, that most orthodox paper, The Listener, described Read as "a man whose life has been given, if we may judge by his feelings, to a search for essentials."

There is nothing in Read's life to warrant any such conclusion. Read's Anarchism is essentially an artistic pose and an absolute unreality. It has not influenced his life in any way. His Anarchism is utterly worthless.

Reviewing Read's "Poetry and Anarchism," The Listener said: "It is a brave, stirring affirmative book."

We propose to prove from Read's own life and writings that, speaking morally and spiritually, and therefore, truly Anarchistically, that he is not a brave, stirring, affirmative character. We can conclude, therefore, and also Anarchistically, that he cannot write a brave, stirring, affirmative book.

"Who's Who" for 1944 publishes the following biography of Herbert Read:

READ, Herbert, D.S.O. 1918; M.C.; D. Litt. (Hon. Men.); M.A. (Edin.); Director, George Routledge & Sons, Ltd., Publishers; b. 4 Dec. 1893; e. s. of late Herbert Read of Muscoates Grange, Kirby-moorside, Yorks; m. 1st, Evelyn Roff; 2nd, Margaret Ludwig; three s. one d. Educ.: Crossley's School, Halifax; University of Leeds. Commissioned Jan. 1915 to the Yorkshire Regt. The Green Howards); Captain, 1917; fought in France and Belgium, 1915-18 (M.C., D.S.O., despatches); Assistant Principal, H.M. Treasury, 1919-22; Assistant Keeper, Victoria and Albert Museum, 1922-31; Watson Gordon Professor of Fine Art in the University of Edinburgh, 1931-33; Sydney Jones Lecturer in Art, University of Liverpool, 1935-36; Editor, the Burlington Magazine, 1933-39; Leon Fellow, University of London, 1940-42.

Then follows a list of his publications from 1919 to 1943, the titles of which have little relation to the social struggle.

If Read is genuinely an Anarchist, one would have expected that, as the director of a leading firm of publishers, much of the literature issued by that firm would have been Anarchist thought for the comrades If so, why is it not on sale? Where is it being circulated? Is his Anarchism merely a play-time affair?

Again, is his record consistent with one who had read and been converted to Anarchist ideas and idealism as a young man? Let us consider what he has to say on this subject.

Read's "Annals of Innocence and Experience" was issued by Faber in 1940.

Chapter 5 is entitled "The Impact of War." We make two excepts from this chapter that tell their own story:

At the outbreak of war in 1914 I was already in a military camp. This was not the outcome of any immediate patriotic zeal on my part, but was to some extent a consequence of my patriotic past. A year or two before I became an undergraduate, and while still contemplating the possibility of a medical career, I had joined the local territorial unit of the Royal Army Medical Corps. By the time I reached the University, this had become a meaningless and arduous engagement, to which I was nevertheless bound for a period of years. But at the University there was an Officers' Training Corps, and I eagerly seized the opportunity to transfer my military trend to this more agreeable branch of the service. It is true that as time went on and my political ideas developed in the manner just related, I had certain qualms of conscience. But very few of those who joined the O.T.C. in those days had any serious motive. War was considered as a very remote contingency, and meanwhile here was an open-air club, with possibilities of friendship and youthful enterprise, and an annual camp which was in effect a free holiday for many who could not otherwise afford one. . . .

There, happily at play, I was caught by the war. In the years that followed I was often to ask myself what I would have done if I had been a free agent. Politically I was a pacifist, and regarded the war as a conflict between rival imperial powers which would bring destruction to the peoples engaged. I hoped that the war would be stopped by international working-class action, and the failure of the responsible leaders to bring about a stoppage was my first lesson in political disillusionment. But fundamentally—that is to say, ethically—I could not claim to be a pacifist.—Pages 139-140.

I received a commission within six months and was posted to a battalion of the Green Howards, my local North Riding regiment, then training in Dorset . . . I had become a regular reader of the "New Age," at that time the most independent and lively periodical being published. The officers' mess occupied a building ordinarily used by the local Masonic Lodge, and there we had an ante-room where all the usual magazines and newspapers were available. They were displayed on a green-baize table, and there, when I had read it, I left my copy of the "New Age." I was seated deep in an arm-chair one afternoon when the senior subaltern, traditionally responsible for the social conduct of the junior subalterns, came up to the table and casually picked up the "New Age." He looked at it for a minute or two and slowly the colour deepened in his rather florid face. He turned suddenly to address the room, and holding up the paper between his finger and thumb as though it were unclean, he shouted in a loud voice: "Who brought this bloody rag into the mess?" I wish I could say that I sprang to my feet to defend my intellectual interests; but alas, I was not so naive as that. I shrank still deeper into my chair and watched the angry senior subaltern stalk out in disgust, throwing the offensive periodical into the waste-paper basket as he passed. I had learned my lesson, and in future read the "New Age" in the privacy of my tent or cubicle.—Pages 140-141.

So long as we remained in England I confined my mess reading to the "Tatler" and the "Bystander" and other periodicals of the kind which were the only literary recreations of the majority of His Majesty's officers.

In Chapter 4, Read admits that prior to this time he had been influenced by Kropotkin's pamphlets, published in 1912 and 1913, and had studied Syndicalism. In 1916, he acquired Georges Sorel's "Reflection on Violence" and wrote an article to the "Yorkshire Post" protesting against its reviewer's failure to present to his readers the true import of his book. This was printed under his initials. Read explains (page 133):

"It should be remembered that I was then an officer of His Majesty's Army!"

On page 107 of this worthless book, Read explains his attitude towards Atheism thus:

I never have adopted an attitude of active disbelief. It has never occurred to me to proselytize on behalf of rationalism or atheism.

And so, ad nauseam, with an explanation of his sympathy with Catholic intellectual groups, etc. This man is said, at Glasgow street corners, and in other cities, to be an Anarchist pioneer by stupid, ignorant, self-styled propagandists who deny that Aldred is an Anarchist. What nonsense!

(To be concluded.)

IF IN THE NIGHT?

If in the night all Shame and Wrong
All Prejudice, and Hate, and Fear,
That we have garnered to our souls
And let them prosper there,
Did melt away, as the deep snow
Melts from the sunlit hills afar.
I wonder would we be as sweet
As little children are?

BUT WAS IT LUCK?

SOME QUESTIONS ABOUT PEARL HARBOUR

Speech made in the United States House of Representatives, Washington, on Tuesday, December 8, 1942.

By Hon. JEANETTE RANKIN

(Member for Montana.)

Miss J. Rankin (Montana):

Mr. Speaker, we have been at war a year. During that time the American people have had abundant opportunity to take stock of the Nation's situation and to raise a large number of pertinent questions, not out of any spirit of disunity but in a firm belief that the Nation's welfare requires a vigilant exercise of the traditional American right of free inquiry.

As a Member of Congress who voted against the declaration of war on December 8, 1941, I wish to take advantage of this anniversary occasion to insert in the Record a number of historically significant documents bearing upon the hitherto obscure antecedents of the Pearl Harbour attack and to raise a few questions of my own as to the meaning of certain activities which led up to that attack.

Pearl Harbor was the greatest thunderbolt in American history. It is proper to inquire, indeed, whether any responsible American source foresaw the Japanese attack. In this regard I wish to present the following remarkable statement, amounting to a prediction, from the Christian Century magazine of November 19, 1941—3 weeks prior to the Japanese attack—page 1433:

It is no secret that the whole colonial structure of the white empires is threatening to fall apart unless we intervene in Asia. Many British leaders would welcome American involvement with Japan. * * * So the thesis of Sidney Rogerson's pre-war book Propaganda in the Next War—that the surest way Britain can bring the United States to her aid will be to involve us in war with Japan—is being validated by events.

"Show me the motive, and I'll show the criminal," was a favorite saying of Sherlock Holmes. Here we have an apparently well-defined motive and also a suggestion as to the intended method of realization.

What does Mr. Rogerson, who is an English author, have to say specifically about the plans of the British imperialists? His book, Propaganda in the Next War, published London in 1938 as one of a series of books on The Next War edited by the well-known writer, Capt. Liddell Hart, was banned from export to America by the British censorship in 1939. A copy had been secured earlier by the Library of Congress, however, and now reposes in the rare-book room. On page 148 Mr. Rogerson makes this admission as to the plans of the British imperialists:

To persuade her—

The United States—

to take our part will be much more difficult—

Than in 1914—

so difficult as to be unlikely to succeed. It will need a definite threat to America; a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel. The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the Great War they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany.

In other words, 3 years before Pearl Harbor, Britain's imperialists had figured out just how to bring the United States once more to their aid.

But exactly how was Japan to be embroiled with the United States? There is no better way of goading a nation into war than by imposing economic sanctions, especially in the case of nations devoid of essential raw materials. Indeed, at the very time Mr. Rogerson was writing his revealing book, the phrase "economic sanctions mean war"—an echo from the League of Nations' threat to Italy in 1937—was still on everybody's lips. If Britain were merely to induce the United States to sever commercial relations with Japan, who was extremely dependent upon imports of raw materials in exchange for silk and manufactures for the continuance of her economic life, would not that suffice?

Is there any evidence of any specific occasion on which the British Government sold this policy of economic sanctions against Japan to the Roosevelt administration? In the Ladies Home Journal of July 1942, page 17, in an article entitled "How War Came," Forrest Davis and Ernest K. Lindley—an intimate friend of the President—make the following significant revelation:

When they—

met in a Newfoundland bight for the Atlantic conference, Churchill wished to meet the issue head-on. He asked the President—as the British, Australians, and Dutch repeatedly had besought this Government before—to join in an ultimative declaration to Japan.

Now, an ultimatum is a demand accompanied by a threat. It sets up a dilemma: "Do so and so—or else." In this case the punitive alternative to be offered to Japan was to consist, as we shall see, of an economic blockade—in other words, sanctions—an admitted provocation to war.

But of what demand was the ultimatum itself—the first horn of the dilemna to be offered to Japan—to consist? And what evidence do we have that President Roosevelt actually accepted Mr. Churchill's Atlantic conference request that such an ultimatum be sent?

There seems to be excellent evidence that such an ultimatum was sent by President Roosevelt. No less an apologist for the administration's foreign policy than Mr. Henry Luce, editor of Time, Life, and Fortune, has admitted both that President Roosevelt served such an ultimatum to Japan, and that it was the sending of this ultimatum which resulted in the Pearl Harbor attack. Mr. Luce alleges that the ultimatum was sent out of America's love for China, but inasmuch as it was sent at Mr. Churchill's instigation at a time when Britain desperately needed an ally in Europe as well as in the Orient and not at the beginning of the Sino-Japanese war, during which indeed we continually sent to Japan both oil and scrap iron, may not the American public wonder whether it was the interests of the British Empire in the Orient which were primarily at stake? Here is Mr. Luce's historic admission, as found in Life magazine for July 20, 1942, page 30:

The Chinese, for whom the United States had delivered the ultimatum that brought on Pearl Harbour—

Expected large lease-lend shipments, and so forth.

Just what was the wording of the ultimatum, then, since its existence is admitted?

A perusal of the Department of State bulletins covering the period from the Atlantic Conference of August 12, 1941, to the attack on Pearl Harbor, December 7, 1941, discloses only a single item relating to Japan—a brief mention of repatriation of American and Japanese nationals in the bulletin of October 11, 1941, page 276—though this weekly journal of the State Department was replete with even trivialities regarding other countries during this period, thus indicating that the American people were not being fully informed as to the negotiations with Japan. On December 15, 1941, a week after Pearl Harbor, President Roosevelt released a message to Congress purporting to cover the negotiations with Japan.

While candid admission that any of the communications sent Japan constituted an ultimatum is not made, the requirement made on September 3, 1941, that Japan accept the principle of "non-disturbance of the status quo in the Pacific" as detailed in the Department of State Bulletin of December 20, 1941, page 538, apparently constituted the gist of the Roosevelt administration's demands.

This requirement was the equivalent to asking Japan to guarantee the inviolateness of the white empires in the Orient, of which the British Empire comprised approximately 90 percent in both area and population. The American people would have been gratified had President Roosevelt demanded assurance that Japan respect the territorial integrity of the Philippines, to whom we had agreed to grant independence in 1946, but the American public may well wonder where President Roosevelt got the authority to conduct our foreign affairs "as if Congress did not exist" —to quote one of my colleagues—and to commit American lives, fortunes, and prestige to securing a guaranty for British and Dutch imperial interests in the Orient—irrespective of the merits of those interests.

Later, more specific guaranties were demanded of Japan as to China, Indo-China, and so forth.

Concurrently, Japan was presented with the other horn of the dilemna hatched at the Atlantic conference; namely, economic sanctions of ever-increasing severity.

What is the evidence that the Roosevelt administration, which had frozen Japanese assets in this country as early as July 25, 1941, rapidly accelerated its economic strangulation of Japan following the Atlantic conference?

To secure an accurate statistical answer, I applied to both the Department of State and the Department of Commerce, asking for month-by-month figures on American exports to Japan in 1941. To my surprise, I received from both Departments an identical response: "Because of a special Executive order, statistics on trade with Japan beginning with April 1941 are not being given out."

Inasmuch as the Japanese certainly know what they received in the way of goods from the United States throughout 1941, it becomes proper to inquire, "From whom are these statistics being concealed?"

As a Member of Congress, I was, of course, able to exercise my congressional prerogative of securing this data from an administrative department. Because of its allegedly confidential nature, I cannot, however, reveal it at this time.

However, a perusal of other sources throws considerable light upon the extent to which the Roosevelt administration invoked economic sanctions against Japan in the months between the Atlantic conference and the attack upon Pearl Harbor. For instance, in the New York Times of August 17, 1941, page 7, we read;

Vice-President Wallace, the chairman (of the Economic Defence Board) to-day confirmed reports that this group was already working on projects for exerting trade pressure on Japan.

In other words, in less than a week after the Atlantic Conference the machinery of economic sanctions was getting under way.

Six weeks later the economic stringency in Japan had become acute, as we read in the New York Times of October 24, 1941, page 36:

Japan's raw material shortage has been sharply aggravated and her industrial activity seriously disrupted by the cessation of her trade with important foreign countries, the Department of Commerce reported to-day.

Ship movements and trade between Japan and the United States, the British Empire, and the Netherlands Indies, it is pointed out, have become virtually non-existent.

By December 2, 1941—5 days before Pearl Harbor—we read in the New York Times of that date, page 6:

Japan has been cut off from about 75 per cent. of her normal imports as a result of the Allied blockade, the National Industrial Conference Board reported yesterday. In an analysis entitled "The Effects of the Allied Economic Blockade on Japan," the Board asserted that despite the drastic restrictions imposed by that Government to stretch out available supplies, the blockade may ultimately prove disastrous. . . .

"Premier Hideki Tojo of Japan despatched the Kurusu mission to Washington because Japan to-day is on the verge of economic collapse . . .," Contemporary China, fortnightly digest of the Chinese News Service, Inc., stated yesterday.

Is the situation in the Pacific as serious as it appears?

A week before the attack on Pearl Harbor I asked a prominent non-Japanese Oriental:

Yes (he replied)—it is serious. Japan has no choice but to go to war or to submit to economic slavery for the rest of her existence.

The question remains, Did President Roosevelt realize that "economic sanctions mean war" at the time he appears to have adopted Mr. Churchill's suggestion to impose them as the punitive alternative for his ultimatum to Japan?

It is hard to see how he could have failed to realize this, inasmuch as he himself had made the following statement to the Volunteer Participation Committee on July 24, 1941, as reported in the Department of State Bulletin of July 26, 1941, page 72, and also in the Saturday Evening Post of February 7, 1942, page 26:

Now, if we cut the oil off, they (the Japanese) probably would have gone to the Dutch East Indies a year ago, and you would have had war.

Whereupon, immediately after the Atlantic Conference of 2 weeks later, Mr. Roosevelt proceeded to invoke these self-acknowledged war-producing sanctions.

Was it not strange that Mr. Roosevelt, who, by refusing for years to enforce the Neutrality Act of 1936 to prevent shipments of war supplies to Japan despite popular demand, had largely contributed to supplying that nation with the raw materials for the armament now being used against our own troops, after the Atlantic Conference when an incident with Japan seems to have been desired, suddenly changed his policy and not only cut off war supplies but virtually everything required by the civilian population of Japan as well?

As a member of the President's own party, Congressman Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, remarked in a letter to the Saturday Evening Post, published in that periodical on April 4, 1942, page 26:

We have been a very foolish people, which has made it possible for . . . politicians to get away with murder. This blaming the Pearl Harbour tragedy on the treachery of the Japs is like the fellow who had been tickling the hind leg of a mule trying to explain his bunged-up condition by blaming the mule for having violated his confidence.

Astounding as the Pearl Harbor attack was to the American public as a whole, if it was anticipated by the administration why did the President permit our forces at Pearl Harbor to be taken by surprise? Even if a Japanese attack was desired, certainly no one desired a successful attack.

The answer seems to be that everything possible was done to warn our forces at Pearl Harbor of the extreme likelihood of attack. According to the report of the Roberts commission on the facts of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Admiral Kimmel and Lieutenant General Short, who were in charge of the Hawaiian area, were sent repeated warning by the War and Navy Departments.

Thus we read in the text of the Roberts report, as given in Senate Document No. 159, pages 6-9, and also in the New York Times of January 25, 1942, page 30, that—

On October 16, 1941, the commanding general, Hawaiian department, and the commander in chief of the fleet were advised by the War and Navy Departments of . . . the possibility of an attack by Japan.

Another warning was sent on November 24, 1941.

The Roberts report continues.

On November 27, 1941, the Chief of Staff of the Army informed the commanding general, Hawaiian department, that . . . hostilities on the part of Japan were momentarily possible. . . . On the same day—the Chief of Naval Operations sent a message to the commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet, which stated in substance that the despatch was to be considered a war warning . . . that Japan was expected to make an aggressive move in the next few days.

November 27, 1941—

Additional warnings were sent November 28, November 29, November 30, December 1, December 3, December 4, December 6, and December 7—the last one arriving in Hawaii after the Japanese onslaught had begun.

Thus, we see that for 2 weeks prior to the Pearl Harbor attack almost daily warnings had been sent, not to mention less frequent precautionary dispatches earlier. What more could have been done in the way of warnings is hard to see. Indeed, do not the frequency, urgency, the very wording of these warnings, indicate in themselves that the Pearl Harbor attack came as no surprise whatever to the President?

Why, then, were our forces taken unawares December 7, 1941? Apparently simply because a deep-rooted and traditional sense of over-confidence insulated our Pacific commanders from taking these warnings seriously.

Has Prime Minister Churchill ever admitted attempting to get the United States into this war?

Yes; quite frankly—after we were in. Why was it that previously he said he wanted only the "tools"? In February, 1942, in a speech delivered before the House of Commons in an effort to save his administration at the time of the fall of Singapore, this boast was wrung from him—as reported in the New York Times of February 16, 1942, page 6:

When I survey and compute the power of the United States and its vast resources and feel that they are now in it with us, with the British Commonwealth of Nations all together, however long it lasts, till death or victory, I cannot believe that there is any other fact in the whole world which can compare with that. This is what I have dreamed of, aimed at, and worked for, and now it has come to pass.

A blunt acknowledgment, surely.

Has either Mr. Churchill or Mr. Roosevelt ever acknowledged that the Atlantic conference was the specific occasion of their efforts to get the United States into the war by embroiling us with Japan?

It is hard to see what else the following admission from Mr. Churchill's speech in Parliament, January 28, 1942—as reported in the New York Times of that date, page 10—can be called:

It has been the policy of the Cabinet at almost all costs to avoid embroilment with Japan until we were sure that the United States would also be engaged.

On the other hand, the probability since the Atlantic conference, at which I discussed these matters with President Roosevelt, that the United States, even if not herself attacked, would come into the war in the Far East and thus make the final victory assured, seemed to allay some of these anxieties, and that expectation has not been falsified by the events.

This would seem to indicate that not only did President Roosevelt accede to Churchill's pressure to send an ultimatum to, and impose sanctions upon, Japan but made a blanket commitment to bring America into the war even if Japan did not attack.

A very curious piece of evidence appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of October 10, 1942, page 9, in an article by Lt. Clarence E. Dickinson, United States Navy, entitled "I Fly For Vengeance." Lieutenant Dickinson relates:

On this cruise we had sailed from Pearl Harbour on November 28 (1941) under absolute war orders. Vice-Admiral Wm. F. Halsey, jun., the commander of the aircraft battle force, had given instructions that the secrecy of our mission was to be protected at all costs. We were to shoot down anything we saw in the sky and to bomb anything we saw on the sea. In that way, there could be no leak to the Japs.

Could such orders have been issued by Vice Admiral Halsey except by specific direction from the Commander in Chief, namely, the President of the United States?

In other words, if Lieutenant Dickinson's account is true, did not the President at least 9 days before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, without a declaration of war, authorize an identical attack upon the Japanese—also without a declaration of war?

Today approximately 1,000,000 American boys are fighting from three to eight thousand miles away from home. The American people are willing to struggle for the "four freedoms" but we realize that we must retain them at home if we are going to give them to others. Exercising our traditional right of free speech and free inquiry, we are going to continue to ask and to see answers to all questions as they arise.

When are we going to get the full story of what happened at the Atlantic Conference? We asked for it then and ask for it now.

When President Roosevelt had so persistently refused to enforce the Neutrality Act against Japan when public opinion definitely demanded it, why did he so suddenly change his policy at the Atlantic Conference?

A year ago, one of my Congressional colleagues, having observed for months the adroitness with which President Roosevelt had brought us ever closer to the brink of war in the Atlantic only to be continually frustrated in the final step by a reluctant Congress, seeing fate present the President on December 7, 1941, with a magnificent moral categorical, right out of the blue—a casus belli beyond all criticism—exclaimed in despair: "What luck that man has!"

But was it luck?

During his recent campaign through the country for Socialism and Pacifism, our comrade, Rhys Davies,, has said many good things. We select some of his sayings:—

At the Parents' Pension Association meeting, Manchester, 2nd September, 1944:—

When a son was lost in the war of 1914-18 the mother was paid a small weekly pension as a matter of right. In this war, there is no such provision; pension is payable only in case of need, and the needs of the parent is determined by, and largely on the basis of, the Poor Law Means Test. It cannot be wrong in this war to do what was deemed right in the last. In any case, I would spend so much of every nation's substance on the social services that there would be nothing left in any country for the military gangsters to squander on battleships, bayonets and bombers. ... ...

At the meeting of District Nursing Associations, Hindley, Wigan, September 6th:—

The White Paper on National Health Policy is just one of those glowing promises which the Government feels compelled to make in war-time in order to maintain that abstract thing called "public morale." The result of these proposals may be guessed when we bear in mind the fate of the Education Act. Parliament spent months discussing that Bill, and it was known all the time that its main provisions could not possibly be implemented because of lack of schools and teachers. The day is, however, fast approaching when a grand inquest will be held on all those responsible for this perfidy.

At the Church of England Men's Society Demonstration, Stoke-on-Trent, September 7th:—

The Christian Church, especially in Europe, was shaken to its foundations because of the behaviour of the majority of the clergy during the Great War of 1914-18. In this war it looks like perishing for similar reasons. The Churches condemn drunkenness, delinquency, thieving and moral lapses in the matter of sex, but support their respective Governments in every war as it comes along. War is surely the greatest evil of all. Nearly every other sin to which man is prone increases in the wake of war. It is sheer blasphemy and paganism on their part to pray to the Almighty asking Him to bless the armies of their respective countries as if they could order God at will, and yet treat Him as a joke."

I wish that there was a Chair established in some University somewhere to find out where this hatred between nations comes from. In my own lifetime we, the British, have hated the Greeks, the Turks, the Boers, and the Russians all in turn; and now we hate the Germans, with whom our forefathers fought against the French over a century ago. We are not quite sure of our friendship towards our "dearly beloved" French Allies even now, and we are not too enamoured of the Yankees either; the only people we really love are ourselves and we are not absolutely certain of that on occasions.

A HUMANIST AFFIRMATION

By BERNARD FANTUS

On April 14, 1940, a man of international renown in the field of therapeutics, Bernard Fantus, passed away after a year's illness. Fantus did much to humanise the practice of medicine. He made a deep awareness of the patient's needs and feelings the inspiration and test of all his research.

During his illness, Dr. Fantus took careful notes on his own case, making as other doctors said, "a guinea pig of himself." In his dying weeks he dictated instructions that would guide his research staff in its work for months ahead, so that his work for humanity might go on.

Fantus originated the "blood bank" and also "candy medication." He was the first to make evil tasting medicines palatable. In a hundred ways he combined sympathy and the skill of a true scientist so as to help humanity.

A signer of the original Humanist Manifesto of May 1933, he felt that that document was far too academic to reach many people, and compiled an affirmation of Humanism as a beginning of a more natural and commonly understandable statement of faith in man and life that could be improved and widely circulated.

He wanted suggestions for improvement of this statement. How would you change it? What would you add?—Ed.

1. Humanism affirms that religion exists for man and not man for religion.

2. Religion must deserve the respect of humanity and must be able to bear the light of science and reason.

3. The world and its creation is the great divine miracle before which humanity bows reverently but not without hope of an ultimate better understanding.

4. Man is the single greatest evolutionary factor on this earth to-day and, to that extent is divine. By an intelligent appreciation of his powers and responsibilities he will make the world much more fit to live in.

5. Nothing human is alien to religion and all that is good, beautiful and true is sacred.

6. The world is man's country, and to do good, the religion of humanism.

7. "The place to be happy is here, the time to be happy is now, and the way to be happy is to make others so."

8. Humanism must take the path of social and mental hygiene and discourage sentimental and unreal hopes and wishful thinking.

9. Love thy neighbour and even thy enemy: For to "understand all is to forgive all."

10. "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." Exploitation of the fellowman is the greatest sin, intelligent co-operation for man's common good the greatest service. Humanism demands a shared life in a shared world.

DUNDEE FABIAN SOCIETY.

Guy Aldred and Oliver Brown spoke at the Cinerama, Dundee, on Sunday, September 24. Comrade Scott was in the chair. An excellent speech was delivered by Oliver Brown from the standpoint of Scottish Nationalism and Pacifism. Guy Aldred addressed himself to the subject: "When Will War End War," and dealt with the Dumbarton Oaks' conference, the economic forces at work to perpetuate war, the Gold Standard, Land-Lease and the imperial issues of oil, rubber, and exports. Great discussion followed and much opposition was shown by the Communist Party. In reply Aldred attacked vigorously the policy and history of the Communists, so called.

This is Aldred's first visit to Dundee since November 1919, when he addressed meetings in the Gilfillan Hall, under the auspices of the International Ex-Service Men's Union. The headquarters of this body was at 190 Overgate. His subjects then were: "Why an International Union of Ex-Service Men?" and "Capitalism and The Soldier."

The present war is the answer to the Why. His treatment and his son's treatment to-day, as a soldier of the second generation, and the state of the world, say all that needs to be said on the second subject.

Comrade Fletcher, the oldest active Socialist in Dundee, ex-member of the Council, moved the vote of thanks. Before leaving Dundee Aldred had a keen discussion in his shop, which is the centre of Socialist thought in the Jute city.

This nonsense is ramified by a strange process of intimacy of pretence and corruption.

To bolster Herbert Read's claim to be considered an Anarchist, the Anarchists circulate his excellently produced work, published by Kegan Paul, entitled "To Hell with Culture." There is a sub-title: "Democratic Values are New Values."

This work is No. 4 of The Democratic Order series, edited by Francis Williams, issued in 1941. Williams writes a pro-war introduction. Thus, in circulating this work, the Anarchists circulate approvingly in war-time militarist platitudes. The work itself contains no expression that warrants an anti-war conclusion. In his most extreme passage, Read writes: "When Hitler has finished bombing our cities," etc. Our cities!

Under some circumstances, the cry "To Hell with Culture" would be quite a sound slogan. It was the motto of the first Christians and signified their protest against the Paganism that still prevails. But the motto led to a thousand years of darkness and misunderstanding and helped neither the Christian ethic nor the Christian philosophy. A number of folk mouth the slogan with Socialist emphasis to-day, but really speak in gutter terms and not in understanding proletarian approach. There is nothing wrong with culture, so long as it is not a substitute for integrity. Ignorance, also, can be a plausible substitute for integrity, if it pleads poverty. Culture that lacks integrity is really ignorance: and the slogan should be "To Hell with Ignorance—Refined or Admittedly Vulgar!"

Read's slogan takes a trick and the average Syndicalist Anarchist thinks that this man, whose learning and degrees are set out at the beginning of the book as "Note on the Author," is one of them. They do not understand the insult of his descent to patronage.

Read opens his essay by explaining the title. He quotes:—

When will revolutionary leaders realise that "culture" is dope, a worse dope than religion; for even if it were true that religion is the opiate of the people, it is worse to poison yourself than to be poisoned, and suicde is more dishonourable than murder. To hell with culture, culture as a thing added like sauce to otherwise unpalatable stale fish!

Read explains this quotation:—

This pamphlet is to be about the place of "culture" in the Democratic Order, so I begin with a quotation which gives me both a text and a title. It comes from the writings of a man recently dead who was both a true artist and a true Socialist.—Eric Gill.

Eric Gill was certainly not a Socialist. To write that he was "a true Socialist" is but to emphasise the falsehood and the nonsense of the description. He was a man of talent rather than an artist because the term artist implies not merely talent, not even genius, but also a subtle power of vision, which Eric Gill lacked. He was a commonplace, a very commonplace, man of talent, and only a very commonplace person could write such falsehood about him. Anarchists know that Eric Gill was not a Socialist. Yet they circulate this rubbish by Herbert Read as being Anarchism and so become parties to his propaganda of bogus values. Herbert Read knows that his description of Gill is false and beyond apology. But he ventures it because he lacks the courage to stand alone. A deadly crew of semi-pacifists—posing as cultured in the very sense Read pretends to disown—have acclaimed Eric Gill as a pacifist: absolutely without justification. To echo this falsehood is to gain supporters. And so Read maintains his reputation by broadcasting the basis of corrupt appreciation. The process is the easiest and most despicable way of achieving reputation known to would-be philosophers. And so even Freethinkers, insisting that Anarchism is essentially Atheistic in outlook, cite with approval Herbert Read as an authority, and he declares that he has no time for Atheism, and flirts with so-called Catholic intellectualism! What a muddle!

We have Eric Gill's unnecessary and much over-rated Autobiography before us as we write, published by Jonathan Cape, in 1941. Let the Socialist and Pacifist reader study it for himself.

Chapter VI. (page 131) opens by saying:—

We entered the enchanted garden of Christian marriage in the year 1904 when I was twenty-two years old.

This is a most orthodox description of ecclesiastical blessing for mating. There is an Anarchist and a Socialist view of marriage that does not deem the process of conventional conformity and all that it implies as the highest expression of mating between the sexes. The man who could use this expression was not a Socialist. And Eric Gill meant it slavishly and orthodoxly, with the male human as everything in the family, and the female human the mere appendage.

In the same chapter, page 182, Gill writes:—

So, it was now somewhere about the year 1911, I seriously began to consider the practical steps which were necessary if you contemplated joining the Church. In my own mind I was a Roman Catholic already—because the Catholic Church claimed to rule the world in the name of God and I knew no other institution that even claimed to do so. The mere claim was a proof of its justification. No institution could make such a claim and not be justified.

And so on. The writer of this theological and philosophical authoritarian nonsense is said to be "a true Socialist" by a man claiming to be an Anarchist: denouncing "culture," in a book circulated by Anarchists claiming to be Atheists!

The chapter proceeds to describe how Gill gave up rationalist books (which he read for a short period) for Chesterton, and concludes:—

So on February 22nd, my 31st birthday, 1913, we went together and were baptized and on the following Saturday the three little girls followed in their parents' footsteps.

Note, the woman's view did not matter. Gill became a Catholic! So, in Christian marriage, his wife had to become a Catholic! She had no mind, no vision, no spiritual experience of her own. And the three girls followed the following Sunday. Ram, ewe, and baa-lambs! Anarchists circulate this intolerable rubbish as—Socialist and Anarchist literature! Why not circulate the Messenger of the Sacred Heart and be perfect in their Anarchist activity?

In chapter VII., on page 198, Gill makes what is supposed to be a rather smart, but is actually almost smutty reference to copulation. Any and every Catholic would find this reference offensive if we wrote it. But we are only an Atheist and an Anarchist. And Herbert Read would not approve of our directness of speech.

Gill proceeds to describe the advantages of having joined the Church of Rome (page 200):—

It was less than a year after our reception into the Church that I got the job of carving the set of representatives called "the Stations of the Cross" in the new Westminster Cathedral. . . . This job lasted four years. Fortunately I had other work as well, or I could not possibly have carried on. Among other things I had a big war memorial to do in Dorset. And this brings me to "the Great War."

The Stations of The Cross! Big War Memorial! True Socialist! Pacifist! Such are our estimates of value.

This true Artist (sic), this true Socialist (sicker), who did the big war memorial at Dorset to give expression to the greatness of his pacifist soul, describes his war reaction (pages 201-205):—

I suppose it will be clear to anyone who reads this book that I wasn't the sort of person to go rushing headlong to the recruiting station as so many of my friends did. Nor was I the sort to suffer agonies of doubt and indecision as to my duty. . . . Wars might be just or unjust but they were not, as far as my thinking then went, in any way particularly inhuman. . . . . It didn't make any difference whatever to my life. I went on with my work and we went on with our endeavours to make a holy and human life for ourselves and for our children. I was certainly not in the least ashamed because I didn't join up. I thought quite simply and quite honestly that it was no affair of mine. I was not a pacifist in the specific sense of that word, still less "a conscientious objector." I said quite openly, I will go when they call me up—not before. I didn't ask for exemption and I made no effort whatever to obtain it, but I made no objection when an influential friend, entirely out of the enthusiasm of his heart, obtained an exemption for me until I had completed my job at Westminster Cathedral. I finished it in August, 1918, and I was "called up" in September and was put into the Royal Air Force Mechanical Transport.

My war experience was therefore entirely unheroic. I was conscripted in September and was out of it before Christmas—rather less than four months and all of them spent in home camps learning to drive motor lorries and going round the said camps as a scavenger.

Gill describes this four months as a monstrous and momentous period of desolation.

At the time of his conscription Eric Gill was thirty-six years old. He had no thought on war; was utterly indifferent. Had no courage to oppose it. Centred in his family and called this callousness "Christian marriage," Read calls him "a true Socialist," and Pacifists say it is essential to read and to study him to understand pacifism. What imposture!

It makes one's blood boil to think of Herbert Read being applauded as an Anarchist in view of his own confessed record, and to know that Anarchists (so-called) are circulating writings in which Read eulogises Gill as "a true Socialist."

On page 93, Gill writes of his mood in 1899 as "a mood of desperation, even a sort of rationalism." On pages 110-112, he describes becoming an agnostic—for five minutes—and taking "to reading the sixpenny booklets of the Rationalist Press Association and Fabian tracts." But these were too much for Eric Gill, and he proceeds to complain (p. 112): "Of course, the agnostical socialist cannot see further than death."

This writing appeals to a number of our Catholic Pacifist friends, especially to some school teachers, who at one time insisted, in their sublime impertinent ignorance, that one could not be a pacifist without studying Gill. They could not understand that the man was devoid of heroism, of responsibility, and integrity. Even his "enchanted garden of Christian marriage" was a lie. He did not enter in because he did not remain loyal to the ideal it is supposed to define.

In chapter VII, headed "Postscript," section 5, sub-headed "Escapades," Gill writes (pages 270-272):—

Another thing I was entangled in concurrently with my entanglement in the Arts and Crafts movement and from which I had to make a more or less ignominious escape was the Socialist movement. I had been a fairly enthusiastic member of the Fabian Society, and had even got so far as to lecture to that earnest body of reformers. . . .

There was a great wave of Nietzschian influence among us at that time, and I completely succumbed to it in company with a young Fabian woman with whom, largely on account of our mutual enthusiasm, I fell very much in love. All these things went very much together and formed between them a pretty complicated entanglement. My Socialist enthusiasm was perfectly genuine, so was my enthusiasm for Nietzsche. . . . And my love affair was a genuine mixture of matter and spirit—both real and both good. . . . I solved the problem in a practical though unheroic manner. I went off with my Fabian friend for a week and thus, having cleared away the passionate side of the matter, was in a clear frame of mind. It was, as anyone who has been through such turmoil knows, a heart-rending experience. I won't attempt to harrow the reader with a description of my agonies—sleeplessness, exhaustion, misery. But I came back with my problems solved—and was reconciled. Perhaps this adventure marked the turning point and I saw that Socialism and Neitzscheanism . . . could not, for me, supply a practical rule of life. I was too deeply in love with the mother of my children and too deeply in love with the Christian idea of family and the home and parental love, thus to throw everything away. I could not bear it. I should have broken my own heart as well as hers It was shortly after this affair that we moved to Ditchling and soon afterwards I resigned from the Fabian Society. It was an escape.

"A true Socialist," writes Read. "The enchanted garden of Christian marriage," writes Gill. And he left the Fabian Society because of his passion for a woman member of the society. He had to get the virus out of his system. Her feelings—what happened to her as a result of his experiment—did not matter. What a humbug the man was in every way: in his piety, his ethics, his patriotism, his militarism, his pacifism. And he is imposed upon us by the stupidity and the charlatanism of his co-intellectual pretenders as a true Socialist, a true Pacifist: someone to be admired—and followed maybe! at a distance, let us hope.

Let us write plainly, even if it costs us friendship and/or support. We do not believe in the enchanted garden of Christian marriage. We do not believe that the first Christians believed in any such garden. We have very definite views and morals on the sex question. We have a very definite concept of freedom which we have avowed and lived up to all our days. But we would not go away for a week with some one as, to use our bold Anglo-Saxon tongue, an experiment in lust. We would not hold that a certain course was vicious or sinful and pursue it. But then we are an Anarchist. We believe in integrity and we aim to express integrity in our living. We are not an intellectual and we are not a pretender. In the struggle to end war and social misery, we have no time for charlatanism in ourself and we do not applaud it in others. Of all moral error, sometimes called sin, there is but one unpardonable offence—hypocrisy. This is unpardonable because it becomes constitutional and strikes at the very essence of life. Hypocrisy is the infamy of living in the darkness of blasphemy, outrage against truth.

It is true that Read makes "Anarchist" atonement for his military conformity in war-time, and respectable conformity all the time, by editing, with an introduction, selections from the writings of Kropotkin. This work is not published by the firm of which Read is a director. It was published by the Freedom Press on December 9, 1942.

At the beginning of this volume of selections, Read makes a quotation from Kropotkin's Anarchist Morality as a keynote for the publication which we have stressed a little more strongly in this article. The Kropotkin quotation reads :—

All we can do is to give advice, and while giving it, we say: "This advice will be valueless if your own experience and observation do not lead you to recognise that it is worth following.

Anarchists can do more than give advice, which is a very cheap thing to do. They can live their philosophy and example their advice. If advice is worth following, it should be followed—lived up to. Can anyone say that Herbert Read has, in the faintest degree, attempted to live his Anarchism? Is his career other than a most conservative respectable expression of stagnant mediocrity? This article has answered this question, and a further study of the writings mentioned will emphasise the accuracy of this indictment. Read's introduction to the Kropotkin selection indicts him and Kropotkin and everyone who pretends to be an Anarchist in the Kropotkin-Read sense.

On page 12, Read describes Kropotkin's settlement as a Socialist or Anarchist agitator in 1886. He adds :—

The remainder of Kropotkin's life was devoted to the elucidation and exposition of the principles of Anarchism.

In this way, Read evades all reference to the war of 1914-18 and to Kropotkin's militarist reaction.

Is this honest writing? One can hardly say that the war was a small issue and that the question of militarism is not involved in Anarchism. If Kropotkin was right, as an Anarchist, to support the war, why does not Read say so? If Kropotkin was wrong, why does not Read record the fact? Why so blatantly and so cowardly leave it? This is not honest but dishonest writing. This is not Anarchism but mediocre reaction.

We feel strongly on this point. We were the first Anarchist writer to declare, in 1914, that Kropotkin intended to go pro-war. We did this in the Herald of Revolt. The Kropotkinists were astounded. Even Emma Goldman, who made her stand against war in the United States, lamented, for some unknown and unintelligible reason, the fact that we were the first person to denounce Kropotkin. Then he had to be repudiated by those who had followed him. But we were never forgiven by these puny, incompetent, misbelieving Anarchist pretenders.

In The Spur for May 1917 appears an article that we wrote in The City Workhouse, Exeter, in April of that year. It describes how we were marched across Exeter, handcuffed, from the Higher Barracks, Exeter, to the Workhouse, under military escort. The essay will be reprinted soon and need not be summarised. It describes a glaring placard, announcing meetings to celebrate the Russian Revolution, and our reaction to a pro-militarist message Kropotkin sent to the Albert Hall meeting celebrating that revolution. Kropotkin's letter had little time for the revolution itself. It justified his rally to the Czar's banner—"which his pro-war attitude was"—in the early days of the war. It repudiated all his one-time anti-militarism.

Herbert Read ignored this reality and falsely speaks of Kropotkin's devotion to Anarchism. What mockery! What knavery! What travesty of thought!

Was excited pleading for war devoting one's life "to the elucidation and exposition of the principles of Anarchism"? When Blatchford went pro-war his Socialist reputation died. When Ramsay MacDonald turned National Government his Socialist reputation vanished. Is there some different standard by which Kropotkin should be judged?

On the same page 12, Read's introduction describes Kropotkin's return to Russia. Again he lies. He says :—

When the despotism of the Czars was finally overthrown in Russia, Kropotkin, though then 75 years old, was one of the first exiles to return to help in the work of reconstruction.

It is simply not true that Kropotkin returned to help in the work of reconstruction. He returned to Russia to pursue the cause of militarism and to pervert the revolution to the cause of war.

Describing Kropotkin's life in Russia, Read quotes Emma Goldman's account of how Kropotkin, early in 1918, grouped around him specialists in political economy and formed a Federalist League. This group was dissolved by the Bolshevik Government and its material was confiscated.

We are opposed to the Bolshevik Government and its record of persecution. We are opposed to the terrible sufferings imposed on the Anarchists: the Anti-Parliamentarians or Old Bolsheviks; and later, the Trotskyists. But the truth concerning Kropotkin is not so simple as this statement by Read implies.

We have before us, as we write, The Birth of Russian Democracy, by A. J. Sack, Director of the then Russian Information Bureau in the United States, published by that Bureau from its office in the Woolworth Building, New York City, in 1918. This is an invaluable History of the Russian Revolution, with accounts of its spiritual leaders, down to that date. It is factual, Anti-Bolshevik, and, as regards Kropotkin, entirely on his side. The author regards him as a saint of the revolution. We are treated to an enthusiastically friendly account of Kropotkin's activity in Russia following his return from exile, as well as given a very complete account of his life. It is not possible to deal with this record in the present essay. We will reproduce later the "Socialist" conspiracy against and denunciation of the Bolsheviks for their Socialist opposition to war. We will reproduce the terrible militarist German extermination speech made by Kropotkin at the National Conference at Moscow, on August 28, 1917. This was one of the most vile and hopelessly warmongering speeches ever uttered by any person. It anticipated and completely overshadowed Vansittart.

Like Gill and Read, Kropotkin wanted in integrity.

Manchester Housing Scandal

In the June issue of The Word we published the resolution of the Aylesbury Borough Council on the matter of housing finance. The Neath Town Council has followed the Aylesbury example. Manchester has endeavoured to do so. Here is the result.

The Housing Committee of Manchester City Council recently decided to build 158 municipal flats at a cost of £67,172. Instead of following the orthodox capitalist municipal method of borrowing this amount, they decided to pay it out of surplus funds in the Housing Revenue Account.

Immediately the Committee's intentions became known the Ministry of Health refused to grant the City Council necessary permission. So Manchester was forced to borrow the money and pay back the capital and interest at the rate of £2847 per annum for 60 years. In effect, the allegedly democratic ratepayers of Manchester have been ordered by the Coalition Government, with its alleged Socialist Ministers, to get into debt to the tune of £170,820, when they could have provided themselves with the flats at a cost of only £67,172.

Local authorities all over the country are to be forced to take these unwanted loans for post-war rebuilding by this capitalist Tory-Labour Coalition administration, whilst the common people are indulging in a hysteria of victory shouting. In this, our commonplace and complacent parliamentary careerists will burden all attempts at social reform with forced levies which will provide the banks, building societies and insurance companies with profits of something like 170 per cent. derived from unnecessary interest charges. Such is municipal and parliamentary democracy.

An increasing number of local authorities are considering supporting the Aylesbury motion for monetary reform in municipal activity. Many municipal Socialists, who oppose our anti-parliamentary ideas, feel that municipal Socialism is an empty phrase, a purposeless capitalist careerism, unless some stand is made on the scandal of exploitative finance. They would embody these practical challenging phases of social credit in their program as a step towards the final struggle for Socialism. The Neath Town Council has followed the example of the Aylesbury Borough Council, and the Hexham U.D.C. also has passed a motion requesting the Government to consider giving support to the motion for monetary reform.

Councillor E. Thomas, in raising the motion at the meeting of the Neath Town Council, referred to the town's increasing debt of more than £600,000 and the annual interest upon it of £30,000. The following notice of motion was seconded by Councillor T. Hugh and was carried by a majority :—

While the Council is fully alive to its responsibilities to the ratepayers in the development of essential public services and the supply of necessary houses, it is gravely concerned about the prospect of the increasing rates these expanding services will impose upon the already over-burdened ratepayers under the existing monetary system, and calls upon the Government to take what steps are necessary to restore to Parliament the sovereign authority over the monetary system which was taken from it in 1694.

The 1694 allusion is a direct challenge to the Bank of England, the finance-power that controls parliamentarism.

CONSCIENCE AND CITIZENSHIP

By LOWELL H. COATE, M.A., Ph.D.
(Superintendent, The Humanist Society of Friends, U.S.A.)

This is the opening chapter (revised) of Dr. Coates' work, "The Conscription of Conscience" (published in U.S.A. in 1934). A revised edition is being published in Britain by the Strickland Press.—Ed.

Until 1930 there was comparatively little discussion concerning the freedom of conscience in the United States, except, of course, during the Great World War when the question as to the Conscientious Objector was raised by the Government and definitely recognised.

The Puritans fled to America in 1620 to escape the persecution of the church and king. America was founded on the belief in liberty of conscience. Roger Williams at Providence was the first completely to separate church and state and allow full toleration for Anglicans, Catholics, Baptists and Quakers. Complete toleration was established by Penn in the Quaker colony of Pennsylvania in 1662.

The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States was adopted in 1791 and provided that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; . . ."

Prior to this amendment there had been some discussion throughout the various colonies as regards the amount of freedom that should be permitted and the extent of toleration which should be granted to the individual's conscience. Some were more tolerant than others. Many were actually more intolerant after coming to "free America" than their previous persecutors had been with them.

But after the adoption of the first amendment to the Constitution it was rather generally accepted that there should be a definite and liberal amount of freedom and toleration for the conscience of every American citizen, and there has been little occasion to raise any further question regarding it during the last century.

But with the arrival of the first World War, a new and greater spirit of nationalism suddenly developed, which raised new problems relative to the question of the individual and his conscience, which, until then, had been generally accepted by all groups and faiths to be sacred unto oneself. Several religious sects, to be sure, had expressed their passive protest against all war and militarism by voluntarily renouncing their right of franchise, even to the extent of refraining from voting for the President of the United States, declaring that it was inconsistent to help elect a Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy whom they refuse military service. This method of silent protest, or "passive resistance," is practiced to this day by some of the Mennonites and Dunkers, or Church of the Brethren.

None of these movements was taken seriously, however, as their protests were merely formal, until America definitely entered the World War. The Draft Law provided noncombatant service for members of all these pacifist sects, including the Quakers and others, but those who objected on conscientious grounds to participating in active warfare, and had no affiliation with any of these pacifist organisations, were classed as Conscientious Objectors, and dubbed as "C.O.'s." They created the first real problem of the United States as regards the government's relation to the individual's conscience.

One Conscientious Objector protested that the principle of the draft was in violation of the 13th Amendment to the Constitution, which provides that "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude . . . shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

The case was carried clear enough to the United States Supreme Court, and near the close a decision was rendered which definitely established the draft law constitutional, and removed permanently any question which might arise on that point.

A different phase of the problem arose after, however, when a few prominent and well-known personalities applied for citizenship in the United States, among them being Madame Schwimmer, an internationalist; Professor Douglas Clyde Macintosh, of Yale University, and Miss Marie Averil Bland, both Canadians; Mrs. Webb, a Quaker, and Miss Graber, a Mennonite. The prominence of these individuals and the slight variations in the different phases of the principles of constitutional freedom of conscience for which they arose centred the public's attention on them in a remarkably unusual way and incidentally served to crystallise a tremendous amount of latent sentiment on the subject.

The point which drew the most fire in the way of editorial discussion throughout the country was the fact that different judges denied citizenship to applicants for naturalisation because they were unable to conscientiously say they would bear arms in any war which the government might declare, even though it might seem to them to be a very unjust war. In other words, in order to become good citizens the judge would require them to perjure their consciences if necessary, and in several cases insisted upon it.

The whole proposition involved the question of freedom of conscience, and had its original setting on quite a definite anti-passive basis. The continual refusal of the courts to grant citizenship to applicants who confessed to some degree of pacifism, or who insisted that in all cases they must put conscience above law, resulted in a somewhat complex situation in which the real issues easily became confused. Each successive episode threw light upon the matter from a different angle. If there are any who doubt that a situation existed for which a remedy was needed, perhaps they will be impressed by the record of a case which was reported only in "The Christian Century," April 9, 1930, directly by the party most immediately concerned.

This was the case of Rev. T. F. King, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Lake Arthur, Louisiana. Its essential facts can best be told in Mr. King's own words in a letter under date of March, 1930. He writes:

Last November I received notice advising me to appear in court for the final hearing of my application for citizenship. The examination proceeded smoothly until the judge came to the question of war, and here I will set down the gist of the conversation between the judge and myself.

Judge—"What did you do during the World War?"

Answer—"I served for three years in the British army, and spent about fifteen months overseas in Salonica." (I showed the judge the discharge papers verifying this.)

Judge—"Supposing the United States engaged in a war that you considered was wrong, what would be your attitude?"

Answer—"I would consider it my duty to protect and defend democracy."

Judge—"But supposing, take a concrete case, California wanted more territory, and decided to seize some in Mexico, and every man was drafted for some form of service, would you object or be loyal?"

Answer—"I do not believe the United States would engage in such a war."

Judge—"I do not want any conditions. Under such circumstances, a war of aggression, would you object?"

Answer—"In all probability I would. I would first have to consider my duty to God and to humanity."

Judge—"In other words, you cannot subscribe under any and every condition to the doctrine, "My country right or wrong"?

Answer—"No."

Judge—"Then you cannot be admitted. What we want are citizens who are prepared to say, "My country right or wrong, but my country."

In a separate sheet I am giving further particulars, which need not be published. The above letter tells all that is necessary.

(Signed) T. F. KING.

On a "separate sheet" are given the names and addresses of the judge and the clerk of the court, and the place and date, November 4th, 1929, of the hearing. This information has been checked against the Louisiana reports and we find that the judge named is a judge of a Louisiana State Court residing at that time at the place mentioned.

The King case went one step beyond that of Professor Macintosh.

In the Macintosh case the applicant declared that, in the event of being called upon to participate in a war, he would be compelled to exercise his own judgment as to its justice, and that he would consider an order to serve in an unjust war to be a violation of his higher duty to his conscience. It was replied by some critics that an applicant for citizenship should have such faith in his government's integrity that he would not envisage the possibility of its engaging in an unjust war. In the case of Mr. King, the applicant did express such faith and it was the judge who insisted upon conjuring up the hypothesis of a patently unjust war and demanded that the applicant for citizenship should avow his willingness to bear arms in the furtherance of such a program, and presumably of any other upon which the government might embark.

This indicates the nature and importance of the problem as it developed in the United States prior to the second World War.

Madame Schwimmer, avowed pacifist, was rejected because, believing all war to be wrong, she confessed that she would never bear arms, even if, in spite of her sex and years, the government should order her to do so.

Mrs. Webb, a Quaker, and Miss Graber, a Mennonite nurse, sharing the anti-war convictions of their respective communions, were refused citizenship because they said that, while they would die for the country of their proposed adoption, they would not kill for it.

Professor Macintosh, though not irrevocably opposed to war on principle, volunteered the admission that his oath of obedience and loyalty must be qualified by the consideration that he would not fight in what he believed to be an unjust war.

Mr. King would have been satisfied with swearing to protect and defend the laws and the constitution,—as some critics said that Professor Macintosh ought to have done and could very honestly have done—but in his case the judge forced the issue by insisting that it was an indispensable test of fitness for citizenship that one should be wiling to take his oath to participate in a war even if he knows it to be unjust and wrong.

Analyzing this whole situation "The Christian Century" for the date mentioned already, had this comment to make:

"It becomes increasingly clear that the question is not, What do you think about war, but, What will you do in case of war?"

Madame Schwimmer would not have been rejected if she had been willing to say: "Yes, I believe that war is wrong, but I will fight if I am called upon to do so."

Mrs. Webb and Miss Graber would not have been rejected if they had said: "We have religious convictions according to which killing an enemy in war is as great a sin as killing a fellow-citizen in time of peace, but if the government orders us to kill we will set our religious convictions aside and kill."

Professor Macintosh would not have been rejected if he had said: "If war arises which I believe to be contrary to the will of God I will relegate God to the status of a secondary authority and implicitly obey the command of the government, no matter what I think about it."

In fact, that is substantially what the court seems to have tried to get Professor Macintosh to say, and what all the editors who defended the action of the court criticise him for not saying. One and all, they agreed that a citizen may have his private opinion as to the right or wrong of a command of the government but that the criterion of loyalty is obedience, regardless of one's personal judgment as to right and wrong, or "the will of God."

Mr. King would have come through with flying colours if he had said: "Of course we both know that a war of aggression against Mexico would be wrong, but if Congress should declare such a war to win territory you can count on me to serve at the front just as actively as I did in the Great War when I thought I was helping to make the world safe for democracy."

In all of these cases quite evidently the real question was not, What do you think? but, Will you obey commands no matter what you think?

On June 30th, 1930, the following announcement appeared in the daily news dispatches:

"By a decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, the former decision of Judge Burrows of the district court refusing citizenship to Professor Douglas C. Macintosh has been reversed."

To Judge Burrows it appeared that declaring one's unwillingness to do what he considered morally wrong, even if the government commanded it, or more especially to refuse to engage in a war which the applicant deemed unjust, constituted a defect in one's devotion to the constitution and the laws of this country. Unconditional obedience was to be the test of loyalty. "There's no other way but to trust and obey" the government, said Judge Burrows. "One must obey God rather than the government, if the two conflict," said Professor Macintosh. Judge Martin T. Manton said that Professor Macintosh was right.

"There is a distinction between justifiable and unjustifiable wars recognised in international law. The rights of conscience are inalienable rights which the citizen need not surrender and which the Government or society cannot take away," wrote Judge Manton in the Macintosh case, and went on to point out that the Kellogg pact recognised the distinction between "a morally justified and an unjustifiable war."

The case was later carried to the United States Supreme Court, for it was considered less important for one man to get citizenship than it is to have the highest court decide whether the abdication of conscience to civil law is a fundamental principle of our constitution.

An examination of the editorial pages gave the impression that controlled press public opinion was not in unanimous agreement with Judge Manton's opinion that conscience should be permitted to attach reservations to the oath of allegiance. For while many joined with the "New York World" in applauding the ruling of the Court of Appeals, others agreed with the "Boston Transcript" that the decision of the lower courts was sound, because it is not easy to see "How any man is competent to interpret with exactness the will of God."

Of Miss Bland the court wrote:

"This applicant said that she would promise to defend the constitution as far as her conscience as a Christian would allow. The government, by its constitution and by its acts of Congress, never exacted more from any applicant."

Judge Manton — and for that matter Miss Bland's attorney—both took occasion to deny that her case paralleled that of Mms. Rosika Schwimmer, the Hungarian pacifist, who was denied citizenship by the United States Supreme Court, a year earlier

"because she had no sense of nationalism, but only a cosmic sense of belonging to the human family."

All three of these cases were fought purely as a matter of principle, since the persons concerned were all beyond the age of active military service. Miss Bland was forty-seven, Professor Macintosh was fifty-three, and Madame Schwimmer at the time she applied for citizenship was forty-nine.

Sitting with Judge Manton in the Court of Appeals were Judge Swan and Judge Hand, and the decisions in the case of Mr. Macintosh were unanimous. In his rather lengthy opinion Judge Manton said, in part:

The question presented here differs from that presented in the case of Schwimmer vs. United States. She stated that she was an absolute atheist, and said, "I am not willing to bear arms," but she was willing to do everything that an American citizen must do except fight. This applicant was willing to bear arms and reserved merely the right to determine for himself whether the war was justified according to the dictates of his conscience.

Mhe. Schwimmer said she was an uncompromising pacifist, and was found to have no sense of nationalism, but only a cosmic sense of belonging to the human family, and opposed the use of military force as admitted by the Constitution and by the laws.

The appellant, on the other hand, was willing to give the United States "all the allegiance he had ever given or ever could give any country," but said he would not put allegiance to Government of any country before the will of God. This appellant, from his answers, indicates an upright sense of obligation to his God, and has carefully explained his willingness to be a citizen of the United States, assuming the responsibilities and obligations of its form of government, and at the same time he has a high regard for his general duty to humanity. He wishes to keep pure his religious scruples.

It will, of course, be recognised as a duty of the citizen to bear arms in defence of his country, but there is also the well-recognised affection for his government if, by reason of a conscientious religious scruple, he requests being excused from bearing arms. . . . Nor is there any fixed principle of the Constitution of this country requiring a citizen with conscientious scruples to nevertheless bear arms in time of war. Congress has recognised that persons having conscientious scruples against bearing arms shall be exempt.

No more is demanded of an alien who becomes a citizen than a natural-born citizen, and when an alien becomes a citizen he is accorded all the rights and privileges accorded to a natural-born citizen.

Appellant's application should have been granted.

While applauding the decision in favour of Dr. Macintosh and Miss Bland, the New York World remarks:

"Judge Manton was evidently handicapped in his ruling by the decision of the Supreme Court in 1928 upholding the denial of citizenship to Madame Schwimmer. In order to get around that decision it was necessary for the Court of Appeals to draw as sharp a distinction as possible between these cases. It found certain differences, and they were mainly religious. Dr. Macintosh merely wished to 'keep pure his religious scruples.' Madame Schwimmer, however, was 'an absolute atheist,' and an 'uncompromising pacifist, with no 'sense of nationalism."

During the same session of the court in which Madame Schwimmer was denied citizenship for her refusal to bear arms a young Italian by the name of Zangara agreed to bear arms and was granted citizenship. He apparently took his oath too seriously, as it was he who later shot and killed Mayor Cermak of Chicago and threatened the life of the then President-elect Roosevelt. Such is the irony of such inconsistency.

Cicero long ago showed that the highest law derives from the welfare of the people. Right is that which should be granted because experience has proved it to be good; it must validate itself. There is no divine right either in kings, nor in democratic majorities, which may become as tyrannical as any dictator. Both have frequently been known to be wrong, and the great and significant advances in history have been made by individuals or groups who were unimpressed by the mob mind, or who dared to resist the authority of both church and state when they became tyrannical.

As H. J. Laski says in The Problem of Sovereignty:

"That state will be the stronger which binds to itself members by the strength of a moral purpose validated. The legal sovereignty of a state is not identical with its moral sovereignty. Government does not stand above the moral code of the individuals."

Mr. Laski further avers that:

"All great advances in human history have been made possible because individual men and women have acted on what they believed to be true whether it was popular or unpopular, whether it was safe or perilous, and most often when it was both unpopular and perilous. Disarmament will come about when a sufficient number of people refuse any longer to bear arms, to manufacture armament, or to ask for armed protection. To deny the authority of conscience is therefore to deprive a man of his moral personality."

To deny it is to commit moral suicide, to move to utter degradation.

The state is a territory over which there is a government claiming or exercising authority. Sovereignty is the ability of the government to secure general assent.

There is no sanction for law except the consent of the human mind. The safeguards of the state are therefore the wills of its members. But the state is only one organization among many, and it must be estimated by what it accomplishes for the community. The purpose of the state, it has been well said, is to help the individual to be his best self and to enable all to live "the good life". But right cannot be determined by majority, and as between the state and the individual, the individual has no right that does not involve the good of society, while the state has no right or moral coercion over the individual conscience.

We are obliged to differentiate between the nation and the state, and Patriotism must be distinguished from loyalty to the state. Instances have occurred repeatedly in history where men have best served their country by resisting its government, as in the case of Cromwell, Washinton, and the signers of the Declaration of Independence, or Garrison on the question of slavery.

In the report of the Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship held in England in 1924, we read:

"Even when the government is dominated by public opinion and popular sentiment, no such infallibility can be claimed for it as to forbid the independent judgment of the individual conscience, even admitting that too may, and often does, err. Still less can the state claim such absolute moral authority, when the machinery of government is, as sometimes happens, being used by politicians for their own individual interests, or the interests of a class or group."

And Doctor Charles E. Jefferson insists that:

"This love of country will sometimes lead a citizen to resist the authority of Caesar. No government is given authority by God to force men to do what they believe is wrong."

No less an authority than Zachariah Chaffee, Professor of Law in Harvard University, states in his Freedom of Speech:

"It is true that a majority decision is the best way of determining how the government shall act, but it is not the best way of deciding what is right."

Further evidence could be accumulated on this point, but we shall now proceed to the grounds on which freedom of conscience is particularly based. The right of liberty of conscience is claimed on the grounds of individual and social right.

As an individual right, the claim to liberty of conscience is based on the slow evolution of society and the painful achievement of our common humanity, won through long centuries of conflict between authority and freedom. The fight for freedom of thought began twenty-five centuries ago among the Greeks of Ionia. It came to a climax at the trial of Socrates two centuries later, in 399 B.C. The two-fold issue was freedom of speech and freedom of conscience.

Socrates maintained the supremacy of the individual conscience, that a man cannot be coerced by any human authority into any course which his own mind condemns as wrong; and also maintained the public value of free discussion. The sun might as well be spared from the universe as free speech from the liberal institutions of society, he declared.

At the age of seventy this reformer-philosopher of Athens was arraigned before his 501 judges on a nominal charge of being an atheist and a corrupter of the youth. In his noble Apology he challenges them thus:

"If you propose to acquit me on condition that I abandon my search for truth, I will say: I thank you, O Athenians, but I will obey God, who as I believe set me this task rather than you."

For twenty-three centuries since Socrates, a long line of martyrs has maintained the individual right of freedom of conscience. The stoics upheld individual right against public authority, and the Roman Republic allowed full liberty of opinion. But when Christianity became the one exception, punishable with death, millions laid down their lives rather than yield to the authority of the state in the worship of the Emperor, or taking service in the army. It was their stand for liberty of conscience which at last won the edict of toleration in 311 A.D.

It was liberty of conscience which was held against the tortures of the Inquisition. The Renaissance from the Thirteenth Century won back for Europe intellectual freedom, and the Reformation won moral freedom by another succession of distinguished martyrs. John Huss in 1498; Servetus by Calvin in 1553, because he doubted the doctrine of the Trinity; and Giordano Bruno in 1600 in Rome for his heresies of belief in the science of Copernicus.

Meantime the fight for liberty of conscience was being continued in England. John Milton wrote his "Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing," in 1644. John Locke followed with his "Letter Concerning Toleration," and John Stuart Mill published his essay "On Liberty" in 1859.

This brings the story of the struggle for individual freedom of conscience down to comparatively recent times. It is apparent that there has always been a danger of the encroachment of the state upon personal rights from the time of the Pharaohs, who built the pyramids by slave labour, to Louis XIV, who proclaimed "I am the State," and even to the democratic majorities of our own day. As one commentator has said, "The voice of the majority is neither that of God nor of the devil, but of man."

"If fifty-one per cent. of the Senate, including those interested in the manufacture of munitions, vote for war, I cannot on that account surrender to them the control of my conscience upon a moral issue," writes Sherwood Eddy.

The fight for liberty as a legal right has been a long one. The old demands of the barons in 1215 formed the basis of the Great Charter of Anglo-Saxon liberties, "to all freemen . . . for us and our heirs forever." These ancient Anglo-Saxon rights of liberty are reasserted in the United States Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776, and are further defined in the American Constitution.

In our state constitutions, twenty-six states declare in substance that it is "the privilege of every man to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience," and nineteen declare that "no human authority ought to control, or interfere with, the rights of conscience."

William Penn wrote into the constitution of New Jersey that "No man or number of men on earth have power or authority over man's conscience in religious matters."

Voltaire once said to a friend: "I disagree with every word you say, but would give my life for your right to say it."

Attorney General Stone, while Dean of the Columbia Law School, with Judge Julian Mack, of Chicago, made an official investigation of "conscientious objectors" for the Wilson administration during the first great war. In a remarkable survey of the subject, he insists that:

"Both sound morals and sound policy require that the state should not violate the conscience of the individual. All our history gives information of the view that liberty of conscience has a moral and social value which makes it worthy of preservation at the hands of the State . . . When one realises the seriousness of their purpose and the power of their influence . . . he can have no illusion that the mere application of force to them (conscientious objectors) . . . will bring any real solution of the problem . . . Not a few of them were sentenced to be shot and others were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment by courts-martial for disobedience to military orders, and all were subjected to indignities, and in many cases to physical violence by their more patriotic fellows . . . As was to be expected, cowards and slackers sought refuge among them, but the number of such was much smaller than has generally been supposed . . . Most of them . . . were neither physical nor moral cowards . . . One of them, Richard L. Stierheim, was drafted and sent overseas before the government had provided any means for relief for the conscientious objector.

In France he refused to perform military service and deserted. He was tried by court-martial for desertion, convicted, and sentenced to death. While awaiting execution of sentence, on November 3, 1918, as reported by the commanding General, he volunteered to go out into No Man's Land, at imminent peril of his life to rescue the wounded. He rescued six men unassisted, under machine-gun fire. He then volunteered to go into No Man's Land to bury the dead, and for nine successive days he continued to render service of this character, exposing himself unhesitatingly to imminent peril of death in the aid and succour of wounded men. General Pershing forwarded his record to the Judge Advocate General with the recommendation that his sentence be remitted and that he be assigned to duty with the non-combatant service.

It is against the background of twenty-three centuries of human fight for freedom, of a thousand years of struggle in Anglo-Saxon countries for religious and political liberty, and full three centuries of American traditions that the social right of liberty of individual conscience on moral issues in peace or in war is claimed.

RICHARD CARLILE DATA

Since we commenced our Richard Carlile studies considerable interest in his "life" and work has been evinced by readers and comrades throughout the United States. Evidence of this fact is to be found in our correspondence columns.

The late Mr. W. Van Der Weyde, at that time President of the Thomas Paine National Historical Association, wrote us from New York, under date Aug. 25, 1914, an appreciative letter of the large and very full penny pamphlet (1912) "Life" of Richard Carlile we were circulating then. This "life" is embodied in our Richard Carlile, Agitator (1941). With Carlile's Jail Journal (1942) and Dr. Brook's Carlile and the Surgeons (1943), this biography tends to raise interest in the great struggle for civil and intellectual liberty, and the fearless stand for world democracy made by Carlile. These books should be studied and circulated widely by every lover of human freedom. These three well illustrated books will be sent post-free for six shillings. Copies will be sent freely to United States enquirers since it is invaluable to the development and defence of civil liberty in the United States to know something of Carlile's thoughts and battle in Britain.

Mr. Van der Weyde wrote:

I am so glad that you are interested in Carlile. He was indeed a remarkable man and the bravest of champions for truth and justice. In America, Carlile and his splendid fight for free speech, free press, anti-militarism, is practically unknown. I appreciate that, in present day England, too, he is hardly better known, and you have rendered the world a great service in publishing your fine pamphlet about him. Mrs. Carlile Campbell's biography of her father, "The Battle for the Freedom of the Press," interested me greatly, but your pamphlet more. . . . Good luck to you!

Mrs. Carlile Campbell was Richard Carlile's youngest child, Theophila. She was the daughter of Eliza Sharples. She died in the United States on January 21, 1913, in her seventy-eighth year.

At the time of her death, Theophila was the last surviving child of Richard Carlile. On the death of their mother, Eliza Sharples ("Isis"), the children of Carlile's second union went to the United States. The elder daughter, Hypathia, married, was widowed, and died in extreme poverty in Chicago somewhere about 1880. Theophila married Colin M. Campbell, one of the first and most formidable of Bradlaugh's disputants in Bonner's Fields, in 1848. Colin Campbell lived to the age of ninety, mentally clear and vigorous to the end. He died in Chicago on April 13, 1906. Theophila survived him nearly seven years, but was over twenty years his junior. She left a daughter, Mrs. Theophilus Campbell Bassett, who cherished the memory of her mother's family. The Bassett family should possess some Carlile correspondence, records and manuscripts.

Mrs. Campbell's "life" of her father was published in 1899, under the title of "The Battle of The Press." We quoted this "life" in chapter XXVI. of our Carlile biography (1941 revised and enlarged edition). We criticised it in our 1912 edition. Whilst holding to the criticism, we thought that it was unnecessary to embody it in the later edition. We intend to review the "lives" of Carlile in a separate essay.

Her brother, Julian, was killed in the American Civil War. He was born in 1834 and was three years older than Theophila.

In our journal, The Commune, for September, 1928, we reprinted the speech made by James Watson, one of Carlile's colleagues or shopmen, at the Hall of the Literary and Scientific Institution, John Street, Fitzroy Square, London, on January 23, 1854. A public tea was given to Watson on the occasion of his retirement from Radical bookselling. In the speech, Watson recounted the story of his own life and of Richard Carlile's struggle for the freedom of the press.

The day after the meeting Watson received a letter addressed to him from Liverpool as follows:—

Liverpool, January 23, 1854.

My Dear Watson,—Here am I in Liverpool, and after travelling by sea and land a month, to have the pleasure of seeing you, of dropping in at some Paine celebration, where you might be presiding, I learn from the "Reasoner" that a party is to be given to yourself this night, at which trains and time alike forbid my being present. It is inexpressibly annoying, but "suffering is the badge of all our tribe." I shall arrive soon after this.

Ever yours affectionately,

RICHARD CARLILE.

This letter was from Richard Carlile's eldest son, who had been present at the burial of his father at Kensal Green cemetery, London, in February, 1843. Three years later he emigrated to America and settled in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where he became a member of the legislature. He had moved the adjournment of the House of Representatives in 1853, on the anniversary of Paine's birthday, to call attention to Thomas Paine's services to the cause of human freedom, and had organised a local dinner in memory of Paine, at which 600 persons had participated.

On February 12, 1854, a dinner was given to Richard Carlile the younger at the Hall of Science, City Road, London, at which 40 leading Free-thinkers were present. At night, a packed public meeting was held and a public presentation made to Carlile. James Watson presided.

After Watson had told of his intimate association with the guest and the guest's father—he had known the guest of the evening from childhood—Robert Blond paid a tribute to the memory of Richard Carlile senior, and proposed the toast: Reformers, Political and Religious, throughout the world.

G. J. Holyoake said that the London Secular Society had convened the gathering to pay a tribute to the memory of Richard Carlile, and a deserved compliment to his son. He eulogised Carlile for having "taught freethinking audacity"; without which a freethinking party could never have been built up. But his speech suggested that such audacity was needed no longer.

Holyoake continued:—

The first cup of tea I took in London was in the parlour below with Richard Carlile; and the first discussion I held in London was on this platform and with himself. On my trial he stood by my side, and my first provisions in prison were brought by his hands. When I was again at liberty, he had been two months in his grave; and it is no small pleasure to me to be able, this night, to offer to his son the thanks I owe to his father.

Holyoake presented the address, worded:—

ADDRESS BY THE LONDON SECULAR SOCIETY TO RICHARD CARLILE,

Of Wisconsin, U.S.A., on his visit to England. Presented at the Hall of Science, City Road, February 12, 1854.

The people of Scotland entertained the sons of Burns, not because they had written "Tam O'Shanter, but because their father had! nor do we think it necessary that you should have reproduced your father's career to be entitled to public respect. We honour you for your father's sake. "The good men do" should not "be interred with their bones"—the services of those who suffer in the public cause should be a heritage to their children. We are gratified at the useful cause you have pursued in America, and you drew the attention of the legislature of Wisconsin to the honour due to our countryman, Paine, to whom Republican America owes so much and acknowledges so little. Your father nobly vindicated Paine, his political and religious works. Your father, by his impassable courage, legalised Free Discussion among the English people; and we pray you to accept this address, and carry back to Wisconsin this testimony of the esteem in which his services are held in England.

This was signed by the chairman, the speakers at the meeting, and the Committee of the London Secular Society.

Richard Carlile replied. He was received warmly. He expressed thanks in the name of his father. He had shared many of the consequences of his father's devoted career, but he honoured his father's memory for that very spirit of public devotion. None of the privations his father suffered in prison were equal to those he suffered in poverty. His father had friends, but they were of no use to him in his struggle. Had his father been the Bank of England, his means would have been insufficient to his purpose. His father would have flooded the country with the Age of Reason and the Rights of Man.

After an absence of eight years, he found little improvement in England. There were no more Halls of Science. Thought was stagnating. For himself, he would sweep the Bible away. In America, only the religious had defended slavery, and they had done so from the Bible. The address presented to him would hang on his walls at Milwaukee.

Other speakers included Richard Moore, C. F. Nicholls, James Cross, and J. P. Adams, Hon. Secretary, London Secular Society.

The following day, Holyoake approached Richard Carlile for a written report of his speech. Carlile, whose manner suggested distance, and contrasted sharply with his regard for James Watson, replied that he spoke without notes. This reply was dated February, 15, 1854, and put Holyoake in his place. It eulogised American Institutions and expressed the younger Carlile's determination to end his days in America, "under institutions not likely to exist in England in my time."

He was right.

Carlile was given presents of books to be taken back from England to Horace Greely, Lloyd Garrison, Joseph Barker, Dr. Frederick Hollick, and others.

Before leaving London he was ill with asthma. The Reasoner, edited by Holyoake, and described as "the Gazette of Secularism," had reported Carlile's arrival in England, the dinner to him, and his declaration of American citizenship. In its issue for Sunday, June 11, 1854, it published an account of his death.

Taken ill during the voyage, he was so ill when the ship reached New York that the captain had him removed to Staten Island Hospital, where he died the same day. His widow did not learn of his fate until a month after his burial.

During his illness en voyage Carlile's boxes had been broken into and plundered. His small farm in Milwaukee was mortaged, but the bond was cleared by an American Freethinker, named Harris.

Richard Carlile the younger left seven children, three boys, aged 18, 16 and 13 respectively; four girls, who were younger.

Some descendants of these children should be living in America. It should be possible for our American comrades to trace records of the activities of Richard Carlile of Milwaukee, and perhaps throw more light on the activity of Richard Carlile, of Ashburton and London, of glorious Free-thought and Republican memory. There must be some records in Milwaukee.

Richard Carlile the younger was the eldest of Carlile's six children. He was the son of Jane Carlile and his two younger brothers were Alfred and Thomas Paine Carlile. Julian Carlile was his half-brother and Theophila and Hypatia Carlile his half-sisters.

SOUTH PLACE

A STORY OF HERESY, PROGRESS AND CULTURE.

Fox contributed to the Monthly Repository for many years, and edited it from 1831 to 1836. This journal contains a more complete history of the progress of English thought and reform than any other paper published during the same period.

Fox helped Mill found The Westminster Review, and drew around him a fine literary circle, which included Hazlitt, Douglas Jerrold, and Leight Hunt. He gave the first welcome to the Martineaus. Harriet has been mentioned, but his relations with James have not been touched upon.

James Martineau was a fellow-citizen of Norwich. Early in 1831, Fox visited Martineau in Dublin and preached before the newly formed Unitarian Association there. Fox "dedicated" Martineau's eldest son, Russell, afterwards the distinguished Hebraist of the British Museum. In October, 1831, Martineau was invited to succeed the Rev. P. Taylor in Eustace Street Chapel, Dublin, but refused on a matter of principle connected with the State. His admirable letter of resignation was accepted on November 13, 1831, and published by Fox a month later in the Monthly Repository. Martineau visited Fox at Dalston, and preached in South Place. Fox asked him to settle in London and become head of the Stamford Street Congregation. But Hope Street, Liverpool, invited Martineau, and he went to Liverpool. Martineau contributed to the Monthly Repository so long as Fox was editor.

South Place was a true pioneer Humanist Society. It was the first religious society to petition against the wrongs of deists, the death penalty for theft, the oppression of woman, and to insist on the national education of both sexes. At the Society's dinner at the London Tavern, on February 6, 1833, Fox, as chairman, with the poet Campbell at his side, proposed the toast which was the motto of the Society: Civil and Religious Liberty!

Fox looked back over the seventeen years he had proposed the Toast, and described the persecution of Richard Carlile, the Manchester Massacre, the Six Acts, the French revolutionary struggle, and the Society's sympathetic attitude towards America. He concluded:—

"You will remember how often her sons have mixed with us at these social meetings, and how often we have found delight in contemplating that noble country, with her broad rivers, her rich and yet uncultivated plains, her cities ever and anon springing up in her desert wilds—with the horn of plenty in her hand, and the olive of peace on her brow, and crown and mitres under her feet. With feelings the most expansive to all our fellow-creatures, and the most firm as regards our own principles, let us drink, 'Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over!'"

In 1833 Fox ceased to administer the sacrament, and the trustees of Dr. Williams' Trust took back the communion plate they had lent to South Place. Men who give others their own flesh and blood to eat, and the recipients of such communion, find sacraments turned into fossils—not bread, but stone. He desired to preserve the sentiment of old observances; for christening, he substituted "dedication", and for the communion proposed a friendly supper.

In 1834, Fox offered to resign. His resignation was not accepted. In accepting the refusal, Fox delivered a sermon, on September 22, 1834, defining his concept of the power of the pulpit.

"When, more than seventeen years ago, I became the minister of Parliament Court Chapel, where this congregation then assembled, the only confession of faith which was received or required from me was a declaration of belief in the duty of free inquiry and the rights of Religious Liberty. That declaration ought not to be restricted to investigation and profession of theological doctrine. Pulpit instruction, to attain any power of usefulness, must extend to topics of far greater practical importance than the articles of any creed. We must carry into moral questions, into civil and political life, into the investigation of institutions and manners, the same fearlessness and frankness, and the same reference to great principles and ultimate purposes, that are requisite in theology, even though they entail a repetition with aggravations of the same results, in the imputation of bad motives or bad tendencies, the aspersions of character or conduct, and the interruption of that peace which is never advantageously preserved when it obstructs freedom of thought and speech, the promulgation of truth, and the progress of individual or social reformation.

(To be concluded.)

PARLIAMENTARY PAEAN.

Some talk of Alexander,
And some of Winston C.,
Of Morrison and Bevin,
Miss Ellen or Attlee;
But we make NO distinctions,
We're proud of all of us.
Comparisons, we reckon,
Might well prove odious.

We listen to our speeches,
We clap the things we say;
Revenge and Retribution,
Bomb, burn, destroy and slay!
No peace, no rest, no pity!
"Loud cheers," reports the Press,
While several Christian Bishops
Our fiery phrases bless.

Of course, we sometimes bicker,
Or even disagree,
To show we know the meaning
Of true democracy;
But on the major issue
We sing in unison—
Let violence outdo violence
Until our war is won!

The Leader of our leaders
We (most of us) revere.
Each word that slips between his lips
Is music to our ear.
The lovely things he offered;
Blood, tears and toil and sweat,
They made us shriek with pleasure—
Our cheers are ringing yet.

The voice that breathes from Eden
Helps all of us a lot.
At well appointed moments
He keeps our hatred hot
With dreadful horror stories
Of war engendered crimes.
We wallow in our fury,
These ARE exciting times!

That gentle airman, Harris,
Is close held to our heart.
His policy of bombing
Has raised the kindly art
Of blind and bloody slaughter
Up to the n'nth degree.
If Carnage is God's Daughter,
Then what must Harris be?

Alas, we are not perfect,
We have our secret shames,
R.D., J.M., and other
Unmentionable names,
Who deprecate the killing,
The wreckage and the rot;
Who stand up for the conchies—
That vile, peace-loving lot!

Who ask us awkward questions
About our noble aims,
Condemn our ruthless methods,
And call our war rude names;
Who will not even join us
In the mighty cry we raise—
"Unconditional Surrender!"
That magic, lovely phrase!

But these are few in number,
And easily withstood.
In general, as Crusaders
We think we're pretty good.
So we make no distinctions,
We know we're all all right.
Then carry on the killing,
Continue with the fight!

KROPOTKIN AND WAR

By L. PERNO

As one who rejects the law of violence, root and branch, I was somewhat timid in denouncing Peter Kropotkin (whom I had the pleasure of knowing personally) as a militarist, in spite of the fact that I had a letter from him in which he expressed himself definitely in favour of war with Germany in 1915. Together with the rest I admired his lucid theoretical views condemning Militarism, State, Capitalism, exploitation, and War, and, in consequence, felt somewhat hesitant to open my mouth in condemning him for his approval of the war with Germany. After all, contradictory views are regarded everywhere as a normal occurrence, and one might easily look like a little dog trying to drive a big elephant off his set course—it would only annoy him and amuse the public. The logic of non-resistance (or non-violence) has never been popular, and it appeared to me at the time that if an attempt was made to measure the activities of a great revolutionary writer, such as Kropotkin, by such a standard, it might even appear ludicrous. So I decided to keep my thoughts to myself. Readers of The Word can imagine, therefore, how glad I was to find in the August issue an editorial dealing with Kropotkin's militarism. This article has inspired me to express my agreement with the effort of those who wish to keep militarist ideas out of bounds for human affairs.

In May 1915 I wrote a short article about Edward Carpenter, the worthy successor of John Ruskin, pointing out his militarist tendencies in relation to the war against Germany. A copy of this article was sent to Kropotkin. I had heard about his war-mindedness in a roundabout way and was anxious to hear direct from him what views he held on this vital matter.

Below is a translation of Kropotkin's letter, which he wrote to me after perusing the article :

9 Chesham Street, Brighton,
18th June, 1915.

I read carefully your article on Carpenter, but I hesitate to write about it. Our points of departure are so fundamentally different. I shall, however, say one thing.

In my opinion, if you believe that all men are brothers—nay, more than brothers—a whole, of which you are a part—then no act of violence will leave you indifferent; you will define the aggressor and struggle against him by word and deed. Such has always been my attitude.

Tolstoy would have said: One should not resist violence by violence, since every act of violence breeds new violence. That is "his" interpretation of history. History taught me a different lesson.

Carpenter is a man of the world. Wherever he sees violence committed, he responds to it in kind. And such a person could not remain a passive observer of violence committed by Germany (the State "and the people") against the Belgian and French "peoples." He could not remain "neutral," that is to say, in essence, a supporter of this violence.

People who consider themselves the enemies of violence have no right to reproach him for this. Whenever violence is committed, they, more than anyone else, should decide "who is the aggressor," and open activities against him by word and deed. Had the religious people always regarded this as their sacred duty and acted accordingly (as did the knights of the Holy Grail in the folk lore), there would have been less violence in the world, and we should not have to wait for bloody insurrections of the masses to terminate the oppression of man by man.

This point of view, I believe, explains also Carpenter's point of view.

I should have liked to write more fully about it, but am not feeling so well again.

With a firm hand-shake,

P. KROPOTKIN.

This letter calls for some comments.

Tolstoy did not derive his point of view from any particular "interpretation of history." On the contrary, his point of view was a religious-philosophical one, and it would make no difference whether history contradicted it or not. The course of history is nothing but the sequence of events in their chronological order, and we know quite well from our own experience how little these accord with the moral law, or how little influence the manifestation of the moral law in man has had upon the course of events in the past. Nevertheless, the real progress and well-being of mankind depends upon ever greater conscious application of the moral law. Tolstoy's eyes were always fixed on what ought to be, not on what is, or was.

It is remarkable how easily the contradiction involved in Kropotkin's reasoning escapes his attention. He desires that the emancipation of man should not depend exclusively upon bloody insurrections of the masses, and yet he advocates violence, i.e., bloody insurrection, i.e., war, as the only effective remedy. For it was against this remedy that I was arguing in my article on Edward Carpenter, which I sent to Kropotkin for his perusal, and which he regarded as ineffective because it excluded violence.

In the appendix to his book "The Healing of Nations" Carpenter quoted a few "Letters from the Front (from the daily Press)," dated Christmas 1914. In these letters, both the Germans and the English appeared in their true light. Here is the first of these letters :

Last night (Christmas Eve) was the weirdest stunt I have ever seen. All day the Germans had been sniping industriously, with some success, but after sunset they started singing, and we replied with carols. Then they shouted, "Happy Christmas!" to us, and some of us replied in German. It was a topping moonlight night, and we carried on long conversations, and kept singing to each other and cheering. Later they asked us to send one man out to the middle, between the trenches, with a cake, and they would give us a bottle of wine.

Hunt went out, and five of them came out and gave him the wine, cigarettes and cigars. After that you could hear them for a long time calling from halfway, "Engleeshman, kom hier." So one or two more of our chaps went out and exchanged cigarettes, etc., and they all seemed decent fellows.

There were altogether six such letters, all very good, and all revealing one peculiar feature, namely, that the Germans were the first to initiate fraternisation. The British, on the other hand, seemed to be the first to issue a command to the effect that "all communications and friendly intercourse must cease." Those who decided that the "Germans" were the aggressors, naturally must have thought it necessary to pull up the fraternising units before the thing went too far and the effect of hypnotism lost its power over good people.

And yet it was Carpenter himself who spoke of the German "mass-people" (I don't quite like the term) as being "kindly, studious, sociable, rather naively innocent," and of Britain that she had laid land to land and market to market over the globe, and showed no particular scruple in the matter. Why should not Germans—he said—do the same? It was true that Britain always carried the Bible with her—but this was mere British cant. Britain carried the Bible in her left hand, but in her right a sword; and when she used the latter she always let the former drop. Germany could do likewise—but without that odious pretence of morality, and those crocodile tears over the unfortunate whom she devoured. It was only a question of Might and Organisation and Armament.

About these "kindly, studious, sociable, rather naively innocent" mass-Germans, Carpenter said that they were "dragged by the scruff of the neck into the arena of militarism and world politics."

About the British, on the other hand, he said : "A free people will not fight for the trumped-up schemes and selfish machinations of a class—not, unless they are grossly deceived by Press and Class plots."

I, for one, am unable to see why those who were dragged to the battlefield by the scruff of the neck should have greater responsibility for the war than those who were brought there blindfolded by the deceptive Press and Class plots.

It is truly astounding that such good and highly gifted people as were Carpenter and Kropotkin, instead of declaring themselves on the side of the people (or mass-people, according to Carpenter), should have declared themselves on the side of the war, that colossal violence and deception, necessary only for narrow-minded, unscrupulous politicians, adventurers, capitalists, or State-Socialists haunted by the idea of World Revolution.

When during the Russo-Japanese War in 1905, Tolstoy was asked on whose side he was, he replied :

"On neither side, but on the side of the deceived and oppressed working people of both sides."

Indeed, the weak submission of the leaders of the working-classes to the sway of the war-fever artificially created in the laboratories of the Press, Parliament, and Broadcasting House, is a far greater impediment to the emancipation of the people than the actual carnage itself. Wounds will heal, the dead will be buried, and the damage repaired, but unless the leaders, chosen or self-appointed, see the daylight and resist the fever, the calamity will come again and again.

There is but one way out, and that is for the working people to drop their leaders altogether and follow their own good common sense. They will then find that their true friends were there long ago patiently waiting for them to take this obvious step.

"TIME BRINGS MANY CHANGES"

Under this excellent caption, our comrade, the Rev. J. F. Gerrard, B.A., Vicar of St. Thomas's Church, Wigan, publishes the following editorial commentary in his Parish Magazine for August, 1944 :—

Wars will only cease, says Keir Hardie, when the ordinary man refuses to obey the commands of his rulers to murder his fellowman. Left to themselves, men everywhere would seldom resort to murder, so governments spend millions of money on propaganda to whip up the blood-lust and keep it at fever heat. Propaganda has been described as "Pigs' Meat for the Swinish Multitude." Like the present pork rations it can be had off points and in any quantity. Lies, distortions, misrepresentations, are all gist to the propaganda mill, and they are poured forth in an endless stream in speeches, books and wireless talks. The chief weapon of propaganda, used by all countries alike, is the representing of the war they are engaged on as a "holy righteous cause." A study of history books will show that every war has been a "just war"——— for that country which produced the book. But, unfortunately for themselves, the war politicians have not always been consistent in their utterances on war and its causes, and it is interesting and illuminating to disinter some of their speeches from the oblivion in which, we feel sure, they hoped they were buried. We append two gems culled from the writings and speeches of the two most prominent men in the government. The first appeared in "The Labour Leader" for September 3rd, 1914, by Mr. Herbert Morrison, Home Secretary, and the second is from a speech of the Prime Minister in 1938.

YOUR KING AND COUNTRY NEED YOU
By Herbert Morrison.

"Your King and Country Need You! Need hundreds of thousands of you to go to hell and to do the work of hell. The Commandment says: "Thou shalt not kill." Pooh! What does it matter? Commandments, like treaties, were made to be broken. Ask your parson, he will explain. Your King and Country need you! Go forth, little soldier! Though you know not what you fight for, go forth. Though you have no grievance against your German brother—go forth and kill him! Though you may know he has a wife and family dependent upon him—go forth and slay him, he is only a German dog. Will he not kill you if he gets a chance? Of course he will. He is being told the same story! His King and Country Needs Him!"

"I have always said," declared Mr. Churchill "that if Great Britain were defeated in a war, I hoped that we should find a Hitler to lead us back to our rightful position among the nations. The story of Hitler's struggle cannot be read without admiration for the courage, the perseverance, and the vital force which enabled him to challenge, defy, conciliate, or overcome all the authorities or resistance which barred his path."

After this, comment would be superfluous.

WAR AND THE STUDY CIRCLE

Thomas Johnston's Anti-War Speeches Recalled.

Glasgow Socialists for some years past have been familiar with the weekly lecture announcements of the Glasgow Study Circle. The announcement of speaker and subject is preceded with a statement of the aims of the organisation as follows:—

STUDY CIRCLE

(Founded by Robert Shanks)

For the discussion of the Principles and Problems of National and International Life in the light of the Teaching of Jesus.

Meets every Sunday Morning at 11.15 at 100 West Regent Street, Glasgow.

On October 8, our Comrade, Rhys Davies, M.P., addresses the Study Circle. In the afternoon he speaks with us at the Cosmo Picture House. In view of his uncompromising pacifism, we hope that Rhys Davies will remind the Study Circle of the hypocrisy that is associated with the activities of organisations of this description, owing to their ultra respectability. The Study Circle offers us an outstanding example of ineptitude and humbug in this matter.

Readers of these columns will have noted our reproductions of the writings of Thomas Johnston, now Rt. Hon. and War-time Secretary of State for Scotland, culled from the "Forward" during the last war, or his pamphlets. Also the reproduction of his crude pictorial attack on the monarchy with which he now consorts so proudly. Crudely attacking the monarchy yesterday and joyfully consorting with it to-day is a mild offence compared to his war charlatanism. For war means a direct toll of human sacrifice.

Johnston's path to office in these days of war was made possible by the false publicity given to him during the interlude of peace by organisations like the Study Circle.

We reproduce the following report from the "Glasgow Herald," for Thursday, December 19, 1932:—

FRENCH PACIFIST FILM SHOWN IN GLASGOW

"We must, if we are to be safe, visualise a world state, a world legislature in terms of a world mind." This statement was made by Mr. Thomas Johnston last night when he addressed a crowded audience in the Regal Picture House, Glasgow, at a meeting held under the auspices of The Study Circle.

Following Mr. Johnston's address, the French Pacifist Picture "War is Hell" was shown for the first time publicly in Scotland. The picture graphically depicts the destructiveness of war and the unhappiness which enters into the lives even of non-combatants, and deals in a vividly interesting way with a friendship formed in No Man's Land between five soldiers of different nations. Mr. William Niven presided at the meeting.

GAS MASK TRAINING

Mr. Johnston in the course of his address produced a gas mask, which he asked the chairman to put on, and observed that that was the kind of mask that was being handed out to civil populations in the Near East. Workmen, he said, had to stop their work when a whistle blew and put on such masks. After twelve years—after the Treaty of Peace, the Locarno Pact, the Kellog Pact—it had come to this that in Great Britain the Red Cross Society could suggest nothing more than that the civil population should be handed these infernal masks at £1 each. That was the only method which was suggested to save us from utter annihilation.

"You cannot save your babies with this, and you cannot train infants in the use of gas masks. Mr. Baldwin was perfectly correct when he said in the House of Commons that in the event of another war the children and the weaklings would go first, and I put it to you that so far as the Committee of Imperial Defence knows,, so far as our scientists know, if you permit war to break out again the children of the belligerent nations must eventually die."

A WORLD PEACE

There were two views about war. One was that it might be made slightly less ferocious, slightly less hellish—that resolutions should be passed at Geneva declaring that in future wars people were not to be killed with anything above 8.6 inch guns. The other view was that war being indeed a great, crazy, useless and costly bestiality, mankind, out of sheer terror, should declare its outlawry under all circumstances and for all purposes. They must, if they were to be safe, visualise a world state, a world legislature in terms of a world mind. They must, for a beginning, have a world police supplanting the national armies, navies and air forces

Some of the folk who listen to Rhys Davies will have been present at the Regal Picture House when the Study Circle exhibited, for the first time in Scotland, the French film, "War is Hell." They will have applauded Tom Johnston's address and felt smugly satisfied that they were forwarding world peace. All that they were doing was this: they were forwarding the, to the common people, quite useless career of Thomas Johnston and paving the way to the hell of the second World War.

Outside the picture house some of our comrades were circulating the second edition, then recently issued, of our booklet "At Grips With War." The promoters of the meeting showed no friendliness to this activity. On the contrary they were opposed. Had it been suggested by some of their members that we, having suffered so much imprisonment for resisting militarism and also for attacking Imperialism, ought to have been invited to speak to the film, they would have been horrified. We were an atheist! Enough to make every member of the Study Circle shudder. That we were an anti-militarist did not matter. Once upon a time the Christians made every respectable Roman citizen shudder. But then they were anti-militarists and actually opposed war. Like them we oppose war—consistently and persistently. And we utter terse, unkind thoughts about militarism. When we pledge our resistance to war, we mean what we say. So disturbing! Especially if you live in the suburbs!

One, Jesus of Nazareth, was a disturbing person also, in his day. We wonder if the Study Circle really has any time for his teaching; or if it is only a conventional, pseudo-cultural, waste-the-Sunday institution.

It was very pleasant for the public who saw the film, "War is Hell." It was very nice to hear Thomas Johnston's attacks on Gas Mask drill in 1932. But what did he do about it? And what did his attitude become in 1939? And the Study Circle members did what—applauded in 1932 and supported conscripting politicians in 1939?

Has it discussed the problem of war in the light of the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth? If so, will its secretary tell us, that the militarist political advancement in Coalition Cabinets is the result of such discussion? Are we to believe that individual moral ineptitude follows naturally from such discussion.

War is Hell! Thomas Johnston parades his views before the Study Circle! What irony! What deceit! What studied callousness!

DUKE OF BEDFORD URGES MONETARY REFORM.

The Duke of Bedford, speaking at a public meeting in the Central Halls, Edinburgh, last night, said that Socialism, so far as he had seen it, was not the remedy for the world's troubles, but he was open to be convinced. Certainly the country needed some sort of monetary reform, and this should be the first problem to be tackled in the post-war period.

The meeting was held under the auspices of the Edinburgh No Conscription Committee. The Rev. Dr. Hector Macpherson presided.
